MINUTES OF EVIDENCE.

Martis, 28^o die Februarii, 1832.

The Right Hon. ROBERT GRANT in the Chair.

RICHARD CLARKE, Esq. called in, and examined.

IV.
III.
JUDICIAL.

1. WHAT is your profession?—I am a retired Civil Servant of the East-India Company, under the Madras presidency. 28 February 1832.

2. How long did you serve the Company?—From the season of 1804.

Rich. Clarke, Esq.

3. In what departments did you principally serve?—In the Sudder Adawlut, and part of the time in the Board of Revenue, of which I was junior member when I left Madras. I was also Tamul translator to Government, and ex officio a member of the Board for the superintendence of the College.

4. During what period of the service were you in the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut?—I was in the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut from 1814 to 1820, as deputy registrar and acting registrar.

5. In filling those situations, you have of course turned your mind to the subject of the judicial administration of the Company?—I have.

6. As registrar of the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut, you carried on correspondence with the different civil courts of justice, during that time; did you not?—Yes; officially, under the instructions of the judges.

7. Had you opportunities of being acquainted with the course of proceeding in those courts?—I had.

8. Can you state what is the course of education pursued in the college of Madras, during the period of qualifying writers for their situations in the service?—My knowledge on that subject arises from my being, an ex officio member of the college board of Madras, from 1815 to 1826, when I left India. The writers, on their arrival at Madras, were placed under the general supervision of the college board: their first duty was to qualify themselves in the languages of the country, and for that purpose they were required to select one of the vernacular languages of Hindoo origin; the Tamul, or the Telooquo or the Canaree, or the Malayalim or the Mahratta; and as a second language they were permitted to take either the Persian or the Hindostanee: they were required to study two languages. The increase of their allowances depended upon the progress they made in their studies, as reported by the college board to the Government. Besides the study of languages, they were also required to inform themselves on the general principles of the regulations enacted by the local government; and they were examined in their progress as well in the languages as in the regulations, by members of the college board. The regular examinations were half-yearly, but special examinations were also allowed when students deemed themselves qualified to apply for the increase of allowance granted for a certain standard of acquirement in the languages. When a student could translate from and into his first language, with correctness and facility, and could hold a conversation with natives upon any subject proposed to him, and could read official papers put into his hand, and had acquired a knowledge not quite so extensive of his second language, he was reported by the board as qualified to enter upon the duties of the public service.

E.I.—III.

9. Are any means taken to qualify those who are to take judicial situations?—No other but causing them to read the regulations of the government in the college, and examining them thereupon.

10. You were understood to say that some acquaintance with the regulations was required of all students in the college; is more required of those who may fill judicial situations than of others?—There is no difference made in the course of education of the students, with reference to their future employment in any particular branch of the service.

11. Is there any and what principle upon which the servants who are to fill judicial situations are selected?—They are generally selected for promotion with reference to their standing in the service, as entitling them to a superior salary; the appointment to office is in the discretion of the Governor in Council.

12. May they be appointed to a judicial situation immediately on leaving the college?—They may be appointed to ministerial offices in the courts; they may be appointed registrars, but they seldom are so. There is no rule prescribing any course of education, or any course of promotion for servants, in regard to judicial offices. When a writer is reported qualified for the public service he is eligible, according to the discretion of Government, either to the revenue or the judicial department; he would enter upon those duties in the inferior grades: if he chose the judicial department, he would probably be appointed an assistant either in the zillah or provincial court, or he might be appointed a registrar; his being so would depend generally upon the number of servants who were at the disposal of the Government to fill the different offices of administration at the period. As assistant, he would perform duties both on the criminal and on the civil sides. An assistant has no judicial functions to perform, he is merely a ministerial officer; but the registrar of a zillah court has jurisdiction as a judge to a certain amount. Under the government of Sir Thomas Munro it was the practice to appoint all young men, on their quitting college, to situations in the revenue department in the first instance: there is no rule of promotion established by the Government, nor is any standard of judicial qualification required, nor does any examination take place on the appointment of civil servants to judicial offices after quitting the college.

13. When does the Government take any and what means of ascertaining the qualifications of those who are promoted to judicial situations?—That is a matter which rests entirely in the discretion of the Governor in Council.

14. What opportunities has the Government of knowing the qualifications of the servants to execute judicial offices?—They have the general means of estimating the intelligence intelligence of a civil servant from his public acts, as recorded in the proceedings of the courts, or his correspondence with the Government.

28 February 1832.

15. Will you explain what you mean by the statement that, under Sir Thomas Munro, the writers began in the revenue department?—Sir Thomas Munro was of opinion, that more extensive general knowledge was to be obtained by service in the revenue than in the judicial department; and as the civil servants were eligible to any office under the Government, he sent them into the revenue department first, as best qualifying them for any situation to which they might be afterwards appointed.

16. At what age do the writers generally leave college at Madras?—About 20; they come out generally about 18 or 19, and they remain in college about one or two years.

17. How early is the age at which they enter on any judicial functions?—According to the course of appointment adopted of late years, a civil servant was generally appointed registrar after about three years' service in the revenue department.

18. Did he ever assume any judicial functions before he had been employed a certain number of years in the revenue service at Madras?—According to the common course of practice of late years, a man was not appointed registrar until he had served three years in the revenue department.

19. Can you state the age at which a person gets to the office of registrar?—About 23.

20. During the time he is in college, are there no books which will give him information respecting the law or the judicial system, except the Regulations?—He is not required to study any books for that purpose; those who have made progress in Sanscrit at Haileybury College generally have read the Institutes of Menu; that is one of the text-books of Hindoo law.

21. The moolavie, or Mahomedan law expounder, is an officer of the college, is he not?—Yes.

22. Is there a Hindoo pundit and an expounder of Hindoo law also attached to the college?—Yes; there are also classes of native students in Hindoo and Mahomedan law.

23. The writers do not avail themselves of that means of instruction?—They are not required to do so; the instances of their doing so are rare.

24. You know that there are translations of Menu and several other writers on the Hindoo law?—Yes, there are.

25. And also of several of the authors and writers on Mahomedan law published?—Yes, there are.

26. It is no part of the instructions given to them to obtain information by the reading of those books?—It is not.

27. Will you explain how it happens that there is no instruction in matters of law in the college?—When the civil servants of the three presidencies went to Calcutta to qualify themselves there for the duties of the public service, which was the case under Lord Wellesley's administration, they did study the laws; but after the abolition of that college, the only branch of study required to be carried on in India was that of languages. The college at Madras was established in that form, after after several experimental plans, on a plan formed about the year 1810 by the late Mr. Ellis, of the Madras civil service, who was a very excellent oriental scholar, and also himself well versed in the laws. One of the declared objects of the institution was to have efficient native teachers to instruct the civil servants in the languages of the country; their qualifications were to be ascertained by the board, which was formed of the translators to Government, and of some other civil servants of the establishment who were conversant with the Indian languages. Mr. Ellis was the first senior member or president. It was the duty of the board to inquire into the debts incurred by young civil servants; a declaration upon honour was required from each at the half-yearly examination, which was of course a confidential communication, stating whether he was in debt, and the amount. By that system the board at Madras were enabled greatly to check the incurring of debt, and the satisfactory result was that the greatest portion of students quitted the college free from debt: in no case, while I was a member of that board, did it ever happen that a student in the college owed more than 5,000 rupees.

28 February 1832.

28. It is understood that the college of Lord Wellesley was intended as a seminary for the general instruction of all the civil servants under the three presidencies, both in the oriental languages and in law, as well as other departments of knowledge?—Yes.

29. And that the system the Company substituted was that of instruction in this country previously to the going out as writers, in law and in other departments of knowledge which might be requisite; and that having given the writers the rudiments of oriental languages in this country, the college in Bengal should be employed to perfect them in those languages: was the college at Madras formed after that time, and was it modelled upon the plan of the reduced college at Calcutta?—There was a succession of plans at Madras, the first of which were very simple; the last scheme was adopted on a model sketched out by Mr. Ellis.

30. In the functions of criminal justice, at what age are the writers promoted to situations in which they exercise criminal jurisdiction to any extent?—Since the transfer of the office of magistrate to the collector, which took place in 1815, a writer, immediately upon his appointment in the revenue department, was liable to be called upon to execute the duty of magistrate, as the collector might delegate to him the whole of his magisterial authority, or such part as he might deem it expedient to entrust to him.

31. What extent of power would that imply?—A power of imprisonment and corporal punishment within the limits prescribed by the regulations.

32. He might stand in the place of the magistrate almost immediately after his leaving college?—Yes.

33. What is the station at which he might ultimately arrive as a criminal judge?—As a "criminal judge," technically, his duties would be attached to the office of zillah judge.

34. A magistrate has not the power of life and death?—No; nor the criminal judge. The zillah judge is the criminal judge; his power extends to punishment to a limited extent. The next court in gradation is the provincial court, which, in its criminal character, is a court of circuit for the trial of all greater offences; they hold hold their sessions at the zillahs within the range of their jurisdiction. All capital cases must be referred for confirmation by the court of circuit to the Sudder Fouzdary Adawlut, before they can be carried into execution.

35. At what period of their age or service do writers attain to those high judicial situations?—A civil servant is seldom appointed a zillah judge before he has served from 12 to 15 years, nor generally to the provincial court until after the further service of six or eight years.

36. Was it the principle and general practice of the Government that individuals should be promoted to those high stations according to the character for ability, knowledge and propriety of conduct they had established in situations of a subordinate kind?—The appointments to office rested entirely in the will of the Governor and Council; I should say that during Sir Thomas Munro's government, the more able public servants were appointed to the revenue department.

37. How far was the character acquired in the inferior judicial situations considered as establishing a title to advancement?—It was generally so considered, as far as the exigencies of the service would permit.

38. Do you mean to imply that there were not a sufficient number of persons?—At times there was a bare sufficiency; there was no special qualification for the judicial line, neither was the succession of appointment by degrees in the judicial department under any existing law.

39. Was there any rule that made it necessary that a person should pass through the different ranks of zillah judge and circuit judge before he arrived at the highest?—No.

40. Then it was possible that very soon after he left college he might be appointed to a high situation?—No; the high situations, with high salaries, cannot be held by a junior servant.

41. Was there any other rule of succession, except that a certain standing was requisite to the filling the places of a certain salary?—None.

42. Were the emoluments of a judicial situation such as to tend to lead men of great ability to direct their attention to those situations, in preference to situations in the revenue or other departments?—Not for some years past; the most lucrative line of promotion latterly was the revenue, and it offered the greatest number of situations.

43. Was there anything in the rank or station a judge held that would induce a man to take that situation rather than that in another department?—No.

44. Have you turned your attention to the subject how far it would be possible or desirable to provide means for the completing the instruction of those servants who were to fill judicial situations?—I think that such a measure is essential to the efficiency of the courts, and therefore highly desirable; the mode of effecting that object is one on which I am not prepared to speak.

45. In your opinion, is the instruction in the Institutes of Menu, or any of the books of the Hindoo law, advantageous?—The courts are called upon to administer to the Hindoos and to the Mahomedans respectively their own laws, and are required by the regulations to submit to the native law officers, who are appointed to their courts, the questions that are necessary to elicit an opinion from them on each point of law that may arise. The law officer, in his reply, generally refers to standard

28 February 1832.

Rich. Clarke, Esq.

65. Are the law and facts blended in the same pleadings?—They are.

66. The judge having consulted the law officers on questions of law, decides upon the whole of the law and the fact of the case?—He does, reciting at full length in his decree the substance of the pleadings, the evidence taken, the reference, if any, to the law officer, with his answer, and concluding with the grounds of his own decision.

67. Are there any fees for the drawing the decrees and other official reports?—The copies of decrees required to be given to each party are written on stamped paper of a certain value; if the parties require additional copies they may have them, by paying for them on the stamps.

68. From what persons do the pundits and cauzeys respectively come?—The pundits are all Brahmins, the moolavies and cauzeys are generally of highly respectable Mahomedan families.

69. Have you seen much of the native judges?—I have not seen the courts of the district moonsiffs in operation, as I have never served in the interior, but I have known many natives who have been appointed to those situations; it was not uncommon of late for persons who had qualified themselves either for law officers or for vakeels, to solicit and receive appointments as district moonsiffs; but any respectable native of known qualifications, and without any particular examination, might be appointed a district moonsiff. The sudder aumeens, who are the Mahomedan and Hindoo law officers of the zillah and provincial courts, also exercise judicial functions, and have jurisdiction to a limited extent in cases referred to them by the zillah judge.

70. Do the Mahomedan and Hindoo law officers sit together in the court, or constitute separate courts?—They sit separately.

71. Describe the distinction between the court of sudder aumeens and the court of moonsiffs?—The sudder aumeens can only receive such suits as are referred to them by the zillah judge, but the district moonsiffs have original jurisdiction to an amount limited by the regulations.

72. Is there any appeal from the decisions of either?—Yes, to the zillah judge.

73. Are such appeals frequent?—I believe that no very great proportion of decisions of sudder aumeens or district moonsiffs are appealed.

74. Do you conceive that the appointment of native judges has, upon the whole, answered in such a manner as to justify more extensive employment?—I think fully so, so long as there is an appeal from their decisions to a tribunal at which an European judge presides.

75. Supposing there were no such appeal, what do you conceive would be the consequence?—I think that the decisions of a native court, whose decrees were final, would not be confided in by the natives themselves in any but small suits; and I think that in the very imperfect state of morality among the natives of India, there is not at present sufficient security for the pure administration of justice uncontrolled.

76. Is it not possible that the very circumstance of reposing more confidence in them would tend to improve them?—I do not see how that effect can be produced, while they are open to so much temptation, and while their principles are so lax.

77. In

77. In point of fact, do you conceive the liability to an appeal operates as a very considerable check on the conduct of the native judges?—Certainly, a most important check.

28 February 1832.

Rich. Clarke, Esq.

78. Is there not a class of causes in which there is no appeal?—The decree of the district moonsiff is final, I think, as far as 20 rupees.

79. In the decisions where their decree is final, are there complaints made of those decrees?—I believe not: native judges are liable to be sued civilly, and prosecuted criminally, for corruption or bribery.

80. Do you recollect at what period the authority of these judges was introduced to the extent to which it now exists?—There had been for many years native commissioners, not altogether so respectable as the present district moonsiffs. The number of these judges was considerably increased, and their jurisdiction was extended, by regulations passed in the year 1816.

Martis, 6^o die Martii, 1832.

The Right Hon. ROBERT GRANT in the Chair.

RICHARD CLARKE, Esq. again called in, and examined.

81. HAVE you ever turned your attention to the question in what manner the Company's servants to be employed in judicial situations may best be qualified for the discharge of that duty?—I have considered the subject a little since I had the honour of being before the Committee last. In comparing the course of education laid down in the regulation for the college at Calcutta, under my Lord Wellesley, with the systems now pursued, it appears that every branch of knowledge there taught has been provided for either in England or in India, excepting the study of Hindoo and Mahomedan law. General instruction in law is given at Haileybury college, but it is, I apprehend, merely in the rudiments; and it is known that in every branch of study there is great variety of proficiency and attention exhibited by the students, consequently a considerable number quit the college but slightly imbued with even those general principles of the administration of justice; but on the principles of the Hindoo and Mahomedan law, I believe no particular instruction is given at the East-India college. It is also of great importance towards fitting a man for the discharge of the higher judicial functions, that he should acquire, by due preparation, the power of discriminating between truth and falsehood in taking evidence, and certain fixed principles which may generally govern the admission of evidence. For want of practice in these particulars the Company's servants are generally left to form their individual opinions of the mode of determining on the credibility or otherwise of the evidence before them. I think it is owing to this want of experience, and of training to this part of the judicial duty, that complaint is so frequently made of the difficulty of ascertaining the truth, and

Rich. Clarke, Esq.

6 March 1832.

Rich. Clarke, Esq.

distinguishing between truth and falsehood in suits between natives. To remedy these evils it would appear necessary that more detailed instruction in law should be given, and that the civil servants should have the opportunity of forming themselves for the administration of the higher judicial functions by witnessing the proceedings of regular courts. The judges of all the Company's courts in India, from the lowest to the highest, have been equally left to fit themselves for the discharge of their functions, and consequently there is no greater certainty of acquiring valuable experience in the higher than in the lower courts. It is one of the duties of the court of Sudder Adawlut to regulate the practice and proceedings of the lower courts, and this they do by written orders upon points referred for their direction, or upon any subject that arises in the course of the proceedings which come before them, and which may seem to require interference on their part to correct errors or to ensure consistency. But a very small portion of the Company's servants have an opportunity of witnessing this part of the proceedings of the Sudder Adawlut, as applicable to the general administration of justice; and the mere occasionally reading of an order will convey little general knowledge to the reader of it. If the proceedings of the court of Sudder Adawlut were under the direction of judges more regularly trained in the study and practice of law, and if the proceedings before them were carried on by oral pleadings in the English language, considerable facility might be afforded for the practical study of the administration of justice to the Company's junior servants; and if examination in the laws which they are to administer were made to precede appointment to the office of judge, it does not appear impracticable to train the Company's servants for the discharge of judicial functions, even in the course of their service in India.

82. In what way are the proceedings of the courts made known to the sudder adawlut, so as to give them the opportunity of judging of them, and providing an uniformity of practice?—First, by appeals, in which every proceeding and order of the lower court is laid before the Sudder Adawlut in writing; secondly, by petitions presented to the Sudder Adawlut by parties who consider themselves aggrieved by any order or proceeding of the inferior court; and lastly, by examination of the periodical reports of suits decided by the lower courts, the review of which occasionally suggests doubts of the propriety of the proceedings in the courts below, when a reference is made to the inferior court for information and explanation.

83. Do you mean it is compulsory on the judges of the lower courts to make those periodical reports?—It is provided for by the regulations.

84. Have you had occasion to see that even the merely rudimental instruction in law which is acquired at Haileybury proves beneficial in framing the orders for judicial proceedings?—Certainly, in giving general principles of equity and justice. I have always found the judicial officers of the Company anxious to discharge their duty, not only with uprightness, but with great independence.

85. You say that the difficulty of discriminating between truth and falsehood in native suits arises partly from the want of proper instruction in those who have to judge; is it in any degree produced by the want of the quality of truth or veracity in the natives?—Undoubtedly, to a great degree. A native will in general give his evidence rather with reference to the consequences of what he may say to his own interest, than from any regard to its truth or falsehood.

86. Are

6 March 1832.

Rich. Clarke, Esq

86. Are you aware that it has been urged as one reason for employing native juries and punchayets, that natives are much better able than Europeans to elicit truth from native witnesses?—I am aware that that is one of the reasons urged. There is no doubt that their more familiar acquaintance with the language and habits of their fellow-countrymen must give them a considerable advantage in the discernment of truth; but I think that generally, where the habit of examining evidence exists, as in the judges and counsel in the King's courts in India, the truth is generally arrived at.

87. You mean when natives are under examination?—When natives are under examination.

88. Do you mean to say, that the barristers and judges of the King's courts, though from their education less familiar with the habits of the natives than the Company's servants, yet are more successful in eliciting truth from native witnesses?—I think they are generally so, on the whole; that they are more certain of arriving at the truth.

89. Do you consider the experiment of employing punchayets, on the whole, as having failed or succeeded?—At Madras I believe it has entirely failed.

90. To what cause do you ascribe its failure?—To the unwillingness of natives to take upon themselves the trouble of deciding causes without remuneration, with the probability of bringing upon themselves the ill-will of the parties before them, and certain occupation of a great portion of their time in matters in which they have no personal interest; also to the want of confidence on the part of the natives in their decisions.

91. That is, you mean of native suitors?—Yes, of native suitors in the decision of punchayets.

92. Then how far do you think it would be possible to extend the use of native agency in the administration of justice in the Company's courts?—It appears to me that it might be done by associating natives with Europeans in the discharge of those duties: their assistance would be of great advantage as assessors or co-judges; and by being associated with European judges, they would acquire the habit of administering justice without being so much exposed to those temptations and to those influences which have been found generally to affect their conduct in proportion as they are vested with independent authority, and on the extent of which we possess probably less accurate information than on any other relation of the native character.

93. Do you think that the natives, by being employed in administering justice, would by degrees learn to act more independently than Europeans?—In order to the improvement of the native character, I think there is wanting a better moral principle in themselves individually than they are now found to possess, and a more powerful influence of moral opinion on the part of native society. At present their morality affords little internal control over their actions; it does not furnish them with a conscientious check on their conduct; and there is no control of public opinion acting upon them externally. Injustice or misconduct, which should prove successful in making the fortunes of a native, would attach no disgrace to him in the estimation of his countrymen.

Rich. Clarke, Esq.

94. How is perjury punished?—Perjury is punished under the Regulations, by imprisonment and hard labour; I am not sure whether by transportation, but by imprisonment and hard labour certainly.

95. Are prosecutions for perjury frequent?—Very frequent.

96. What is the effect upon the character of a native, on his having been prosecuted for perjury, and convicted?—If the man is of a character to which from rank or caste any degree of respectability or sanctity attaches, those qualities would not be affected by his punishment, in the minds of the natives. I believe that persons holding offices attached to temples have been viewed with equal reverence and treated with equal deference in regard to their spiritual authority, while under actual punishment for perjury.

97. And would it not operate as a stain upon them in society?—Not among themselves.

98. In the event of an increased introduction of Europeans, either for the purposes of trade or settlement, into the Company's territories, have you considered whether and in what way the judicial system of the Company must be altered to adapt it to the consequent state of things?—The question is a very difficult one, but I will endeavour to state what occurs to me. In the relations of commerce the dealings of the Europeans would be with the natives on the spot; it would seem necessary, therefore, that one law should exist, which should be equally administered to both: this would seem to render it necessary that the principle of legislation must adapt itself rather to the state of the European than of the native. The natives have been for centuries subject to despotic government: the laws enacted by the British Governments in India for the regulation of their servants, though in their general principle eminently equitable and just, have left more to the discretion of the local officers in the provinces than perhaps could be allowed if they had European settlers to deal with. The laws must be more definite and precise, and must be so administered as to ensure both efficacy and uniformity. The revenue laws, it would seem to me, must be drawn with great care and clearness, in order to avoid frequent collision between the European settlers and the officers of the Government; and being drawn by competent persons, must be administered with firmness and vigour. It appears to me, that since we are charged with the government of a country, the people of which have always been accustomed to the most submissive obedience to their rulers, and that submission having hitherto ensured the peace of the country, it is incumbent on us to protect our native fellow subjects from the evils that must necessarily arise, if contention between the Government and European settlers should be of frequent occurrence. An European, reckless of consequences and selfishly devoted to his own interests, might create such disturbance in a district, or might so impede the operations of the officers of Government, that the public administration would be almost at a stand: to guard against such an evil, it would appear necessary that a power of removal should be vested somewhere, either in the executive government, or, if it could be done, in courts of justice.

99. Would it be necessary in that case to alter the law of property, in order to render it uniform both to natives and Europeans?—Not the law of property, I should

6 March 1832.

Rich. Clarke. Esq.

I should think, which would always follow the law of the party sued in a court of justice.

100. Is not great inconvenience found to result from a rule which regulates the determination of suits by the law of the defendant, where the parties are of different nations or religions?—I am not aware of any practical inconvenience resulting from that rule: the laws of succession and inheritance of the Hindoo and the Mahomedan are so different from each other, and from the English law, that they must, it appears to me, exist separately; and I cannot conceive that we should be justified in refusing to either of the classes of our native subjects the succession to property according to that law which had governed it for so many centuries.

101. Supposing a case of contract, is there a difference in the systems of law?—There is; but it would be much more easy to assimilate the laws of contract, I should think, than those of succession. Indeed questions of contract in the Company's courts are generally decided on principles of equity and good conscience.

102. Supposing a case of cross suits, relating to the same subject-matter, would not there be a clashing of decisions?—I cannot exactly see how. I wish to add to a former answer, that one of the principal difficulties that would present itself to the entrusting natives with the administering of justice to any very great extent, singly, would arise from the character of the native code, which containing many admirable principles of justice, and exhibiting the only rules by which we can be guided in assigning property in succession, and determining on rights of adoption and some other points, have mixed up with those subjects much that is so absurd or so unjust that no Christian tribunal could administer it as a whole. But it would seem difficult to prescribe a limit to a native judge in the administration of his own law, and decisions passed by him might be of such a character as would exceedingly embarrass a court of appeal in disposing of them. If natives were admitted to sit with European judges, and to a certain degree under their control, this evil might be sufficiently guarded against, while the native would be thus admitted to a more liberal participation in the administration of justice, and would acquire habits of mind from the European judges which would probably have an extensive influence on his character, and through him, on those connected with him.

103. Since the natives do actually sit alone as judges in cases of small importance, is there any inconvenience found in those cases from the cause that you have last mentioned?—I believe not. Their jurisdiction has been hitherto considerably limited, not only in amount, but in the nature of the claims on which they were to adjudicate. They had greater jurisdiction in cases of personal than of real property.

104. You mean that the case has not been such as to involve in so great a degree the peculiarities of native law?—Generally not.

105. Might it not be possible to form some common course of instruction to which native judges, as well as Europeans, should be subjected?—The native judges of the principal classes, who have the highest jurisdiction, have generally been well trained to a knowledge of their own laws, including the law of evidence and logic. This last is one of the branches of the study of every native lawyer, and certainly makes them acute and sharp reasoners, though it is no part of the avowed object of that study to lead to the satisfactory ascertainment of truth, but rather to the ingenious nious defence of the proposition to be maintained. I should think the course of common study referred to might be practicable, but the effect of such a system would not develop itself immediately, it would need the operation of time. I am far from thinking the native character incapable, though it stands in need, of improvement. I think very highly of the natives, as diligent, acute, laborious, and anxious to acquire knowledge, and I think the extent of even their moral attainment fully equal to what might be expected from the institutions and habits of their country; but I do not think that they are at present in a state to be employed in responsible judicial functions without the supervision of Europeans.

106. Have you had an opportunity of seeing how far there is a general confidence in the decisions of the Company's courts?—I think there is a very general confidence in the integrity of the Company's judges, but not always in their skill. But there are among the Company's servants as many as under the circumstances could be expected, who have taken great pains in the acquirement both of general and of judicial knowledge. Still the circumstance that such qualifications are not examined into or required, and the frequent removals from one department of the public service to the other, have presented obstacles to the preparation of a sufficient number of persons to fill all the judicial situations existing at any of the presidencies, I believe; certainly under that of Madras.

107. Supposing a system formed for the instruction of the Company's judicial servants, should you contemplate it as a part of that system, that there should be a selection of persons for the judicial profession, according to the qualifications which they manifested?—I think there should; but as all the departments of the government must be filled out of the body of civil servants, it might occasionally occur, even under such a system, that a judicial office would require to be filled by one not so prepared. There would seem no objection to the employment of persons qualified for judicial office, in the other departments of the service.

108. Do you mean that those persons under education, found unfit to be judges, should be promoted in other lines?—Persons whose turn of mind or inclinations would not lead them to qualify for judicial situations, might nevertheless be very valuable officers in other departments.

109. Could there be any plan by which you should have a larger number of persons, out of which to select those who were to be employed, than the number of judicial places to be filled; and if any such plan be possible, should it be carried into effect in this country or in India?—As the number of eligible persons is generally fully equal to the number of all the situations under the government, and as the judicial situations are not a very large portion of those appointments, I should think it would be practicable to qualify a sufficient number of civil servants at each presidency, out of whom to select for the higher judicial situations. The legal education of civil servants in England, before quitting the country, should be carried to a greater extent perhaps, by affording some immediate encouragement or reward to such as should apply themselves diligently to it. And if the proceedings, not only in the Sudder Adawlut, but in the superior provincial courts, were more open, if oral pleadings were admitted, and witnesses examined always by the judges of the court, as in our courts of justice in England, then under the superintendence of well-selected judges in those courts, and with a gradation of appointment

Rich. Clarke, Esq.

ment established from the inferior to the superior judicial situations, I should think a sufficient number of civil servants might be educated to fill the benches of the zillah courts, the provincial courts, and the sudder adawlut. There are now some excellent judges in the adawlut courts in India, but their qualifications have been the result of their own diligence, coupled generally with a long period of service limited to the judicial department, and that generally in compliance with their own wishes and desires.

110. Have you heard it suggested, or would that be expedient, if one judge of the Supreme Court sat as a member of the Sudder Adawlut; what would you think of such a suggestion?—I think it would be very desirable to have one English lawyer on the bench of the Sudder Adawlut, as well to administer justice according to the general and broad principles of our judicial regulations (which being grounded on rules originally proposed by an English judge, Sir Elijah Impey, would present no difficulties in their administration to such a person), as also to regulate and improve the practice of the courts subordinate to the sudder adawlut. But whether the judge of the Sudder Adawlut should also be a judge of the Supreme Court, is a question of doubt. Indeed it appears to me that the existence of two concurrent jurisdictions, both called supreme, within the same limits, is an anomaly that is productive of very considerable inconvenience.

111. How far can those courts be considered as concurrent?—They are so far concurrent that cases have occurred in which opposite decisions have been come to by the Sudder Adawlut and the Supreme Court, on the same rights, supported by the same evidence.

112. In such case what has been the result; has it occasioned an appeal to this country?—A case to which I was particularly referring was one which occurred at Calcutta a good many years ago, and on some points of which an appeal is now unproceeded in, in England. A Hindoo claimed succession to some property, the greater portion of which was in the provinces. The suit came up by appeal before the Sudder Adawlut: the right claimed turned on the question of adoption: the Sudder Adawlut rejected the claim; the party obtained permission to appeal to the King in Council. Before the appeal was sent home he presented a petition, praying leave to withdraw the appeal, as he and his opponent had compromised. In consequence of this application the appeal was taken off the file of the Sudder Adawlut. A few months after he applied again for leave to revive his appeal, alleging that the deed of compromise had been extorted from him by the other party. The Sudder Adawlut referred to the zillah court through whom the deed of compromise had been transmitted, and learned from the judge of that court that the party had appeared before him, and had most satisfactorily stated the act to be voluntary on his part. Under these circumstances the Sudder Adawlut refused leave to revive the appeal. The party then indicted certain persons before the Supreme Court at Calcutta, for a conspiracy to extort from him the deed of compromise; they were convicted, and sentenced to fine, imprisonment, and pillory. An appeal was made to England on the question whether the pillory could be legally a part of the sentence. The whole of the proceedings on the criminal trial was brought in to the Sudder Adawlut by the petitioner, as a ground for the granting of a renewed petition that the appeal to England might be revived. Failing in his his application, he brought an action of ejectment in the Supreme Court, for the recovery of a small portion of the property of the same estate, which happened to be within the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court. The same evidence which was produced in the Company's courts was diligently and minutely examined by the judges of the King's court. The judgments pronounced by each of the three judges were taken down, and formed the grounds of another application to the Sudder Adawlut for leave to appeal to England. The judgment of Sir William Burroughs, one of the puisne judges, coincided with that of the Sudder Adawlut; but those of Sir Henry Russell and Sir John Royds being opposed to his, the majority of the court decided in favour of the claim to succession. The court of Sudder Adawlut, however, still adhering to their own view of the case, again refused to revive the appeal; and the point of appeal to England is, whether the Sudder Adawlut was justified in that refusal. The name of the plaintiff in that case was Rajah Moteelal Opadhia; and that of the defendant was Jagganath Gurg.

Rich. Clarke, Esq.

113. Have you considered the plan which has been proposed for the institution of legislative councils at the Indian presidencies; and if so, what is your opinion of it?—I have read the papers printed in the 5th Appendix to the Evidence that has been given before the House of Commons, but only hastily, and the subject is of too great magnitude to form a hasty judgment upon. It certainly appears to me that the combination of the knowledge and experience of English judges with those of the Indian governments, would afford the best hope of forming such laws as might be administered with advantage, especially in the event of Europeans being permitted to reside in India in any great numbers. The difficulties which have embarrassed both the courts and the Government abroad have arisen in a very great degree from the looseness and imperfections of the statutes regarding India drawn in England; and it would appear impossible but that it should be so. But in order to make the system perfectly effective, it would be most desirable that a greater degree of interest should be excited in England in matters relating to Indian government, and that a more regular and constant acquaintance should be kept up by Parliament and the public authorities with the course of our administration in those extensive and important dominions.

114. Do you consider it is an essential part of such a plan that the council should be composed partly of judges of the Supreme Court?—I think so, if the Supreme Court is still to continue under a separate authority from that from which the Government derive their power; if the law is to be administered to Europeans by a court which has but a limited jurisdiction over natives.

115. In what way can it be material to have those judges a part of the legislative council?—Because the differences which have occasionally arisen between the Company's government and the King's court are in a great degree traceable to the imperfection of the present state of legislation, to the want of clearness, precision, and fulness in the statutes relating to India. The admission of the King's judges to be parties in making new laws would, I have no doubt, prevent the recurrence of similar difficulties. I assume that the differences alluded to have arisen rather out of the difficulties which the judges of the Supreme Court have met with in interpreting and acting under the law as it now exists, than from any wanton opposition to the government. If the laws were drawn by the two authorities thorities together, the root of those causes of dissension would, I conceive, be removed.

116. Could the natives be consulted upon that subject?—I should think that natives might be consulted with great advantage, and that they should be so; but I do not think that they are at present in a state of sufficiently advanced mental cultivation to render it advisable to give them a vote in such an assembly. One of the greatest difficulties that we have to contend with in our dealings with the natives arises from their aptness to make use of the influence which they are supposed to acquire from frequent and near intercourse with Europeans in high authority, to attain undue objects of personal advantage; and to this end they too often misstate the quantum of their influence and authority. Or if a native employed in a high duty be himself exempt from this fault, he would not be exempt from the suspicion of it, and improper means would in all probability be resorted to by others connected with him to avail themselves unduly of the influence which he might be supposed to have. It is the difficulty arising from these circumstances that has frequently led many Company's servants of the highest integrity to avoid intercourse with the natives, lest they should subject themselves, or the persons whom they consulted, to the evil consequences to which I have alluded.

117. Do you confine that to Madras?—I believe it is general.

118. In what mode do you think the advice of natives could be obtained, short of giving them an actual vote in the legislative council?—By the most free communication, both in conversation and in writing; and by associating them with us in whatever duties are performed in public, and open to general scrutiny and examination.

Veneris, 16^a die Martii, 1832.

The Right Hon. ROBERT GRANT in the Chair.

HOLT MACKENZIE, Esq. called in and examined.

119. WHAT is your opinion generally of the character and qualifications of the native judges, both Hindoos and Moslems?—I believe that those who in Bengal are called Sudder Aumeens (literally, head referees), being the highest class of native judges, and who get a salary varying from 150 to 240 rupees a month, are in general very respectable, and that they are accordingly well esteemed by the judicial officers under whom they act.

120. State in what courts they exercise jurisdiction, if you please?—They have cutcherries or courts of their own, but are established at the places where an European officer is stationed; and they have authority only to try cases that are referred to them by the European judge, either original suits, or appeals from decisions passed by the inferior native judges. These, most of whom are stationed in the interior of the districts, with jurisdictions ordinarily corresponding in extent with the police subdivisions, and with original cognizance of suits of a certain amount or value, in which the parties are natives, are called Moonsiffs. They receive no salaries, but are paid the amount of the stamp duty taken in lieu of the institution fees on the suits decided by them. In many places they are very wretchedly paid, and are, I believe, exceedingly bad judges.

121. These are all under the zillah courts?—Yes. The civil courts of a district are as follow: 1st, The Moonsiffs, whose number varies greatly, averaging about fourteen in the Lower, and nine in the Western Provinces: they have original jurisdiction to the extent of 15 l. in cases wherein both parties are natives; and from their decisions an appeal of right lies to the district court. 2dly, The Sudder Aumeens, for the trial of cases referred to them by the district judge; of these there are never less than two in a district, the situation belonging, ex officio, to the mooftee and pundit (the Moslem and Hindoo law officers or assessors) of the district court; and others are appointed according to the wants of the service; several districts having in all five: their jurisdiction extends to suits of 100 l. From their decision there is an appeal of right in all cases decided by them in the first instance. From decisions passed by them in cases of appeal from the moonsiffs, there is what is called a special appeal, which the judge may and ought to reject, if not satisfied that there are special grounds for revising the aumeen's judgment. 3dly, The Court of the Registrar, whose ordinary authority is confined to the trial, on reference by the district judge, of original suits not exceeding 50 l. in amount or value, with an appeal of right to the judge; some registrars being vested with special powers, to whom the judge may refer original cases exceeding 50 l., and also appeals from the decisions of the native judges. Lastly, the District (zillah or city) Court, the judge of which has original cognizance of all cases not exceeding 1,000 l., with an appeal of right to the provincial court in cases tried by him in the first instance; a special appeal lying from decisions passed by him, or appeals from the courts of moonsiffs, sudder aumeens or registrars. There is usually only one registrar in a district sitting at the same station with the judge; but in some large and populous districts additional registrars have been appointed, who hold their courts at places distinct from the head station of the district, being also joint magistrates. All the officers I have mentioned are paid salaries excepting the moonsiffs, whose remuneration consists in the amount of the stamp duty taken in lieu of the institution fee, in suits decided by them.

122. There are no fees in those courts, except stamp duties?—There are no fees allowed to any of the officers of the courts; and the government fees on the institution of suits and appeals, on the filing of exhibits, on the summoning of witnesses, on pleadings and petitions, and copies of papers (the first only is chargeable in the moonsiffs' court), are all levied in the form of stamp duties, as settled by Regulation I. of 1814. But the vakeels, or native pleaders, who are not properly officers of the court, though appointed by the judges, are remunerated by fees deposited by the parties in court, the amount of which is regulated by a government regulation, and varies according to the amount or value of the thing in suit.

123. Those fees are all regulated?—Yes, they are all regulated.

124. With respect to these Sudder Aumeens, when you say they are respectable, did you speak of their judicial qualifications as well as of their private characters? —I believe there is no want of talent among them.

125. In point of knowledge of their own law, they are well versed and expert? —I imagine so, generally. The Mooftees or Moslem law officers are usually reckoned men of learning, and well versed in their law, as the pundits are in theirs. But the number of cases turning upon points of inheritance or other questions, in deciding which our courts are guided by the dogmas of the Hindoo or Moslem codes, are comparatively few; and in cases of ordinary contract, they commonly decide according to their notions of what is equitable, with such reference only to local law and usage as may be necessary to ascertain the meaning of the parties entering into the agreement.

126. Will you state whether you conceive that their ideas of equity, according to which they interpret contracts, are founded upon just principles; whether the principles of judicature are good in these cases? —I believe that their decisions are generally good, at least as good as most of those of the European judges above them; but I am not myself qualified to estimate a very high standard of judicial excellence; and I do not of course mean to compare these men with the more accomplished judges of this country; but as far as I can judge, I believe many of them to be very capable of sifting and judging of evidence, so as to reach the facts of the cases tried by them, and of applying correctly just principles. This opinion I hold particularly in regard to the Moslem law officers, whom I have known, and whom I regard not only as men of learning, but of acute and logical intellects, well adapted to the administration of judicial affairs. The Pundits or Hindoo law officers, of whom however I know less, though often learned men, are generally more reclusive, and are said to be wanting in knowledge of the world; and independently of those who are considered to belong to the learned classes, numbers of natives, both Hindoo and Moslem, are to be found with much talent and great aptitude for business.

127. You state that the moonsiffs, who are all ill paid, are indifferent judges, and you seem to think the sudder aumeens better judges, who are respectably paid; how far do you conceive that the raising of the emoluments of the moonsiffs would be the means of their qualifications being improved? —I think that by raising the salary you could command any amount of talent you chose. Of the present moonsiffs, indeed, I believe many are men who could not be much improved by any change; but, doubtless, there are among them some men of talent; and if all native judges were put, in point of emolument, on the footing of the sudder aumeens, or had the prospect of becoming so, I conceive that you could immediately obtain for all the courts required, judges with qualifications equal to those which you now have in the sudder aumeens; and it also appears to me, that by holding out the prospect of certain promotion as the consequence of merit, and by facilitating education, you might soon get still higher qualifications.

128. Will you state more particularly any new way that you consider will facilitate the education of these persons? —Already a good deal has been done by government. In the colleges at Calcutta especially, the system of education has been much improved. Besides their own learning, many of the students are now

1 March 1832.

Holt Mackenzie,

attending to English: mathematics particularly are cultivated; and there is a gradually extending acquisition of general knowledge. By pursuing the system, by establishing more seminaries under proper superintendence, by supplying instructive books, and especially by promoting the acquisition of the English language and science, we may soon give to the educated classes more enlarged notions, notions that will certainly fit them better for communicating and co-operating with us. But of all the means that government can use for promoting the education of the people, and their progress in knowledge and morals, none I conceive will be so effectual as the distribution of public patronage, so as to hold out a fair prospect of promotion to liberal rank and emolument to those who show themselves superior men.

129. At this moment what are the means of education for these native judges, and especially the sudder aumeens?—For the Moslems there is the Mudrissa or College at Calcutta, in which law and all branches of Mahomedan learning have long been taught; and, more recently established, there are academies at Agra and at Delhi, where both Mussulmen and Hindoos receive a more popular education. The Hindoo law is taught in government colleges at Calcutta and Benares. The students who are admitted on the foundation of the government colleges are selected on a competition of candidates; and most of them, after passing through the prescribed course of study at those institutions, obtain certificates that they have acquired such a knowledge of law as to qualify them for the situation of law officers in any of the established courts; to which, if appointed, they become, as I have mentioned, ex officio, sudder aumeens. A similar testimonial is required from all candidates for the situation of law officer, wheresoever educated. The other sudder aumeens and the moonsiffs are appointed on a general report of their being qualified for the trust; and for both classes there exist, independently of government institutions, various means of education common to Hindoos and Mahomedans, more or less efficient. There are schools of which the masters live by the fees of their scholars, as in this country. Teachers entertained by individuals usually instruct the children of neighbours; and throughout the country, almost every man noted for learning is himself an instructor of youth. I do not remember hearing of any celebrated doctor or pundit who had not young men waiting upon them as pupils, and learning the law and other sciences at their feet. In this way a great many young men are educated in almost every district; but it is not easy to say the precise extent to which instruction is thus conveyed.

130. Do the pupils pay the teacher?—Not generally for instruction of a highly learned character. Those who teach merely Persian or Hindoe either take fees from their scholars, or are paid by the heads of the families in which they are employed. But men at all celebrated for learning, and indeed most of the instructors in Arabic and Sanscrit, usually give tuition gratis; often, indeed, feeding and clothing their pupils; and at the government institutions there are a considerable number of students who get a small allowance for their support, it having always been the practice of native colleges, that the student should not pay, but be supported. The habits of the people being very moderate, a few shillings suffice for the support of a student. The rank and reputation of a man for learning is promoted by his having many pupils; and both masters and scholars in many cases

*Holl Mackenzie,

cases get presents on occasions of solemnity; it being indeed no disgrace to a poor student to beg.

131. These pupils, then, are not of use to their teachers as they advance?—I never heard that they were of any use. The men of learning who gather pupils about them look more to the reputation of the thing than to anything else.

132. Perhaps in that way promoting their employment?—Chiefly in promoting their rank in society.

133. Now with respect to the allowance in the Government College, is that allowance made by government?—Yes. A part of the general fund is appropriated to the support of a certain number of students. It has been an object with us latterly to encourage the attendance of students who are willing to attend, without pay, for the sake of learning; but with reference to the usages of the people, the change could only be made gradually. I do not doubt that before long all such allowances may cease.

134. Then you think it probable that the value in which tuition will be held will give it a price?—Certainly, if the government hold out the prospect of promotion and tolerably well paid offices as the probable reward of merit.

135. Do the teachers who engage in this private tuition preserve the same system of law and practice, or is any inconvenience found by the private tuition being in separate hands?—I believe the tuition is generally far inferior to what the government institutions give, being less regularly pursued; but the course of legal study is, I believe, so prescribed as to prevent any essential diversity of system, excepting what arises out of difference of sect among the Moslems, and the prevalence, locally, of different rules among the Hindoos, which does not, I apprehend, practically operate to occasion any difficulty.

136. Do you conceive on the whole, by a more extended means of education, by acting on the principle of competition, and by giving better pay to the inferior judges, that great improvement could be made in those judges and in the efficiency of the law?—I should think a very great improvement indeed might be made in the efficiency of the law, and especially in the qualifications of the lower order of judges, by a sufficient increase of pay, so as to make their office respectable, instead of being, as now, miserably paid and little esteemed.

137. Describe more particularly the mode in which these persons are appointed to the situations of sudder ameen or moonsiff.—At present they are generally appointed on the recommendation of the judge of the court, who reports their sufficiency.

138. Is it merely by the certificate of the European judge that they are appointed?—For law officers a prescribed certificate, granted after examination by a committee appointed for the purpose, is required, as evidence of their knowledge of law. Their other qualifications are taken on the report of the judge; and in respect to native judges, not law officers, their appointment depends wholly upon the recommendation of the officers who nominate them, in regard to character and qualifications. Even the certificates granted on examination, like the title of doctor assumed or allowed by the common rules, can be taken to prove no more than that the man has studied certain books and read much and long; how far he may have profited by that reading is another question, and there being no competition, the appointment

Holt Mackenzie,

ment of all may be said to rest entirely upon the recommendation of the nominating judges.

139. Could means be found to bring into a more accurate test the qualifications of these persons before they are employed?—I think the best test, and which might be gradually employed, would be found in requiring all the men who look to the office of native judge to commence as pleaders. Already the government colleges grant to students certificates which entitle them to act as pleaders; and gradually, I should think, we could, by requiring similar testimonials from all candidates for that situation, get the native bar filled by men of education, who should also be selected as executive officers of the courts. Then if from the best of them the native judges were selected, and if at the same time a gradation in rank and pay were established among the native judges of each district, a very effectual system of competition would result. My notion is, that for an average-sized district twelve native judges would suffice, and that with a gradation of from 100 rupees to 500 rupees a month, those twelve, all being men suitably qualified, might be obtained for about the sum that is now paid to one English district judge, that is to say, 30,000 rupees a year. And I conceive that the native judges should in the first instance be chosen from among the vakeels; and then that their promotion from the lower to the higher rank should be made to depend on the mode on which they discharged their duty, especial reference being had to their good character, to the number of suits decided by them, and the fewness of the appeals from them. No other test or means of competition so effectual occurs to me; but of course the first step must be to have well educated men for vakeels.

140. Are the native judges ever now selected from the vakeels?—I believe very few; but I cannot speak with certainty. I never heard of a law officer who had been previously a vakeel; and indeed the situation of pleader has not hitherto been considered a respectable one, except in the highest courts. In the inferior courts, even in that of the district judge, it is not reckoned a desirable profession. In the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut, or chief court at Calcutta, some of the vakeels with whom I was acquainted had large emoluments, and were men of great respectability and talent; and I believe that in the provincial courts the vakeels are frequently very respectable men; but below that they are not generally esteemed at all as they ought to be, considering the importance of a good bar to the administration of justice.

141. Those officers have a per-centage upon the value of the causes, have they not?—Yes.

142. That is settled by the regulation of the office?—Yes.

143. The amount of the fees is paid into court at the institution of the suit?—Yes, before the pleader does any act for his client.

144. You say that all those native judges would act for about the same salary that is given to one European judge; do you conceive that it would be possible, by taking proper means for the purpose, much more extensively to supersede the use of European by Native judges than is the present practice?—I think that several of the present judges might be dispensed with immediately, if, as I conceive to be reasonable, the native judges were vested with the primary jurisdiction of the cases, and if the labours of the European judges were directed to the object of

16 March 1832.

Holt Mackenzie.

causing justice to be done, not wasted in the attempt to do it directly. It appears to be necessary that there should be an appeal to the European judge; but the necessity of his investigating such cases might often be obviated by his referring them back for a new trial, either to the judge who originally decided them, or to two or more of the other native judges of the district. And the main business of the European officers being to see that there is not a failure of justice through the neglect or corruption of the natives, their interference in the individual cases should be limited to what is necessary for that purpose. Were this principle followed, I have no doubt there might be a great saving of expense with a more efficient administration of justice; and indeed, even if the present law were enforced to its full extent, and if the zillah judges took cognizance of such causes only as from their amount they must try, the judicial business of the country might, I believe, be done with fewer of them, or at least more business be done with increase of numbers. It is not, indeed, easy to say what would be the effect on litigation of an improved system. It might increase greatly for a time, if the present system operates to quash just claims, but would in all likelihood afterwards subside; and of course if, by any plan, the same number of judges are enabled to render to the public a greater sum of justice, while the demand for justice remains, it is the same thing as if the work now done were accomplished by fewer judges, in so far at least as concerns the relation of the establishment entertained to the duty to be executed.

145. Have you formed any calculation what would be the difference upon the whole in the event of introducing native judges to the extent to which it now appears practicable?—The best judgment I have been able to form is stated in a letter addressed to the Governor-General in Council, by the Finance Committee in Bengal, dated in July 1830, to which a schedule is annexed, showing that a very considerable expense might be saved. The great object, however, really is to prevent an increase of expense, everybody acknowledging that at present in Bengal the administration of civil justice is extremely bad, and quite inadequate to the just expectations of the people. The European courts are overloaded with arrears, the delay in them is excessive; and, to say nothing of other evils, the large arrear of appealed cases holds out a temptation to litigious appellants that seriously clogs the whole course of justice. This is the more felt from the circumstance that the highest interest adjudged, viz. 12 per cent., is much below what needy natives are frequently in the habit of paying; so that a postponement of payment is a great object, even when ultimate resistance is hopeless. And on the whole, it may, I believe, be certainly assumed, in so far as Bengal is concerned, that some change is absolutely necessary in order to get through the existing business without an increase of establishment. It may be proper to mention, that in the plan submitted by the Finance Committee, to which I have referred, the following arrangements also were contemplated: First, The separation of the charge of the police from the duty of trying and deciding criminal as well as civil cases. Secondly, The union of the charge of the police with the management of the land revenue. Thirdly, The abolition of the registrars' courts, and of the provincial courts of appeal, which are intermediate between the zillah judges and the Sudder Court at Calcutta. For fuller explanation of the scheme, I would beg leave to refer to the Committee's Report, and the Minutes by its members subsequently submitted.

For

16 March 1832.

Holt Mackenzie,
Esq.

For the civil courts, the main principle was to give the primary jurisdiction to natives, to make the zillah and city judges judges of appeal, and to have only one superior court of appellate jurisdiction, for the maintenance of general principles and the trial of special cases.

146. The present court of appeal from the zillah court is the provincial judge? —Yes, and from the provincial court to the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut, the principle being to allow one appeal as of right, and one special appeal, upon due cause being shown, to the superior court.

147. Now, looking at the increased employment of the natives in judicial departments, have you ever considered how far a change would answer gradually in the case of a considerable increase in the number of Europeans settled in the interior? —I do not think that there ought to be any serious difficulty in giving to the natives at the head station the power of deciding causes in which Europeans are concerned, even supposing them to be more numerous than appears probable.

148. The question is, supposing the Europeans are made subject to it?—I mean so; and I conceive that the apprehension of difficulty rests on prejudices that would soon pass away, if the native judges were placed on a proper footing, and the English district judge confined to his proper functions. For a time, probably, it might be necessary for the native judges, in issuing out process, to apply to the English judge to back their warrants, and otherwise to seek his support. But that cannot be deemed a very serious difficulty; and the necessity would, I doubt not, gradually cease, or become of very rare occurrence. Under a properly organized system, European settlers would generally, I conceive, soon become reconciled to being subject to local tribunals; and unless the English judge were inefficient, even those who entertain most strongly the notions that arise out of an exclusive system, would see the necessity of submitting, and would submit, and I believe that respectable and well paid natives would decide fairly.

149. Would it not render a greater number of tribunals necessary?—Only I should think if the Europeans were in such numbers as to change the current of business. If they add much to the commerce of the country, the necessity of such tribunals would probably arise out of their settlement, not otherwise.

150. Did I understand you rightly, that you think the necessity of having provincial courts would be done away with?—Yes, I think they might be done away with altogether. I consider them to be bad courts at present; they are in general filled by men in no respect superior, perhaps inferior, to the district judges over whom they are placed, and their decisions are of no value as guides to those judges.

151. You would then contemplate the existence of an European judge in each district?—Yes, but not precisely the same number as at present. The immediate reduction we contemplated is not however so great as may, I conceive, be ultimately effected; for, in proportion as the natives improve and acquire rank and self-confidence, the number of English judges may be gradually reduced. If I remember rightly, the Committee proposed 41 instead of 52.

152. Are there not European officers assistants or secretaries to the district judges?—A registrar forms part of the establishment of every court. Those officers who are covenanted civil servants of the Company, were originally ranked as the executive officers of the courts, being also employed to registrar deeds, practically practically their main duty is that of assistant judges, to decide cases referred to them by the judges; either civil suits or complaints of minor criminal offences; and the proposal to abolish the office was founded on the persuasion that the employment of such young men as judges in lieu of the natives, is a bad plan, expensive and inefficient.

16 March 1832.

*Holt Mackenzie,

153. As to the appointment of the vakeels, they are appointed by government, I believe?—The vakeels of the sudder and provincial courts are appointed by the judges of those courts. Those of the district and subordinate courts used to be appointed on the nomination of the district judges; and though it was prescribed that a preference should be given to persons educated at the government colleges, the selection practically rested on the discretion of the judges. But in 1826 (by Regulation II. of that year), a rule was passed, that native students, in any of the public institutions, who shall receive a certificate of proficiency in the laws and regulations, and of good character, shall, in virtue of it, be admitted to practise in any of the zillah or city courts they may apply to, unless there be special reasons to the contrary, as stated in the regulation I have mentioned. I am not sure, however, how far it has been practically acted upon. I should also state, that among the vakeels there is one called the government pleader, who is employed in all suits in which the government is a party, and whose appointment to that office rests with the government.

154. I would ask whether the moonsiffs are ever appointed from the vakeels?—I believe very seldom.

155. Are the vakeels of a lower class of society than the moonsiffs?—Not generally; but the rank of both is of various degrees.

156. Do the judges of the provincial courts go the circuits for the trial of criminal cases?—Not at present. The circuit duties are now vested in certain officers, called Commissioners of Revenue and Circuit.

157. In the new system, should you propose to continue that, or make the zillah judge go the circuit?—I should make the zillah judge do the duty.

158. And remove altogether that jurisdiction?—Yes, and have a separate superintendence of the revenue.

159. How far does the public voice among the natives appear to call for the increased appointment of natives in official situations?—I believe the public voice is upon the whole favourable to European judges; and that, taking the native community generally throughout the country, they would prefer not increasing the power of the native judges to the exclusion of the European courts. This conclusion I come to, from the distrust with which they generally regard their own countrymen. It must however be acknowledged to be exceedingly difficult to ascertain the native opinion upon any point of that nature. Indeed, upon all points they are too ready, when communicating with those in authority, to say what they think will be received with pleasure. But my impression as to the view they take of the measure of vesting their countrymen with enlarged authority, was confirmed by what I heard after it was known that I was strongly in favour of it. I should observe that I do not think they ever look to the financial part of the question. If they were to decide whether they would directly pay for the one or the other, it would be different; but I do not conceive that even the well-informed regard the financial

Holt Mackenzie,

financial arrangements of government as a matter of any interest to themselves, unless when some precise demand comes upon them. At least, I never knew a native who seemed to regard the expenditure of the public money as an evil, though impatient enough of any demands arising out of such expenditure that disturb their own interests; and therefore I conceive, that in preferring European judges, the consideration of the saving to be effected by the opposite course would never cross their minds; they would think simply having one man they could trust more than another.

160. Do you think they have no feelings of anger, from the exclusion of the natives?—I do not think the general body have, though individuals may entertain the sentiment; and I have no doubt that those who are candidates for office look with very great anxiety to any extension of their means of lucrative employment. Indeed, I know they do, having communicated with many such, who all appeared to be exceedingly anxious for the change; and of course those in new countries, who or whose families have actually lost power, and who retain the recollection of the loss, must be discontented in consequence. But it is to the great body of the people I refer, when speaking of the public voice; and I think that, as far as the Bengal Presidency is in question, the public voice is in favour of employing Europeans, and condemns them when they rely much upon natives.

161. Can you suppose an altered system would secure a better adjudication; is there any reason why a favourable effect should not be produced upon the native opinion by that?—I have no doubt the native opinion would change, when they saw their countrymen, with rank and emolument, administering justice well; they would certainly recognise the advantage of it; but at present they consider them as what they have been under different circumstances; and, generally speaking, the feeling of patriotism is almost unknown to a native, he seldom looks beyond his own village.

162. Is there no national feeling?—I believe there is in some cases. Where particular tribes prevail, they have a feeling for their tribe that may be called national. Thus, for instance, I have no doubt that among the Rohillas there exists a strong national feeling. Probably, too, a national feeling more or less strong prevails among the Mahrattas; but I am not at all acquainted with them. I do not think the people of Bengal Proper have any national feeling. The Moslems, indeed, generally have a religious feeling that must operate against our rule more or less strongly; but this, which is not I think very strong among the Bengalese, cannot properly be called national; and the religious feelings of the Hindoos do not seem to me much to affect the question, where caste has not given power or wealth. With respect to the feelings of natives on the subject of public employment, I should add perhaps, that I believe many of the higher natives of Calcutta do complain of the exclusion of their countrymen from lucrative situations, and would be gratified by their admission; but they seem to speak rather from the feelings that have been instilled into them by communication with us, than from those which belong to the great body of their countrymen; at the same time, it appears to be impossible to doubt that such feelings must gain currency and strength with the progress of education, and with the consciousness of rights, which the possession of a good government will give.

*Holt Mackenzie,

163. There has been a vast change?—Certainly; the change that has occurred in Calcutta is very great, and although doubtful whether substitution of natives for Europeans would be popular at the present moment, I have no doubt that to a great extent it is right.

164. How far is the principle of promotion according to merit among the native judges now acted upon?—I believe little, if at all; at least I am not aware of any native judge being promoted, excepting a few instances, in which the law officers of the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut may have been selected from those of the inferior courts.

165. Is there any reason for excluding from judicial offices of any eminence the mixed race between the Europeans and the natives?—I think they ought to be considered as natives of the country.

166. They are now excluded from all these situations?—They may be sudder magistrates, and I think they ought not to be excluded from any situation to which natives may be admitted; but I do not think they should be treated as Europeans, or rather I should say, the principle ought to be, to have no more English gentlemen deputed from England than are absolutely necessary to maintain the dominion of England, and that all situations not reserved upon that principle should be open to all classes equally. I think that, for the present at least, the English judges must be men deputed from this country.

167. Both in the lower and in the higher courts?—In the zillah and city courts, and in the sudder courts; and all other courts should be equally open to all classes, whether Europeans or Natives, Christians, Hindoos or Moslems.

168. Do you mean to say by your former answer, that the reputation of the European judge is very considerable among the natives?—In point of honesty it is, I believe, exceedingly good.

169. Is not their confidence in the court greatly shaken in consequence of the junction of the police?—I think that operates only in so far as it occasions delay; it does not seem to be regarded as a cause of bad judgment; it sometimes occasions hasty decisions, and thus aggravates the inequality of judges; and of course the judges are very unequal; and among so many there are some with qualifications quite below what ought to be required for the office. Their decisions are, many of them, exceedingly bad; but there is hardly any instance in which personal corruption in the judge is suspected as the cause of misdecision.

170. Have you ever framed any plan for a general judicial system over India, in which the functions now exercised by the supreme courts should be blended with those exercised by the country courts?—No, I have never formed any plan of that kind.

171. What is your idea of it?—I do not imagine that I could add anything to what is stated in the discussion between the Bengal government and the Supreme Court of Calcutta, of which the papers have been printed.

172. In what Appendix?—In the Appendix, No. V. dated 11th Oct. 1831; and I can only add, that there do not occur to me any serious obstacles in the way of forming one Supreme Court, consisting partly of gentlemen who may have practised as attorneys at law, and partly of those who have risen in the judicial service of the country, to take the place of the present King's Court, and of the Sudder Dewanny and Nizamut Adawlut.

16 March 1832.

Holt Mackenzie,
Esq.

173. How far would it be possible to have an English bar in India from which you could select judges for the country courts?—I do not immediately see how it could be arranged; for the question involves a great variety of considerations. But it would, I think, be very advantageous if it could be so managed (and with one Supreme Court constituted as suggested, with a careful adaptation to local circumstances, it might probably be found practicable), that a portion at least of those who are destined to be judges should practise as barristers.

174. Do you conceive it to be necessary that more care should be taken than is taken under the present system, for qualifying the Europeans who are employed in the country courts as judges?—I think certainly it should be so; it is quite monstrous that the appointments should be made with no better securities for due qualification; it is wonderful that they have done so well as they have.

175. Would you have any system of education or examination for them?—I think that no man appointed to be employed in the civil administration of India should leave this country until he is about two-and-twenty years of age; that all should be required to have an education suited to the high functions for which alone it seems reasonable to depute officers from this country; that consequently, among other things, they should have a liberal law education, by which I mean, that they should be acquainted with the general principles of law and the systems that have prevailed in different countries, in such a manner as a well-educated English gentleman destined for public life would, I presume, be. Their possession of the required qualifications would of course be ascertained by an examination. To this, I would add the making of the appointment, if possible, by some system of competition, so as to be sure of the selection of the best out of many good men. Whether such a plan could be practically brought to bear, I cannot venture positively to say. It was, I believe, partially followed by Mr. Wynn; and if his plan had been carried further, I see no reason to doubt its success. England appears to be full of talent highly cultivated, and struggling with the difficulty of getting employment. I should think, therefore, that for high office in India, you might require, and could easily obtain, almost any amount of qualification.

176. What was Mr. Wynn's plan?—It was, I believe, merely giving a certain number of appointments to the public schools and universities, in order that they might appoint those who were most eminent.

177. Would you apply that principle to exacting legal qualification, or do you speak merely of general education?—Among other qualifications, I should require legal knowledge, not technical skill, but a liberal acquaintance with law.

178. Have you known that the degree of elementary instruction that is acquired at Haileybury in the principles of the law has been of any use or otherwise in India?—As far as I have seen, no perceptible result has followed from the legal instruction there given; and though I dare say it has been of use, it must, I imagine, have been very slight.

179. Do you conceive, that if you had an unlimited number of candidates in this country out of which the requisite number of appointments should be made, or do you mean, having a good number of appointments, means should be taken to qualify or to have persons appointed as well qualified as possible?—I think the more you have to select out of the better. The best of all would be a general competition

16 March 1832.

*Holt Mackenzie,

competition of the whole body of educated Englishmen who might desire the appointment. Next to that is a selection out of a body which, though limited, considerably exceeds the number to be selected. It was, I believe, proposed by the professors at Haileybury, that the Court of Directors should send to that institution twice as many as were to be appointed as civil servants to India, and that the best half should be selected for the appointments. That would have been a great improvement; but I think it would be better to follow Mr. Wynn's plan, and select from among the competitors of a still larger body.

180. By Mr. Wynn's plan, do you mean the plan proposed by Lord Grenville, of selecting the writers from the public schools and universities?—Yes. I have called it Mr. Wynn's, because he acted upon it in regard to some of the appointments that were at his disposal when he was President of the Board of Control.

181. In so far as the judicial appointments go, do you not conceive that more practical knowledge would be required than is to be obtained by individuals appointed from the University; there it would be theory, the other would be practice?—You must, I think, be content with giving theoretical knowledge in this country. And it is not merely judges that are to be provided; nor can Indian judges be generally fit for their business without local experience, and that an experience in affairs not strictly judicial. My notion is, that the civil servants should still, in the first instance, be employed as assistants to the magistrates and collectors or political agents; that in that capacity they might acquire a familiar command of the language, and a knowledge of the notions, habits and institutions of the natives, and become practically acquainted with the system and principles on which the business of the country is conducted. Those who were not disposed to pursue the judicial line might be otherwise employed. But it is chiefly for judicial duties, or administrative functions partaking largely of the judicial character, that provision must be made; and if, without sacrificing the more important objects of general experience and knowledge of the people, it were practicable to establish the plan of a local bar, at which persons destined to be judges should practise during a part at least of their preparatory course, it would, I think, be a great improvement. I am not sure whether any such thing could be managed, but it is very desirable that it should be kept in view.

182. In contemplating the new arrangement of the courts in Asia, did you contemplate the junction of the Sudder Courts with the Supreme Courts?—That was one of the measures contemplated by the Bengal government; but it does not seem to be a necessary part of the proposed arrangement of courts for the provinces. The constitution of the inferior courts might be changed as suggested, without any change of that kind in the Sudder. But the junction of the Sudder and Supreme Court would, I conceive, be an improvement.

183. Supposing the junction were to take place, and that was made the agreement merely in appealing, do you not conceive that there would be so much business attracted to that court that you might select a great number of inferior judges from the bar of that court?—I think it might probably be done; but I should observe, that the plan appears to imply that all the courts shall have a code for the judges, that they shall not be bound by English law further than may be directed, provided on a full view of local circumstances, and that its mere technicalities, especially especially those which attach to landed property, shall be got rid of. It seems unreasonable to extend the law of real property to that country; and although I cannot of course pretend to give an opinion of any value on such a subject, I must acknowledge that I cannot see why there should be any serious difficulty in giving to India a code of laws to be administered equally by Native and English judges.

16 March 1832.

Holt Mackenzie.

184. In such a case, would you allow a free resort of Englishmen and Natives to practise in such a court; at present they are appointed by government?—I should be for permitting perfect freedom in the access to the bar.

185. With respect to the plan of selecting writers from the public schools and universities, who should afterwards fill judicial situations in India, do you not conceive it to form some objection, that in no public school are the principles of law taught, and at neither of the universities does the law form any part of the ordinary academical system of instruction?—I do not think that a serious objection; I have no doubt that knowledge of law would be had, if a prize were held out for it.

186. Do you mean to say, that if a certain legal qualification were required, and the candidate were to be left to find that qualification where he could, so that he answered the test, that every purpose would be fulfilled?—Yes, I have no doubt that candidates would be found with the required qualification. The knowledge of law, not the result of practice, is, I imagine, chiefly acquired by the means of private study.

187. Do you know whether the profits that an English barrister could make in the courts would be sufficient to create a bar there; how would that be?—The profits to a certain number of the barristers of the Supreme Court are very large; and those also of some of the native pleaders in the Sudder Courts are liberal; but I cannot answer the question with precision, and the circumstances would be different.

188. How would a mixed bar practically unite?—The two bars, as now constituted, could not at all amalgamate, and I conceive it would be absolutely necessary, if the courts were united, that all their proceedings should be in English; for I do not see how you could have a united court so long as any of the proceedings, any part at least of the oral pleadings, were in Persian. And for a long time natives could probably be virtually excluded from the bar of the united court. Ultimately, however, I do not doubt that they would, if allowed, take their part, and the plan, if at all adopted, should be extended gradually.

189. Are the civil suits in the native courts expensive to the suitors?—I believe generally so.

190. From what cause?—The fees are heavy in proportion to the amount, as appears from a statement which was furnished to me from the Sudder when I had occasion to inquire into the point in Calcutta; and there are, besides, expenses of which we have no record. The statement is in Persian; but if the Committee wish it, I shall hereafter have the honour of giving in a translation of it. In the meantime, I may mention the first case. It is a suit for 155 begahs of land valued at 930 rupees. It passed through three courts, and the stated costs were about 670 rupees.

Holt Mackenzie,
Esq.

191. Will you state what the courts are?—The first is the Zillah Court, in which the costs of the plaintiff are stated at rupees 194 $\frac{4}{16}$, and those of the defendant at rupees 90 $\frac{8}{16}$. The second is the Provincial Court of Appeal, in which the costs of the appellant and respondent are respectively rupees 102 $\frac{8}{16}$ and 52 $\frac{8}{16}$. The last is the Sudder Dewanny Adawlat, in which the costs are stated at rupees 128 $\frac{8}{16}$ for the appellant, and rupees 102 $\frac{8}{16}$ for the respondent.

192. In the paper alluded to, is there any cause in which there is more than two appeals?—No, there are only two appeals.

193. As the courts are now constituted in Asia, could there be in any one case more than two appeals?—I apprehend not, at least in Bengal, where only suits exceeding 5,000 £ . are appealable to the King in Council.

194. What is the ultimate course of the appeal in those causes which are instituted in the courts below the zillah courts?—The provincial courts, if the first appeal has been decided by the zillah judge.

195. Supposing a cause to be instituted in the moonsiff's court, is the appeal from that court immediately to the zillah court?—The appeal is to the zillah judge; but he has the power of referring it to the Sudder Aumeen, and then from the decision of that officer there will be only a special appeal to him. If he tries it himself in the first instance, then there will be a special appeal to the court above him.

196. Are there appeals frequently in causes that are instituted in the lower courts?—As far as I remember the result of inquiries regarding some of the districts in the vicinity of Calcutta, the appeals from the Moonsiffs were about one in twenty; and those from the Sudder Aumeens about one in seven.

197. Can you state what proportion to the zillah courts?—I do not immediately remember.

198. Have you any documents which would give you that with regard to the zillah or provincial courts?—No; but I think the information will be found in the records of the judicial department.

199. Is there not a good deal of corruption practised by the natives in the courts, the native officers, by whom the summonses, for instance, are issued, and by whom the causes are appointed to come on in rotation?—It is supposed generally that there is considerable corruption; but I should think it must chiefly prevail in regard to the execution of decrees and other process. Many decrees are passed which are never executed, either from the party disappearing or making away with their property; and in the executive part of the court's business a considerable opening is given for corruption.

200. Do you not conceive the native officers of the courts are very accessible to bribery?—I believe so, unless they are well controlled by their superiors.

201. Are not these native officers appointed by the individual judge?—Yes, vacancies are filled up by or on the nomination of the judges.

202. Is it customary for him to take persons from a distance and place them in his situations?—I do not think that such is the general custom; though much depends on the will of the individual. Many judges are averse to strangers, and I believe, make it a point as far as possible to select for vacancies men of the province.

Holt Mackenzie,

vince in which they are. Others pursue an opposite course, and I am afraid, sometimes unduly favour men that follow them.

203. Should you recommend the use of juries in the country courts?—I think it very desirable, if possible, to get the natives to assist in the administration of justice on the principle of jurors; but in the first instance, at least, it should be done in the way which is prescribed by the Bombay Regulation IV. of 1827, which leaves it optional with the judge to employ the natives as jurors, assessors or referees, without at once going the length of giving them a definitive voice.

204. Have you witnessed the experiment of the punchayet?—No, I have never witnessed it.

205. What is your opinion as to the success of the experiments that have been tried?—I believe it has very much failed, when it has been adopted as a substitute for regular courts of justice.

206. From what cause has it failed?—Chiefly, I think, from this, that the members have been neither supported nor directed nor controlled, but have been left to all their native irregularity, and not properly made a part of our judicial system; still, however, I believe that it has been very extensively used to settle matters that have never come within the cognizance of any of our courts.

207. How far is the punchayet analogous to the English jury?—It can scarcely in its native shape be said to bear any distinct analogy to a jury, being, in fact, merely a body of men to whom a cause is generally referred. They are not bound to decide; there is no issue given to them to try; they are under no direction, and are left to scramble out of their case as they best can.

208. They perform the functions both of judge and jury?—They are rather arbitrators, being, in cases of dispute between individuals, usually, I believe, nominated by the parties; and they very often, I have understood, act quite as partisans of the party that has selected them.

209. Are they sworn in any way?—No.

210. What is the general number?—I believe it varies, although the name indicates five as the general number. In cases relating to questions of caste, with which the European officers have comparatively little to do, they are frequently very numerous.

211. The decision of the punchayet of the village has not the validity of a judicial decision?—If the parties in a suit consent to a reference to a punchayet or arbitrators, their decision has the validity of a decree of court, and will be executed accordingly, unless there be corruption or gross partiality, on proof of which the award may be set aside.

212. Have the revenue officers ever used the punchayet?—Yes; I believe the native collectors use it extensively to adjust various disputes between the village communities and the different members of such communities. The collectors, too, frequently have recourse to it in the determination of questions of private right when making settlements. And one officer in particular, with whom I have had much communication, and who is singularly well acquainted with the natives of the country where he has been (Mr. W. Fraser), systematically employed it to a great extent in settling the boundary disputes between villages, preparatory to the survey of the Delhi territory and the districts immediately adjoining; and he states that he had found the plan very successful, having, if I recollect rightly, obtained the decision of about 300 cases in that way, a little while before I was with him. His scheme was partly on the principle of a jury, and partly on that of the punchayet; that is to say, the members were generally chosen on the nomination of the parties; but they were required to decide without delay; the matter in dispute was brought to a distinct issue, and the whole proceedings were regularly recorded by a government clerk who was deputed for the purpose, with instructions to follow a prescribed course. The disputes were generally between (what I may call republican) communities of yeomen cultivating their own fields, for the possession of land generally of little value, but very eagerly contested by the people. The head men of the contending villages, acting for and in presence of the whole body, were required to nominate six on each side, making in the whole twelve. The right of challenge was freely allowed; and the jury (so to term it) was required to be unanimous. Mr. Fraser's reason for having so many as twelve was, as he said, chiefly that they might, by their number and weight, be placed above the reach of intimidation or danger from the vengeance of those against whom they might decide; and it was with the same view, also, with that of putting down party spirit, that he required unanimity.

Holt Mackenzie,

213. They did not consist of the immediate parties?—No, they generally consisted of the more respectable people of the villages in the same pergunnah or local subdivision.

214. Were they boundaries between the properties of individuals or boundaries between the communities?—Boundaries between the communities, and generally of little comparative value, though very eagerly fought for.

215. Did they generally give satisfaction?—So he stated.

216. Do the natives now sit upon juries in the presidencies?—At Calcutta they occasionally sit as jurymen in the Supreme Court.

217. In civil cases or others?—Juries are only used in criminal cases, including, by a late decision, informations for the recovery of penalties.

218. They sit upon the grand jury?—No, they have not yet been admitted to the grand jury, which is, I think, a great mistake.

219. What has been the result of that experiment?—I should think it has hardly been tried upon a sufficient scale to enable one to pronounce any conclusive opinion; at least I have none.

220. Now with respect to the distance that the suitors often have to travel, is not that distance so great sometimes as almost to amount to a denial of justice in cases of small amount?—I do not think that would operate severely if there was no delay; although for the smaller cases you must continue to have a certain number of courts in the interior of the districts. Were it not for the delay, which is great and uncertain, I do not think that suitors in the cases tried at the head station would be much inconvenienced by the distance.

221. It is not the suitor alone, but his witnesses also?—Certainly; they must also and chiefly be considered.

222. To what cause is this delay chiefly to be attributed?—Chiefly to the delay of cases in the courts.

223. Have not parties often been kept waiting for days together before their cases have been called on?—I should imagine it has frequently happened.

224. Would

224. Would

16 March 1832.

Holt Mackenzie,
Esq.

224. Would not the freer admission of the natives to public situations of trust and importance be likely to produce a favourable effect on the native character?—I think essentially so. I have no conception but that it depends mainly upon the government whether the natives of India shall be quite as good as those of any other country, though one cannot entirely exclude the effects of religion. For honesty in public trusts, you must rely chiefly upon those who are trusted liberally and well treated. I am not aware that the experiment has, in India, ever failed when it has been fairly tried; and I should assuredly expect that the public confidence and satisfaction in the native judges will depend upon their having proper rank and emolument and consideration from the government.

225. The utmost amount of the salary of the judge of an inferior court is 140 rupees a month, you say?—No; some get 240 rupees a month, the 40 rupees being for establishment and miscellaneous expenses which the native judge is left to bear; the 200 are to be considered clear salary.

226. Is he not obliged to keep a palanquin?—He generally does so, I imagine; but it is not absolutely necessary.

227. The expense of that is stated at 30 rupees a month, as one of the deductions?—A native would probably keep a palanquin for much less; they generally pay their servants less than we do.

228. Two hundred rupees a month would be 10 £.?—No, about 20 £.; and I think an average of 300 £. a year would be sufficient.

229. The forms of these courts are exceedingly simple, are they not?—Yes; the forms, indeed, of the country courts generally are as simple as they can well be; I am not aware of any form that could be advantageously dispensed with; and in the pleadings of the parties no particular technicality is required.

230. Supposing the question to lie between a Hindoo and a Mahomedan; in that case what law is followed?—The general rule is, that the law of the defendant is to be followed; but that provision I apprehend will seldom apply, because in cases of contract the judges are not bound either by the Hindoo or the Mahomedan law, and of course persons of different faiths will seldom be parties in cases of inheritance or other questions requiring a reference to those codes; indeed, a Hindoo becoming a Moslem or Christian, there arises a nice question which I am not able satisfactorily to answer; viz. how far the forfeiture prescribed by the Hindoo law would be enforced against the convert; I should think it would not be enforced against him if defendant. On the other hand, if he were plaintiff suing against Hindoos for his inheritance, I am afraid the Hindoo law must be enforced against him; and so with Moslems embracing Christianity.

231. Europeans residing in the interior are subject to the Company's courts to a certain extent, are they not?—In the civil department, I am not aware of any limit as to the amount, excepting that if the cause be such as would, in the case of a native, be appealable to the Sudder Court, it may be carried by appeal to the King's Supreme Court. In other respects, British subjects are subject to the country courts to any extent, provided they fall within the Act of Parliament that makes them so.

232. In criminal cases how is it?—In criminal cases they are only subject to the extent of a fine of 50 £.; in cases of assault or force, not being felony; in all cases of felony, they must be brought to the Supreme Court.

The Right Hon. ROBERT GRANT in the Chair.

DAVID HILL, Esq. called in and examined.

JUDICIAL.

26 March 1832.

David Hill, Esq.

233. WHAT is your acquaintance with India?—I went to India in the year 1806; I was employed there more than two years as an assistant collector; I was then in the secretary's office at Madras for 19 years.

234. Was that assistant collectorship in the country?—In the districts. For the last 16 months I was employed at Calcutta, as a member of the finance committee.

235. Your attention is requested to the following passage in your letter of the 30th of last January, which has been laid before this Committee, where, speaking of the want of any species of entail, under our regulations in India, for maintaining the ancient usage of the country, under which its old hereditary estates descended in the line of primogeniture, and were preserved in their entirety, you state that Sir Thomas Munro emphatically recorded his conviction that the evil just noticed was bringing the country to ruin; in what documents are the opinions of Sir Thomas Munro on that subject to be found?—In a minute recorded soon after he assumed the charge of the Madras government; I think in the year 1820.

236. Can you state more particularly what is that ancient usage of the country to which you have alluded in your letter?—Under the usage of the country the ancient zemindaries descended entire to the eldest son of the last zemindar, unless he was incapacitated on any ground, in which case a different member of the family was selected; but the zemindary was not liable to be divided nor to be alienated.

237. Not for his debts?—Not for his debts.

238. What is there in the present practice that has so ruinous a tendency as Sir Thomas Munro supposes?—Under the regulations the zemindaries are now answerable for debts, and are at the disposal of the present holder.

239. By the former usage the zemindar could not dispose of it by will from his eldest son, could he?—He selected a member of his family, and sometimes passed over his eldest son.

240. Without incapacity?—He was the judge, by the ancient usage.

241. By the ancient usage he could select?—He did select.

242. The person whom he thought the fittest?—Yes, the person whom he thought the fittest out of his own family.

243. Among his sons or his relations?—He did not select past his own sons; he would adopt a son if he had none.

244. Do you conceive that the provision which makes these lands saleable for debts should be rescinded or modified?—I have no doubt that it would be very wise if it should, provision being made for the payment of the existing debts; in fact, it was a regulation for the purpose, under Sir Thomas Munro's direction.

245. Does that regulation exist anywhere now?—No, it was not adopted.

246. What

26 March 1832.

David Hill, Esq.

246. What measure would you recommend, by way of preventing the evils of the partition of property among the Hindoos?—I am not prepared to suggest any definite measure; but I entertain no sort of doubt that it would be easy to frame legislative measures that would correct the effect of this continual subdivision of property. Various measures will suggest themselves; the rule of primogeniture in this country, or the French rule of succession.

247. How far could any such change be introduced, without giving an inexpedient shock to the feelings and prejudices of the natives?—I am not aware that it would shock the feelings of the natives; I think it might be framed so as to be made extremely agreeable to them.

248. The principle of the Hindoo law is, that the property shall descend equally among the children, but an exception obtained by usage in the large possessions of the zemindars?—The ancient possessions of the zemindars who existed before we took possession of the country.

249. Was that confined to the large possessions, or did it descend to small properties?—I believe it was entirely confined to the ancient zemindaries, where the chiefship passed by the name of Samistanum.

250. Was it a species of dominion?—In many instances it was, depending on the extent of that possession.

251. And in many cases they had the power of government, had they not?—They had the power of government, and of capital punishment.

252. Those are the possessions you are particularly referring to, as being at the disposal of the proprietor by the selection of one of his sons, but not divisible among his sons?—Those are the possessions; not exclusively large dominions, but possessions held in that way, are what I allude to.

253. Then this usage of the succession going to one of the family, and not being divided, was not confined to these large territories and dominions of the zemindars you have mentioned?—It was confined to the ancient estates which we found subsisting when we took possession of the country.

254. Is that rule of descent that you have mentioned of the ancient zemindaries continued, or has it been changed?—Under the operation of the regulations, the estates are liable for all the debts of the holder, and are at his free disposal.

255. Liable to be sold for the government revenue?—Yes; but the government are extremely reluctant to put that power in force with respect to the ancient zemindaries.

256. Were the ancient zemindaries, before we had power of that country, liable to sale for government revenue?—I imagine that the lord paramount of the land exercised whatever authority he saw fit; he certainly did not expose the zemindaries to sale in the method we should pursue, but he realized the tribute he considered due.

257. These observations you have mentioned have been confined to the presidency of Madras?—Entirely.

258. Is there now any exception from the Hindoo rule of descent, among all the sons, within the territories of Madras among Hindoos, that you are aware of?—None, with such exceptions as the Rajah of Tanjore; but they are some of the princes in some point of view.

26 March 1832.

David Hill, Esq.

259. Within those possessions that are directly subject to the government of the East India Company in the Madras presidency, is there any landed property which is not subject to division among all the children, according to the Hindoo law?—None, as far as I know.

260. In the case of the possessions of the Mahomedans, does the Mahomedan law obtain also in respect of estates in all cases among the children?—The Mahomedan or Hindoo law prevails, according to the religion of the party.

261. There is no exception of the estates of the Hindoos from the ordinary rule of descent, either among Hindoos or Mahomedans?—I wish to explain that, although under the regulations there is no exception, yet I am not disposed to believe that in practice the succession is generally varied.

262. You do not think that in practice it has been uniform?—I do not think effect has been given to the levelling operation of our regulations by the zemindars; our regulations make no distinction between the raj and the private estate.

263. The regulations do not make a distinction between the ancient zemindaries and modern possessions?—No.

264. What do you conceive to be the evil of that subdivision of property?—I should answer, in one word, its levelling operation.

265. Do you think that the land is worse cultivated in consequence of that subdivision of property?—I do not believe it is.

266. Do you not think that it may be better cultivated by reason of that minute subdivision?—I think it likely that it is.

267. Then your objection is, that it goes to the destruction of the aristocracy of the country?—The destruction of the aristocracy, and of the unequal distribution of wealth throughout the community; there can be no such thing as private wealth.

268. Then do you consider that great advantages would be derived in that country from the unequal distribution of wealth?—Certainly, from the existence of different ranks in society.

269. A great many of the ancient zemindaries have been sold, have they not, for government revenue?—Some of them have been sold; but government have been extremely reluctant to resort to that measure, and of late years have not done so in any instance whatever.

270. Then what was the course, if the government revenue was in arrear from the zemindaries, when they have not proceeded to a sale?—The collector undertook the administration of the affairs of the zemindary, and put the zemindar on an allowance, and the surplus was carried to the credit of government.

271. Has that mode succeeded?—It has been attended with a certain degree of success, in some cases with complete success.

272. Do you consider that that mode of administering the estates by a collector was preferable for the interest of government to that of seizing the zemindary, and bringing it to sale?—As far as the recovery of the arrears of revenue is concerned, the result is the same if the process prove successful: as far as the ancient families are concerned, and also the preservation of the peace of the country, the government has a very strong interest in saving the estates from sale.

273. Do

20 March 1832.

David Hill, Esq.

273. Do you consider it to be for the interest of the government in India that the large proprietors should not be destroyed?—I think it is for their interest, and much for their credit too.

274. Within the presidency of Madras, that rank of the proprietors has been carefully preserved as much as the government could preserve it, has it?—Of late years certainly so; I do not recollect any instance in which of late years the government have sold an old zemindary, but there have been such instances formerly, I believe.

275. You are speaking of the Madras government?—Only of that.

276. If there is this abstinence on the part of government to sell these ancient estates for their own demands, what has led to the partition of those estates?—The private debts contracted through the prodigality of the zemindar.

277. Would you then think it right that there should be any law which should prevent the sale of the landed property of any person, to meet the just demands of his creditors?—If it would prevent their prodigality, it would be a great benefit; and it would have that effect, if the creditors could not obtain payment of their debt out of the land. It was intended, in the proposed regulation, that respect should be had to all existing debts on the estates of the zemindars; provision was to be made for liquidating the debts, not by the sale of the zemindary, but by appropriating the revenues.

278. Do you mean that in your opinion there ought to be a regulation generally preventing the sale of lands for debt, or that it should be confined to the large zemindaries?—It was intended all the large zemindaries should be embraced, and provision should be made by which the government should be able to admit other properties to the benefit of the same regulation.

279. Was it to be property generally, or of a considerable amount?—Only landed property of considerable amount.

280. What you would call the landed aristocracy of the country?—Yes.

281. Has it been found that the system of sequestrating the estates under the collector has answered as well for the interests of the public revenue as the system of putting to sale lands of the deficient zemindary?—A former answer I think meets that question. I stated, as far as the revenue was concerned, the system answered equally well; and a great deal better, as far as the interest of the country is concerned. In point of fact, it has answered better: the estates in various instances have been restored to the zemindar after recovering all arrears of revenue.

282. Is it not sufficient that, without taking the power of sale from government, there should be a practice by government to sequester as far as possible, but with a power of sale, supposing the exigency to be such as to require that extreme measure?—The revenue can never be much in arrear; it is not like private debts; it is only one year's collection, for the collector can immediately take possession.

283. Can he always realize the amount from the produce of the year?—He retains possession: the arrears of one year's revenue could always be realized in the two following years; there never would be a hazard of incurring loss.

284. Would there be harm in holding over the zemindar the possibility of a greater loss of his land?—The proposed regulation was, to make a provision estate was to be liable to be sequestrated for a time, until the revenue was recovered ; and the estate was liable to be forfeited for failure in allegiance, but not for arrears of revenue.

285. Would there be no danger lest the knowledge, on the part of the zemindar, that he could in no case of mere deficiency forfeit his land, should render him less careful to satisfy the demand of the government ?—I do not apprehend that any hazard would be incurred on the part of the government as to realizing its revenue. These zemindaries are not heavily assessed to government, and the remedy would always be at hand as soon as the arrears took place.

286. Have you ever considered how far it would be practicable, in the place of the two judicial systems which subsist in India, one that of the Supreme Court, the other that of the Company's courts, to establish one system sufficiently comprehensive to include both the administration of justice in the presidencies and that throughout the provinces ?—I have had some occasion to consider the question, by having perused papers that were written on it by the members of government and Judges of the Supreme Court at Calcutta, at the period when the question was under their consideration.

287. What is your opinion as to the practicability or expediency of such a change of system ?—I can hardly say that I am entitled to entertain any opinion upon the subject ; I consider the object to be extremely desirable, but it was evidently encompassed with a great deal of difficulty.

288. Is not a good deal of difficulty produced by the present system ?—A great deal of difficulty ; which was shown by the papers written on the subject, and which in fact led to the consideration of it.

289. Have you known instances of something like a conflict of jurisdictions ?—Much less of that than might have been anticipated from a consideration of the real anomalies and embarrassments of the present system.

290. Would further consideration enable you to give any ideas to the Committee on that subject ?—I am not aware that I should be able to throw any new light on it : my general impression was, that the object was not impracticable, and that vast benefit would ensue from its accomplishment.

291. What is the species of difficulty you would apprehend from having such a change of system ?—The main difficulty in civil matters regards the introduction of a new class of proprietors ; Englishmen, Europeans, whose rights are to be mixed up with and fastened on to those of the natives. With respect to the criminal jurisdiction, and in some measure the civil also, the difficulty consists more in the establishment of judicatories capable of administering the law.

292. You conceive the greater part of the difficulties which must be apprehended, arise from the circumstance, that in point of fact two systems have subsisted up to the present time ?—I am not aware that much difficulty would arise from that circumstance.

293. By going from one system to another, you have introduced the English law into the presidencies ; and to have one uniform system you must substitute more of the same, must you not ?—There would be some difficulty from the change, but I do not apprehend that serious difficulty would arise from that circumstance. The difficulty is inherent. The difficulty, I conceive, is to form a system of law

26 March 1832.

David Hill, Esq.

26 March 1832.

David Hill, Esq.

law that will suit the rights of Englishmen, Hindoos, Mahomedans, and all other classes of people, so as to be at all reconcileable to those existing rights which they now enjoy. If any respect is to be had for their existing rights, I imagine immense difficulty will be found in framing a system of law on which property, held according to those rights, may be transferable from one class of the community to another.

294. Would not the same difficulty exist in framing a system of law for the country at large, supposing there were a great increased number of European settlers?—I apprehend that would be a serious objection to the admission of European settlers into the country.

295. In what way does it constitute an objection?—It constitutes an objection, in the first place, on the ground that has been now adverted to, the difficulty of framing a law applicable to this new class of inhabitants; secondly, because the new class of inhabitants will belong to the dominant party in the state, and form a class which never can coalesce with the indigenous inhabitants, the present natives of the country: they will be favoured by the Legislature, as they have been since the operation of the opening of the trade has led to the introduction of a greater number of settlers than formerly; they will be favoured by the Government of the mother country; and lastly, I think it would be impossible to establish tribunals throughout the districts which might be occupied by English settlers, competent to administer criminal and (in large and difficult cases) civil law over Englishmen. I cannot conceive that the British Legislature would give the power to a young English gentleman, in one of the Indian courts, to try his countryman for his life, or still more, that that power would be delegated to native tribunals, if they were invested with such a jurisdiction over the natives. I think, even if the local magistrates had the power given to them, they could not exercise it; there would be so much obloquy annexed to it, so much scrutiny of their proceedings, so much jealousy entertained against them, they could not venture to exercise such an authority.

296. Are the difficulties to which you allude in any degree felt with regard to Europeans now settled in the interior; and if not, why not?—They are felt at present, but not in the same degree, inasmuch as there are not the same number of settlers, and as the local tribunals exercise a very limited jurisdiction over Englishmen; higher cases are required to be submitted to the Supreme Court at the presidency, which in many instances amounts to an absolute denial of justice.

297. If the administration of justice, in the case supposed, would be objected to on the part of the European settlers, do you conceive that it would not now be reasonably objected to on the part of the natives who are actually subject to the jurisdiction of the country courts?—Not, I think, in the same degree; but to a very great degree I consider that jurisdiction defective.

298. Then you do not conceive, that for the interests of the natives, and without any reference to the increased introduction of European settlers, the system of these country courts ought to be improved?—Certainly; but the improvements, according to my notions, would render the tribunals still less adapted to the trial of European settlers; for the improvement ought to consist mainly of the transfer of the judicial duties to natives.

26 March 1832.

David Hill, Esq.

299. Could it not be provided that the permission to Europeans to settle in the country should be restricted by the condition, that they should submit to the jurisdiction of the country courts, or submit to their jurisdiction in all but a few special cases, of a very serious nature?—If all cases of a serious nature were excluded from the jurisdiction, the provision, I think, would be extremely incomplete; but I apprehend the consent of the parties would not have the effect of obviating the objections. I think the public feeling would be outraged by the idea of an English settler being liable to be tried for his life by a native of India; and I think gentlemen from this country, such as compose the civil service, if the Legislature gave them the power, could not venture to exercise it; they would shrink from their duty.

300. Would it be possible, that in the case of Europeans, or even in case of natives, juries might to any extent be employed in these country courts?—If a good system of jury trial could be introduced, that would obviate the evil; but I apprehend there would be as great difficulty in establishing a system of jury trial as in improving the present system, for the purpose of rendering it applicable to the trial of English settlers.

301. Do you think, that if native juries were established in India, that they would be apt or otherwise to decide exactly as directed by the judge; do you think that the judge would have more than a proper influence over the jury in respect of their decisions?—In some cases I dare say he would have too much, and in others too little. On the subject of native juries, I beg to refer to my letter before the Committee, of the 30th of January.

302. Do you think that the natives of India could safely and beneficially be entrusted with the exercise of the duties of justices of the peace?—Over the natives; I have not the least doubt, on the Madras establishment, there is a supply of competent natives for the exercise of those duties over the natives.

303. Do you think that they could be entrusted with the exercise of those duties over Europeans?—I think it is very desirable, if Europeans settled in India, that natives should possess that power; I think it would be liable to be abused, but such instances might be corrected.

304. Do you think that the natives could have or acquire a sufficient knowledge of English law to administer that which a justice of the peace does administer to Europeans as well as natives?—I have not the least doubt that they could.

305. Do you think the natives would be gratified by having one of their own countrymen exercising the duties of a justice of the peace?—Throughout the provinces there is little scope at present for such authority; there are very few Europeans; I do not think it would be satisfactory that they should exercise it over their masters.

306. But in criminal jurisdiction, similar to that of a justice of peace, do you think it would be satisfactory to them to have that justice administered to them by a native?—I doubt whether it would at present; I rather think they would prefer the power being in the hands of the European officers of government.

307. You think they would have more confidence in having criminal justice administered to them by Europeans than by natives?—My impression is, that the natives would have much more satisfaction, and that justice would be much better administered, if the European judge had the aid of native assessors. My opinion is, that the European judge is not competent, without the assistance of natives to, ascertain the facts of any intricate, complicated case.

26 March 1832.

David Hill, Esq.

308. You are aware the system of criminal law in India is chiefly Mahomedan?—The Mahomedan law has been so much modified by our Regulations as to exist more in form than in reality. It is now proposed at Madras to discontinue altogether the Mahomedan law in the administration of criminal justice.

309. It is the same criminal law that is administered to the Hindoos and Mahomedans?—The same.

310. In all the courts there is a law officer, the moolavie, who sits and assists the judge in the investigation of matters of fact?—According to the theory of the court, rather in matters of law; the fact is to be found by the English judge, and the Mahomedan law officer is then desired to state how the law applies to the fact, as found by the judge.

311. His futhwa is in the nature of a verdict?—It is rather in the nature of a judgment of what the law is as applied to a given state of facts.

312. Does not his futhwa embrace the fact as well as the law?—It does, because the fact turns on the law: he states what witnesses are inadmissible, and what are not entitled to full credit; but the judge sets aside his scruples, and says what evidence he must admit, and in reality what facts he must take to be established.

313. He sits during the whole of the trial with the judge?—Yes, in serious matters; in minor cases the magistrate sits alone.

314. Did your plan embrace a continual change of persons as assessors, as we in this country have a continual change of persons as jurors, or did you mean that there should be some permanent persons to be employed as assessors, and to be in fact judges?—My views hardly went the length of amounting to a plan; but I was of opinion at the first it would be preferable that the number of those assessors should be limited, till a certain body of assessors were trained to their new functions.

315. Do you mean that there should be a certain number of persons from time to time summoned to discharge the function of assessors?—My idea was, that the country should not return a panel of jurors, but that there should be a very limited number selected by the officers of government, as being likely to exercise the new function in a satisfactory manner in the first instance, and that the system should be extended if the experiment was successful.

316. Your former answers suppose that the system by which the judicial situations in India, so far as Europeans are concerned, are now filled, is to continue; but supposing that system to be so far modified that the persons selected for judicial appointments should be selected from a larger number, from Europeans possibly resident in the country for other purposes, or in any way so as to give a larger field for selection, do you then suppose it would be impossible to provide for some system of justice that could embrace both natives and Europeans in the interior of the country?—It would be impossible to establish judicatories that could sufficiently administer civil and criminal justice over the very limited number of English who under any system could be found in India.

317. Might not much greater care be taken to qualify for judicial situations in India those Europeans who are to fill them up?—I do not think they would much fitter for the purpose if they were qualified in the highest degree; if they could be lawyers, for instance, sent out from England: with the very limited functions they would have to perform, they would hardly acquire the judicial character.

David Hill, Esq.

318. But you speak of young men, just going out as writers, being put in situations where they would have to administer justice to the Europeans, and then they would be jealous of that sort of jurisdiction; might not that evil be obviated if the judges were selected from a somewhat different class, and if their qualifications were better secured?—If there could be as many supreme courts, or courts of the same character as the present zillah courts, then the particular objection that has been in view would not exist; but other objections, much more conclusive against the system, would rise up. The expense would be ruinous, and I apprehend the system of English law, administered over a conquered country, or a country held as India is, would be impracticable.

319. Without supposing such a change of system, and supposing the system in other respects to be the same, might you not, by securing persons better qualified to fulfil the judicial functions, obviate the difficulty of subjecting Europeans to the rule of the country courts?—I do not imagine that the Company's civil servants are particularly ill qualified; I think it is only the circumstances of the situation that render their qualifications so extremely defective as they are; I imagine they are as well qualified as, under the same circumstances, any substitutes for them would be likely to be.

320. You are aware that no means are now taken to qualify persons to discharge the judicial functions of the interior, except the merely mental instruction given to the students at Haileybury?—That, and the preparation they go through for years after their first arrival in India, by mixing among the natives in the discharge of revenue duties, is a better education than could be obtained by more professional means. They are fitter for the duty of country judges than members of the profession from Westminster-hall, distributed over the provinces of India.

321. Do you think there would be no advantage in providing some direct instruction in India for the writers who are to fill judicial situations which they might combine with the advantage of serving in the revenue department?—My belief is, that the idea of a selection out of a limited body, like the civil service in India, is quite impracticable; the effect of it would be to make those excluded from the selection more unfit for the remaining duty. It is quite impossible to select and train up a particular class out of such a body for specific duties; it is better as it is, when they are generally qualified in a proper degree for all the functions they may be called on to perform.

322. You know that in Bengal that division does obtain?—I do not think the Bengal so good as the Madras system.

323. You know there is a training for those who intend to follow the judicial line?—They are confined to that one line; there is not otherwise much training. The Bengal officers, I believe, admit that the local functionaries are more efficient than the Madras establishment.

You mean the revenue officers?—District officers; I do not know that they are so well read in the Regulations.

—IV,

26 March 1832.

David Hill, Esq.

325. Do you think it is the impression in Bengal that justice is better administered under the presidency of Madras than Bengal?—I do not know that it is their impression; it is mine.

326. You think that is very much to be attributed to their being employed, in the first instance, in the duties of the revenue?—I think so, certainly. There is a very admirable short minute of Sir Thomas Munro's, recommending that young men, on their first arrival, should always be employed in the revenue line; and in that he points out the unfavourable impression such minds must take up of native character, where it is exhibited to them only in the light of adverse suitors; they learn nothing of the condition and character of the inhabitants of the country, and have no sympathy with them.

327. Let it be supposed that, instead of appointing a given number of young men to India, a greater number be appointed, and that either in this country or in India the fittest out of that number should be selected to fill situations of importance; do you conceive that any advantage would be gained to the service by such a system?—I do not think the selection is practicable in this country; it is impossible to tell how a young man will turn out. They are at present examined as to general education, as to having received a liberal education, and as to general capacity; beyond that, it is impossible to discover their qualifications. It very often happens that young men who distinguish themselves most in their studies, do not distinguish themselves afterwards as public officers; that their turn of mind is more towards words than things. The selection in India is impracticable, unless young men whose fate has been already decided are to be thrown back on their friends at last. There is only one practicable mode of selection of which I am aware; it has often occurred to me, and has been suggested by me in India, but it is liable to great objection. It is this: the whole public service of India, civil and military, could be thrown into one body, and a selection made out of that general mass in India. My idea was, that every man should be in the army for the first five or ten years; that he should bear a sword; and that after that period, the government, under certain restrictions, should select those who showed talents and other qualifications, such as temper and knowledge of the languages. There are great objections, and very obvious ones to the arrangement; but I am not aware of any other method by which a selection on a large scale could take place.

328. Upon an average, at what age do young men go out to the civil service from this country?—Between 18 and 20.

329. Now, you know that in this country a profession of a young man is chosen; if he is intended for the law, his profession is chosen before the age of 20, is it not?—I think it is so.

330. But might there not be, before they went, a selection; if they do not go till 20, might they not select a particular line?—Young men choose those professions before 20, but nobody can tell if they will succeed in them.

331. You think that principle of ascertaining qualifications by examination could be applied more essentially than it is in this country?—I do not consider any improvement necessary, for the young men are remarkably well educated; improvement has taken place within the last 20 years.

26 March 1832.

David Hill, Esq.

332. Do you mean to say that the system of education at Haileybury has been found to answer?—The system of education has been found to answer; the institution has been attended with a great many disadvantageous circumstances, but not in respect of education.

333. Do you think that, in order to furnish persons with education to discharge judicial functions in India, it might be desirable to prolong their stay in this country beyond the present period, to obtain instruction?—On the contrary, I would send them out young; they otherwise come out with a distaste for banishment and for native character. The great evil to be contended against is a dislike to their duty, to intercourse with the natives, and to separation from their countrymen.

334. In what manner would you obtain a knowledge of the general principles of jurisprudence, in order to qualify them for the judicial office?—As a part of general education, if it is required in a higher degree, and not obtained under the present system. One advantage must be set over against another; on the whole, I think the present system operates more beneficially than that of detaining them in this country for professional education.

335. Retaining them in this country for the purpose of instruction, would necessarily render them less fit to attain a due knowledge of the languages in India before they enter on the judicial functions?—Probably it would in some degree.

336. Do you think they could obtain in this country a sufficient knowledge?—No, I think not.

337. Arriving at a later period, they would have less aptitude for learning the languages of the country?—In some degree.

338. Not very considerable?—I think not.

339. Is there any period after their arrival in India, before which they cannot be appointed to office?—The rules have varied; the rule at present is, that a young man cannot be employed at all in public duty until he has been about two years in India.

340. Is there any other rule as to employment in a judicial situation?—I think there is; but those rules have varied, and when they have remained, they have not always been observed.

341. In whatever manner the qualification of the young man going to India is secured in this country, whether by giving him a certain course of education, or by subjecting him to a public examination, or by uniting both those methods, do you not conceive that if the numbers that went were selected out of a larger number, the amount of qualification in the whole would be better secured than by the present system, which appoints exactly so many as the service in India is supposed to require?—The advantage would not be obtained without paying for it, if you prepared twice the number that was required, or whatever the excess might be; but the advantage which would be obtained would only be that of scholarship, or a better promise on the part of the young men: how far they might possess good sense and talents for the affairs of human life and for public business, with temper, industry and moral qualities, all that would be left still to chance; and if they were not with an idea of being better than their fellows, something would be lost as gained by the selection.

342. ALLOW me to ask you, on the supposition that there was an increased number of Europeans resident in India, do you think it would be impossible to frame a system of judicature which should have jurisdiction over both Europeans and natives?—I have reflected more on the general question, in consequence of my last examination, but I am confirmed in my impression of the impracticability of the measure. I conceive it would be desirable, and very easy to establish a legislature in India upon improved principles, for framing the regulations for the country courts, and on an emergency for framing laws to regulate the proceedings of the supreme courts also, subject to ulterior sanction in the mother country; but it seems to me that, under the most favourable circumstances, the measure of rescinding the whole system and provisions of the law of a community, and framing a new system and new provisions in their stead, would be attended with infinite difficulty, and be exposed to the greatest hazards of omission and collision, which could only be ascertained by experience. I think the difficulty very much aggravated by the complicated nature of the provisions of English law, as being adapted to a highly civilized and very old country. There are other difficulties that are very strongly put in a particular paper of Sir Charles Grey's, relative to points that either have not been settled, or have been settled in contrary ways at different periods and by different authorities. There would be also additional difficulties from our very imperfect knowledge of the provisions of some of the systems of law we should have to rescind and to re-establish, provisions of the Hindoo and Mussulman law. We have a very imperfect knowledge of landed tenures throughout India: they would require to be provided for also. Then there comes the difficulty most present to my mind on a former occasion, which seems to me to be of itself nearly insuperable, the difficulty of establishing a system of judicature capable of administering the law over both European settlers and natives. There is another circumstance which might either be considered as a difficulty or a facility. My impression has long been, that the government of a country held as India is, must exercise a control over the administration of the law. Whether that would facilitate the adoption of the scheme suggested, or be an additional obstacle in the way of it, may be matter of doubt.

343. To what species of control do you advert?—I mean merely that the system of judicature in a country held by the right of conquest, and by the power of the sword, cannot be left independent of control. There is no public opinion to control it, and it may, with the best intentions, operate in a manner totally at variance with the whole end of the government of the country, and with the system on which the administration of its affairs is conducted.

30 March 1832.

David Hill, Esq.

344. Would it be necessary that the judges should in all cases be removable at the pleasure of the government?—My objection is quite of a different nature; I mean, that the judges, in the faithful discharge of their duty—

345. Do I understand you to say, that the judges of every kind should be removable at pleasure?—That is not what I alluded to; it was, that the government ought to possess the means of staying the proceedings of the courts of justice.

346. Do you mean to say that they should have some powers which they do not now possess?—Some powers that they do not now possess.

347. Have you thought at all of the detail or mode in which such a power could be exercised?—My general impression is, that the decrees of the ultimate tribunal ought never to be executed without being previously made known to the government, that they may interpose their authority if they see occasion, if the safety of the state and the general welfare of the community makes it necessary.

348. Do you mean that remark to apply to all judgments of the Supreme Court, or only to such as are of a political character?—By the Supreme Court, I mean the jurisdiction in the last resort. Unless all judgments were submitted, it would not be within the competency of the government to interpose their authority in cases that required such interposition.

349. You proceed on the supposition that there is one system of judicature for the whole country?—My observation is more applicable to that; but it has a certain degree of application to the constitution of things in the King's courts as it now exists. It would only be in very rare cases that the government would find ground to interpose its authority, or be justified in exercising such a prerogative.

350. Has any practical inconvenience resulted, within your knowledge, from the absence of such control on the part of the government?—With respect to the country courts, certainly there has.

351. In what cases do you think it would be within the competency of government to interpose their authority?—With respect to the country courts, I have alluded to cases that have had the effect of exciting rebellion in the part of the country to which they applied.

352. And on great public questions?—On great public questions, or on principles that grew up to be public questions afterwards, and affecting great interests. Sometimes it is a principle established by a decision which, when it comes to be generally applied, produces a great effect on the political system of the country.

353. Could you instance more particularly?—It was settled by a construction of law, that zemindars were capable of levying a certain branch of revenue called mohiturpha, even with the sanction of the government; and by another construction of law, the object of taking confessions of prisoners was completely frustrated. Again, by the execution of legal process, rebellion was at different periods excited in two principalities in the Ganjam district, viz. Goomsoor and Moherry.

354. What, in your opinion, should be the constitution of a legislative council in India, and of whom should it consist?—I am afraid there are no other materials for ~~any body~~ except the members of the government and the King's courts: it ~~was~~ desirable, I think, to give it a broader foundation, if there were the means of doing so.

355. Would

30 March 1832.

David Hill, Esq.

355. Would it be possible to include persons having no connection otherwise with the government, who should be considered in a similar sense as if they were acting on the part of the native inhabitants?—I conceive that there are no parties in India capable of protecting the rights of the natives, as things now are, excepting the public functionaries, who would be represented properly and adequately by the members of government.

356. Will you state any general ideas that you have either upon the functions or constitution of such a council?—I am not aware that I have any further ideas than to express my perfect concurrence in the views adopted by the judges of the Supreme Court on that subject, as distinct from the further question of new modelling the law of England and the law of India, and of framing a substituted system out of them.

357. Do you think it would be open to no objection, to invest the judges with legislative functions?—If it be open to some objection, I think, upon a balance, it would be attended with very great advantage. I think the system at present is totally unfit for the purposes of legislaturc. The acts of the legislature are merely acts of the executive government, and are framed in the same precipitate manner, on the urgency of the occasion.

358. Are not certain of the Regulations submitted to the judges of the Supreme Court, before they are carried into effect?—The Regulations for the good order and civil government of the three presidencies require the concurrence of the judges of the Supreme Courts respectively, and the judges of the Supreme Court of Calcutta have also construed the law to render their concurrence necessary in passing Regulations for imposing additional duties. The Regulations for the country courts require no concurrence on the part of the Supreme Court, but are passed by the sole authority of the Indian governments.

359. What do you conceive would be the advantage of a legislative council?—I think the first advantage would be, that the duty of legislation would be performed in a much more deliberate manner. The next advantage would be, that with the aid of the judges, the principles of law and of justice would be much more regularly observed than they are likely to be by an executive government, which legislates on the impulse of the moment.

360. Do you not also conceive, that in certain cases the delay and circuity of a reference to Parliament would be saved?—My answer had reference to the Regulations for the country courts. With respect to the Supreme Court, there is a third advantage this question points out, which in effect would supply a great deficiency in the present system of legislation: the delay is so great as to amount to an absolute obstruction of legislation. One Governor-General, Lord Minto, at the end of his government, when on his return to England, stated to me, that owing to distance and delay, he found it to be impracticable to obtain legislative enactments on points on which there was not the least question as to the propriety of their being passed.

361. Did the unfortunate disputes which took place at Bombay between the government and the judges, attract much notice in other parts of India?—Not generally through India; not much at Madras, even in English society. At Bombay of course it did, and I believe also in Calcutta, where they have a much greater turn for political discussion.

30 March 1832.

David Hill, Esq.

362. Are you aware whether the question had arisen at Madras, whether the Supreme Court had power to issue writs of any kind into the provinces?—I think not. In argument it may; but practically, I think it had not arisen. There were legal methods by which matters adjudicated by the country courts were brought within the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court: this was by the dextrous management of the practitioners in the Supreme Court, and not by any encroachment of the court itself, or desire to extend its jurisdiction.

363. Is there a disposition in the natives of India to look to the Supreme Court as a sort of defence to them against the government?—At the Presidencies, very likely, as there it is the only jurisdiction; throughout India, certainly not; in the provinces, certainly not: I do not believe generally they know anything about the matter; but where they do, I imagine they only look on it with terror, as an unseen instrument likely to involve them in ruin; I fancy they generally know nothing about the matter.

364. Your observations are confined to the Madras presidency still, are they not?—I have probably taken a wider range in some of my answers, for my means of loose information were gathered chiefly at Calcutta, during my last residence in India.

365. When you say that you should suggest that the judges should have legislative powers, do you mean that it should only be a sort of superintendence over legislative enactments?—According to the projected scheme, the judges were to be constituent members of the legislative council; and the majority of the judges were, in certain cases, to possess a description of veto in the exercise of its authority, in cases where they stated their opinion to be, that the proposed enactment was at variance with the law of England.

366. Would they have time to exercise that judicial legislative power?—As to framing a new code in lieu of the codes to be extinguished, I imagine that would not have time, neither they nor anybody else; but for substituting this mode of passing Regulations for the country courts for what exists now, and also for the passing emergent laws to regulate the proceedings of the Supreme Court, pending a reference to the authorities in England, I imagine they would have abundance of time; probably it would save them time in their judicial functions.

367. You are aware that the idea is entertained by many persons, that the introduction of European settlers into India is not only practicable but would be advantageous; are you able to state to the Committee any general ideas upon that subject?—The advantages to arise from the settlement of Europeans in India have been wonderfully exaggerated: I estimate them very low indeed. The process used to go by the name of Colonization; now, I believe, the principal recommendations of the scheme are considered to be the transfer of British capital, and skill and enterprise, for the purposes of drawing forth the resources of India. I have no conception that any British capital would ever find its way to India: it never did when the temptation was much greater than it can now be expected to be; and the distance of our empire, the uncertain tenure by which we hold it, the alarms continually bringing up as to events endangering its stability, will effectually prevent British capitalists from transferring their funds to India. In that case, there remain only the skill and enterprise of Englishmen. According to my conception, they will be very far behind the natives in most departments to which skill can be applied. There are physical difficulties in the way of their undertaking manual labour, which must exclude them from being agriculturists or mechanics in India ; for I imagine that a farmer who never held the plough in his hand, and who was transferred to a country where the climate, and the system of agriculture and the products of the earth are all different from what he has been accustomed to, could never cope, in point of skill, with the natives of the country. I imagine that the ryots of India are much better husbandmen than European settlers would be. So it would be as to mechanics also. There remains only the object of stimulating and directing the exertions of the natives themselves; an object which falls very far short of the sanguine expectations of the advocates of the system of free resort of European settlers to India, and an object which, under the present system, seems to me to be attained to its full extent, or under the present system admits of being carried to any further extent which may be deemed necessary. Then there will arise objections to the system connected with the bad characters which would go : if none but good characters went, they would be doing harm to themselves, but would not do any harm to India. A man of good conduct and capacity could not injure India ; but my impression is, that as it would be a bad speculation to the settlers, many would forfeit the good character they took out with them, and many others would find their way to India who were bad subjects, difficult to govern, and not capable of conferring any benefits on the country they visited.

30 March 1832.

David Hill, Esq.

368. You are aware that the Company have generally been averse to the principle of exporting British capital to India?—I am not aware of that.

369. At what period was there more facility or temptation for exporting British capital into the provinces of India than at this moment?—When the rate of profit was much higher than it now is, or is likely ever to be again ; when with the greatest ease 20 per cent. might be made in the money market of India, where five or six now is a fair remuneration.

370. Did not the system of the Company, by impeding Europeans from settling in India, oppose obstructions to the introduction of European capital into that country?—Probably the obstructions to the resort of Europeans may, in some measure, have tended to prevent British capital from being transferred there ; but I should think, if the inducements had been sufficient, there were no obstructions that would have been effectual.

371. Are there now Europeans in the presidencies who, if greater facilities were allowed, would engage in agricultural or manufacturing speculations in the interior of the country?—I am not aware that there are, or that there is useful scope for a greater number. I think they would supplant better men in the persons of natives who are now employed in those pursuits.

372. In point of fact, are there not many Europeans at the presidencies who are calling out for greater facilities?—There are a great many more Europeans in India now than can find useful employment.

373. Are they not cut off from a great variety of the employments of the country?—I think not : they are prevented from acquiring real landed property.

374. They are not allowed to move freely in the interior of the country?—As long as they behave themselves well, I think they are. They are not allowed matter of right, but in practice there is no difficulty, so long as they are supposed to conduct themselves well.

30 March 1832.

David Hill, Esq.

375. Do you think that any advantage would arise from conferring upon the half-caste race any rights or privileges which they do not now enjoy?—If they are not allowed to acquire landed property, I think they ought to be. They have a much better claim to consideration than European settlers, for it is their native country; but I am not sufficiently acquainted with any obstructions in the way of their prosperity, to say what relief they require; I think they ought to be placed on a footing with the natives of the country.

376. When you say that in some cases Europeans, if allowed to go into the interior, might supplant the natives, how do you reconcile that statement with your former opinion, that the natives generally will be found to cope successfully with the Europeans in regard to the produce of the interior?—Still I conceive that through the patronage of their countrymen, connection by blood, or by friendship, or recommendation, they would be preferred to situations that might be more fitly occupied by natives. I think that the labours of the land must still be performed by the natives, for the constitution of an European physically incapacitates him from taking the place of the native; but there are higher situations which are at present filled by natives that might be transferred to Europeans, through favour shown to them by their countrymen.

377. Where does the capital employed by the indigo planters come from?—It is accumulated in India exclusively.

378. Then what part in the undertaking of the indigo plantation does the British settler act; is it his skill, or what is it?—I think it is his enterprise in the direction that he has given to the labours of the people; he has found out a commodity which has been profitably raised.

379. Europeans having settled in India, and made establishments there for the plantation of indigo, contemporaneously with that there has been a great increase of indigo, and great good has resulted to those parts of India from it?—This result has followed from the present restrictive system, and has been carried to the utmost extent, so that indigo is now at a price that does not remunerate.

380. At the same time, the average result on the whole has been that of an extended cultivation, and great good to those parts of India where it has been carried on?—That has arisen under the present restrictive system.

381. Do you attribute that to the restrictive system?—Not to the restrictions of the system; the indulgence is quite compatible with the operations of the present system.

382. Do you mean that the law should be made different so as to grant them more indulgence, or without any alteration of the law, would you wish for a further introduction of Europeans into that country?—I believe that little or no alteration of the law is necessary, for the present system is sufficient for the purpose.

383. Are there not other products which might be cultivated with considerable advantage, if they were undertaken and prosecuted by English skill and capital?—According to my conception, Europeans could do nothing to promote the more skilful culture; they could not prepare the ground for cotton. The European merchants at Calcutta have tried the rearing of cotton and sugar with very little advantage to themselves.

30 March 1832.

David Hill, Esq.

384. Has the import of East-India cottonin to this country increased?—It has fallen off very much.

385. Why should not the same principle apply to the cultivation of cotton, as has been found practicable in the case of indigo?—I imagine that the climate and soil are not adapted to the produce of cotton and sugar, in comparison with the other quarters from which supplies are drawn.

386. Did you ever hear the opinion of any manufacturèrs at Manchester, or any person in the habit of importing cotton to Liverpool, on this subject?—I am not aware that I have; I believe Indian cotton is held in very low estimation.

387. What is your idea with respect to giving Europeans power of holding land in India?—I see no possible benefit to accrue from it, and a great deal of embarrassment.

388. If they held the land by the tenure which it belongs to, what embarrassment could be the consequence?—I do not see how they could. If English tenures and Indian tenures were once mixed together, I think that a question already very difficult would be made still more so; and I see no advantage that would arise from it.

389. Would a law authorising them to hold land in India produce any positive mischief?—According to my apprehension, it would. The English settlers belonging to the ruling party in the state, would have influence enough to have laws framed and executed so as to favour them at the expense of the landholders, who belong to the conquered part of the community; and in that way I think it would be a serious evil to India, a wrong committed against the natives of that country, and for no advantage, as far as I am aware. They have the fruits of the land as it is; and, considering what physical disadvantages they labour under, and what political evils would ensue from allowing a free resort of Europeans to India, I think nothing would be gained, and only loss would be incurred by changing the law in that respect.

390. It would not follow that, because they were admitted to hold land, they should be permitted to have an indiscriminate resort of Europeans into the interior?—It is not a necessary part of the system; still it does form a part of the scheme.

391. Have many disputes arisen between the indigo planters and the natives?—There are constant disputes.

392. What is that attributable to?—It is not easy to say; it seems to me very like the condition of society in Ireland, where the law derives no aid from popular feeling; there is continual warfare.

393. Is it owing to the misconduct of the settlers?—That has only an accidental share in it; that is not the root of the evil. It seems to originate in the necessity of making advances to the poor cultivators; and then the produce, which ought to be delivered in return for those advances, is bought up by some interloper, and armed parties are taken out to carry it off by force, or repel the intruder.

394. Does it result in any degree from the uncertainty of the proprietary of the land?—The disputes regarding boundaries are very frequent.

395. Has

30 March 1832.

David Hill, Esq.

395. Has the settlement of the indigo planters been productive of benefit to those portions of India where they are settled?—I have no means of knowing myself, but I have understood it has. The appearance of the country has improved; I believe the condition of the people has not. The land is more highly cultivated.

396. What is the general feeling of the natives as to the administration of justice by the country courts; is it a feeling of confidence in these courts, or otherwise?—Not of satisfaction, certainly; they have been generally felt to be extremely irksome; I mean the zillah courts.

397. What is the nature of the improvements that you would suggest in the constitution of these courts?—My general impression is, that all justice ought to be administered by the natives themselves, who are much more competent to do it, and who would do it on more easy terms than it can be supplied from any other quarter.

398. What is your opinion as to appeals?—My general idea as to that is, that the English officer ought not to exercise the appellate jurisdiction, but when necessary should direct a new trial, transferring the cause to another native judge; that the British superintendent, if he sees fit on any ground, should, without going himself into the merits, order the cause to be tried again by a higher tribunal, in the nature of an appeal, or by the same or another tribunal, in the nature of a new trial.

399. This is a principle recognized already by some of the native courts, is it not?—I am not sure that new trials are in practice with us, which would be a great improvement; I think they are always appeals.

400. Is not there a power of some superior court sending back the case?—I am not certain as to that; I think there is a great defect in the system of appeal generally in India, but I am not lawyer enough to be sure that my notion is correct. The whole evidence is recorded, and the superior court reads over that which the original court has heard, and comes to a conclusion, not upon any particular point of fact or of law that has been excepted against by the losing party, but on the whole merits of the case; the appellate court tries on reading the same evidence as the original one tried on hearing.

401. You have already been asked with respect to the age at which you would send young men to India?—I think I stated before, that I did not imagine it would be an advantage that they should be kept longer in England than from 18 to 20; I think that would not be an improvement.

402. Suppose a system by which young men of apparent talent for the legal profession should be selected, and should have education in the principles of general law in England for a year or two, and then that their knowledge should be perfected in India for a year or two, by a more particular application of the principles of the law of that country; do you not conceive that that would effect a very material improvement in the general administration of justice?—Not according to my ideas. I conceive the improvement that is necessary in our judicial system in India is to transfer the functions of judges to natives; I conceive also that the great want in the office of the public functionaries of the Indian government is knowledge of the native character, language and manners, and a sympathy with with the people among whom they are to live, and a taste for their official duties; I am quite convinced that all these advantages would be forfeited by high legal attainments.

30 March 1832.

David Hill, Esq.

403. Could not the two qualifications be made compatible in a greater degree than they appear to be at present?—The general qualifications might perhaps be attained in a higher degree by greater care in the selection of young men sent out to India; the legal qualifications would be a little or no advantage, according to my view, as I conceive the legal functions ought not to be in the hands of European functionaries; that it would be totally impossible to pay an adequate number, and if obtained, they never could be so competent to perform the duties as natives, who might easily be instructed in them.

404. In what way would you employ Europeans in the administration of justice in the interior of the country?—I would merely make them, in the administration of justice as in every branch of civil administration, the links by which the system of internal administration is connected with the government of the country.

405. Have you at all calculated what would be the reduction of the number of Europeans now employed in the judicial department?—According to my recollection regarding the Madras presidency, there have of late years been about 30 judges in our districts; independently of these judges we have assistants, called registrars, who are totally unfit, in my estimation, to exercise judicial functions, being too young and inexperienced. Instead of having about 30, according to my impression, 20 would be ample, which would make a reduction of one-third.

406. And do you think, besides the saving of expense, the object would be better accomplished?—I am quite convinced it would, and that 30 accomplished natives would do a great deal more than 30 Europeans, such as can be obtained.

407. How would you effect the transition from the present system?—It is in progress already at Madras.

408. Has there been a diminution in the number of persons sent out?—Yes, there has.

409. Do you think that experiment would be injured by the free resort of Europeans into the interior?—I think that this improved system would not be applicable to such a condition of society.

410. You could not carry into effect the proposal of having native judges, if Europeans had a permanent freedom of settling?—I stated that impression on my last examination.

411. And you stated that the younger persons go out to India the better?—Not to that extent; but it is desirable that they should go out young.

412. Suppose they go out very young, do you think it would be best to employ their previous time which they pass in England in studying Indian institutions, or Indian law, or the Hindostanee language, or acquiring general knowledge?—Certainly, general knowledge.

413. If Europeans are to exercise this sort of controlling or superintending power over native decisions, ought not they to learn some general principles of jurisprudence?—I think, if you could get that, without losing anything else, it would be all the better; but I consider it a very secondary qualification for a judge of the land.

30 March 1832.

David Hill, Esq.

414. Have you any further suggestions to offer to the Committee relative to the improvement of the system of judicature in the administration of India?—My views are of a very simple and summary description. I conceive that throughout the provinces justice ought to be administered by natives, who are to be found perfectly competent to the office; that there should be a gradation of native judicatories, one class having jurisdiction over another; and that the operations of the whole should be superintended by British functionaries, who should connect the system of internal administration with the government which rules the empire. I ought to explain, in the way of apology for some of my notions, that I look upon India entirely as a conquered country, which cannot enjoy the advantages of a constitution of balance and check among its several parts, but must be kept under an absolute government. I conceive that all ideas of perfectibility in its institutions are quite inapplicable to the condition of the case. My impression accordingly is, as I have stated on another occasion, that no system ought to be rejected merely because it has a great many faults, as I am quite aware my scheme has. I think our position in India so forced and unnatural, that all our institutions must be extremely defective. They are only enthusiasts, as the advocates of some particular system, who imagine for the time that they have found out one that is faultless. In judging of any one of the plans for assessing and collecting revenue, for administering justice, for preserving peace and good order, we must first weigh its defects against its merits, and then against the defects of any rival plan; the best we shall have in the end will be a balance in favour of what we prefer.

415. Since your system supposes the more extensive employment of natives in the administration of justice, do you suppose that the effect of such an extended employment of natives would be, by whatever gradations, to ultimately throw the government of India into the hands of the natives?—My views on that point are, that the natives ought to be brought forward in the government of their own country, as far as they are capable of being so by their moral and intellectual qualifications, subject only to the security of the empire, so long as we are to retain it. My views would therefore bring them forward certainly in the administration of the affairs of the country, but would not have the effect of placing political power in their hands.

416. Supposing them to improve in general intelligence and knowledge, do you conceive that the effect would not be to endanger the stability of the British power?—If that effect naturally resulted from a more liberal system towards the natives, I think it is a consummation most ardently to be desired. I do not think the measures I have suggested would be likely to place power in the hands of the natives before they were fit to use it. I have no conception that any English statesman, who turns his attention to the subject, would for an instant entertain the idea of keeping India in a debased and degraded state, in order to perpetuate or prolong our empire.

417. On the contrary, you would be prepared to suggest a system which might ultimately have the effect of completing the transition of power from our hands to those of our present subjects?—That I should think a most desirable result, but I see no prospect of it.

418. Do

David Hill, Esq.

418. Do you conceive that there has been a very remarkable change within the last 30 years in the character of the natives and their intellectual acquirements, or at least of those of the natives who are connected with the presidencies?—In some respects; at Calcutta, for instance, there is a marked improvement in the system of European education among the natives; but I should not think their intellectual faculties are much improved; these are shown to most advantage in natives who have generally had little intercourse with English society. The ablest natives are those who do not know the English language.

419. At the presidencies, have they not in some measure learned to criticise the proceedings of government, and to entertain and deliver opinions respecting political matters?—In Calcutta they have to a limited extent, but sometimes it is done by Europeans in their names.

420. That has not been done in the presidency of Madras?—Not more than was done 30 years ago.

422. Did the suits which are here mentioned take place in any particular year?
—No, they were taken indiscriminately.

423. For how many years?—They are from cases tried by the Sudder Court in various years subsequently to 1814; but the four last were instituted at an earlier period.

424. Was the Persian paper from which this translation was made obtained from the records of the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut?—It was compiled from the records of the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut, under the orders of the Registrar. The costs of suit in the several courts are always recorded in their respective decrees, with an order as to the party that is to pay them; and it was from the record of the decrees adopted in the Sudder Court that the different items were taken.

425. Were they taken indiscriminately from the whole number of causes of which there are records in the three courts, since 1814?—They are all cases which reached the Sudder Court after passing through the two subordinate courts, but out out of these they were taken indiscriminately, the object being to get, as far as the Sudder records afforded it, a fair average of the charges of such suits.

426. Is the institution stamp a per-centage on the amount sought to be recovered?—No, not a per-centage, but a sum varying according to the amount or value of the property claimed.

427. Of what are the articles called the miscellaneous stamps composed?—The miscellaneous stamps are those chargeable upon miscellaneous petitions, applications for the summoning of witnesses, and for the filing of exhibits. I do not mean the stamps required to be used on the execution of the instruments that may be exhibited, of which various descriptions must be written on stamped paper, as will be found defined in the stamp regulations; but I now refer merely to the stamp which must be borne by applications for the admission of exhibits in suits.

428. In what manner are the peons paid?—In general by a daily allowance; and the same course is followed in regard to other persons deputed for any local duty relating to the suit. The fifth and corresponding columns include both descriptions of charge for cases in which both have been incurred; and in the first of the cases it is probable that an ameen, or commissioner, was deputed for the purpose of some local inquiry respecting the lands in dispute.

429. Do you apprehend so from the amount?—Yes, from the amount.

430. Are the vakeels' fees also regulated by a per-centage on the amount sought to be recovered, or on the amount recovered?—Up to 5,000 rupees, five per cent. is allowed on the amount or value sued for. When the amount or value exceeds that sum, the fee is regulated by a somewhat complicated calculation, until it reaches 1,000 rupees, the fee on a suit for 80,000 rupees or more.

431. What is the lowest institution stamp in any cause that is instituted in the Zillah Courts?—One rupee.

432. For what sums is that?—For sums not exceeding 16 rupees.

433. What is the highest?—Two thousand rupees, for sums exceeding one lac of rupees.

434. For 100,000 rupees, what is the institution stamp?—One thousand; exceeding that sum, 2,000.

435. By what Regulation is that?—The amount of the institution stamps is fixed by the Bengal Regulation, No. I. of 1814.

436. You have been speaking entirely of the courts subject to the Presidency of Bengal?—Yes.

437. Are the fees of the vakeels of the same amount in the different courts, in the Zillah, in the Court of Appeal, and the Sudder Dewanny?—Yes, they are at the same rate.

438. So that the suitor upon each stage of his cause in the Zillah Court, the Court of Appeal, and the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut, has to pay the vakeels?—Yes.

439. Has he also to pay institution stamps upon each?—Yes.

440. As if it were a fresh cause?—Yes.

441. That is, the plaintiff?—The plaintiff or appellant.

442. Upon what document or proceeding is the stamp affixed?—It is upon the plaint or petition of appeal.

443. Will

Esq.

2 April 1832.

Holt Mackenzie,
Esq.

443. Will you be so good as to state the amount of the vakeels' fees in progression, from the smallest to the largest?—For suits not exceeding 5,000 rupees, five per cent. is allowed. If the amount exceed 5,000 rupees, and do not exceed 20,000, five per cent. is allowed on 5,000, and on the remainder two per cent. If the amount or value exceed 20,000 rupees, and does not exceed 50,000, then on 20,000 the fee is calculated as in a suit for that amount, and on the remainder one per cent. is allowed. If the amount exceed 50,000 rupees, and does not exceed 80,000, on 50,000 a sum is allowed, calculated as in a suit for that amount, and on the remainder one half per cent. is allowed. If the amount exceed 80,000 rupees, 1,000 rupees are allowed and no more, however great the amount or value. These fees are fixed by Regulation VII. of 1814. The fractions of rupees are in all cases rejected.

444. Will you enter into the same detail with respect to the institution stamps?—In suits for sums not exceeding 16 rupees, the plaint or petition must be written on paper bearing a stamp of one rupee. If the suit exceed 16 rupees, and do not exceed 32 rupees, a stamp of two rupees is required. Above 32 rupees, and not exceeding 64, the stamp is four rupees. Above 64 rupees, and not exceeding 150, eight rupees. Above 150 rupees, and not exceeding 300, 16 rupees. Above 300 rupees, and not exceeding 800, 32 rupees. Above 800 rupees, and not exceeding 1,600, 50 rupees. Above 1,600 rupees, and not exceeding 3,000, 100 rupees. Above 3,000 rupees, and not exceeding 5,000, 150 rupees. Above 5,000 rupees, and not exceeding 10,000, 250 rupees. Above 10,000 rupees, and not exceeding 15,000, 350 rupees. Above 15,000 rupees, and not exceeding 25,000, 500 rupees. Above 25,000 rupees, and not exceeding 50,000, 750 rupees. Above 50,000 rupees, and not exceeding 100,000, 1,000 rupees. Above 100,000 rupees, 2,000 rupees.

445. Will you state any other stamp duties to which the parties are subject, besides the institution stamp?—All exhibits filed in court are required to be accompanied with an application praying the admission of the same, and that application must be written on stamped paper; if in the Zillah Court, the stamp is one rupee; in the Provincial Court and the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut, two rupees. So also no summons is issued for the attendance of any witness without an application in writing, praying the attendance of such person, which application must be written on stamped paper, similar to that prescribed in the case of filing exhibits. Further answers, replications, rejoinders, supplemental pleadings, and all agreements of compromise and petitions, are required to be written on stamps of one rupee in the Zillah Court, and four rupees in the Provincial Court or in the Sudder Dewanny. Miscellaneous petitions and applications preferred to public authorities, either revenue or judicial, are required to be written on stamps of eight annas, if preferred to a Zillah judge, or magistrate, or collector; of one rupee, if to a Court of Appeal or Circuit; and of two rupees, if to the Sudder Dewanny or Nizamut Adawlut, or to the Board of Revenue. The appointment of the vakeels to act in each case is made by an instrument bearing a similar stamp. Copies of decrees also are required to be stamped: in the Zillah Court, the stamp is one rupee; in the Provincial Court, two rupees; in the Sudder, four rupees; and all proceedings of the Sudder prepared for transmission to the King in Council must be transcribed on paper paper bearing a stamp of two rupees. Copies of miscellaneous papers are required to be written on paper bearing a stamp of eight annas, or half-rupee.

3 April 1832.

*Holt Mackenzie,

446. Is the expense of stamps a very considerable item in the costs of suits both to plaintiff and defendant?—Yes, I should imagine so, especially to the plaintiff, who pays the institution stamp.

447. How is the amount of the vakeel's fee fixed; is it upon the sum claimed by the plaint, or upon the sum recovered?—Upon the sum claimed.

448. Can the party in any case recover more than the amount which he claims?—I think the judgment includes the amount of interest that accrues pending the suit; but I am not sure.

449. At the institution of the suit, must he not make his full claim?—Yes, unless the case be such as to admit of successive actions.

450. Is it not frequently the case, that on the institution of a suit, a plaintiff, in order to determine the right, restricts his claim either to particular premises, or to a particular sum of money?—I do not recollect any case in which a suit was brought for a certain portion of the claim with the distinct view of settling the right; but according to my recollection, cases have frequently occurred in which the plaintiff has sued for only a part of his just demand in the first instance, intending to sue for the remainder separately if he succeeded.

451. Do you refer to cases with respect to land, or with respect to money demanded, or both?—The cases that I have in recollection had reference to money demands.

452. Then, by the law and practice of the courts in India, may a party sue for a part of his demand, and afterwards commence, having recovered that portion, a fresh suit for the remainder?—I think he may so restrict his claim in the case of a money demand, but not, I apprehend, in the case of landed property, unless the things be distinct, and the interest separate: thus, of several zemindaries held by his ancestor, a plaintiff may, I conceive, sue for one separately from the rest; but he cannot sue for a part of a zemindary.

453. May he sue for a detached part of a large estate for the purpose of establishing his right, and saving the institution fee in the first instance?—Not, I apprehend, if the estate stand in the books of the government as one held by the same title or subject to a common assessment. Thus if a zemindary or a talook, although the parts may be locally detached from each other, or consist of separate villages, a plaintiff claiming under a title applicable to the whole, cannot, I conceive, bring his action for any particular part or village.

454. If the plaintiff recover less than the amount which he claims by the suit, does he get back any part of the institution fee?—He gets back no part of the institution fee.

455. Does the vakeel, although he should recover less, receive the full amount upon the sum claimed?—Yes, upon the amount of the sum claimed.

456. Do those tables which you have produced exhibit an account of the whole of the expenses to which a suitor is subject in the courts in India, in the course of the suit?—No, I apprehend not; they include only the expenses authorized by regulation, and among those there is no allowance for a private agent of any description, although one is almost uniformly employed.

457. Is

3 April 1832.

Holt Mackenzie,
Esq.

457. Is there not in every cause a mookhtar?—Yes, in most cases.
458. What is the mookhtar?—He is sometimes a servant of the family; some of them are hangers-on of the court.

459. Is the mookhtar or the agent different from the vakeel?—Quite different.

460. Does he not give instructions to the vakeel?—He usually instructs the vakeel as to all facts to be proved or allegations made; he has the charge of the documents on which his client may rest his case, and takes the general management of the cause.

461. Are there, besides the mookhtar or agent, other expenses to which he is subject?—I am not aware of any that are necessary or that could be recognized; but I am afraid that there are charges of which we can take no cognizance, and of which it is difficult to know the amount.

462. Will you state what those charges are which you suppose to exist?—I allude to sums corruptly taken by the native officers, as stated in my former examination; and I have no doubt that the mookhtars often fraudulently charge what they do not expend.

463. Is there any officer or person in the court who taxes the costs of the different parties?—It is the duty of the sheristadar to see that they are according to regulation.

464. In addition to seeing that the costs are according to regulation, is it his business to see that they have been paid?—It is his business to see that the proper stamp is used, in so far as the law expenses are charged in the form of a stamp duty; also, that the amount of the vakeel's fees has been deposited, and its receipt acknowledged by the treasurer.

465. Is it his business to see that the expenses charged for peons and ameens, and for the maintenance of witnesses, have been paid by the parties?—The peons are generally, I believe, paid through the nazir, the officer who superintends the execution of all processes of court.

466. Does the sheristadar ascertain, in fact, that the expenditure has been made, and that it is according to regulation?—Yes; such I conceive to be his duty.

467. How is the value of land sued for estimated in order to fix the institution fee?—In the case of land paying revenue to government, the value is taken at three times the amount of the government jumna or assessment, if it be in the provinces of Bengal, Behar, Benares, or that part of Orissa which is under the permanent settlement; if the land lie in the Ceded and Conquered Provinces, or in Cuttack, which are liable to variable assessments, the value is taken at the amount of one year's assessment; in suits for land held exempt from payment of revenue to government, the value is assumed at 18 years of computed annual rental; in other cases at the estimated worth of the thing sued for.

468. Do the duties of the vakeel include the duties both of counsel and attorney in this country?—He is expected to do all such acts as may be requisite in the court relatively to the suit until judgment be enforced; but the greater part of an attorney's duty is generally done by the mookhtar or private agent of the party, or by the party himself.

3 April 1832.

*Holt Mackenzie,

469. Does the vakeel receive his instructions either from the party or from his mookhtar?—Yes.

470. Is there any official person employed to instruct him, similar to a solicitor in this country?—No such class is recognized; and though there are many who are in fact professional mookhtars in the courts, they are not legally entitled to interfere in the suits, nor is any part of their charges included in the costs adjudged to the successful party.

471. Does the vakeel in general communicate with the parties directly, or does he in general communicate through a mookhtar or agent?—In most cases, I imagine, through a mookhtar.

472. The mookhtar, or agent, is not recognized in the court as having any authority in the suit?—No; he is not allowed to appear; the party must appear, either in person or by one of the constituted vakeels of the court.

THOMAS FORTESCUE, Esq. called in and examined.

473. WERE you in the civil service of the Company for a number of years?—T. Fortescue, Esq.
Yes, I was, for about 23 altogether.

474. Under what presidency were you employed?—In Bengal.

475. Will you state what situations you held generally; in what departments have you been employed?—Both in the revenue and the judicial.

476. How long in the revenue?—For a period of eight or nine years or more, in charge of five different collectorships, three in the Lower Provinces, and two in the Upper Provinces; secretary to three separate revenue commissions, one for the Ceded Provinces, one for the province of Cuttack, and one for the Ceded and Conquered Provinces. In the judicial department, judge and magistrate of the city of Patna, judge and magistrate of the district of Allahabad, subsequently officiating judge of the court of circuit and appeal for the division of Benares; then secretary to government in the territorial department; and lastly, civil commissioner for Delhi.

477. Will you state what, from your knowledge and experience, you consider to be the respective rights of the zemindars and the ryots, in respect to the land which they possessed under the Bengal Presidency?—It is a subject which very early interested me, and I endeavoured to acquire an insight into their respective character and relation. My belief is, founded upon the best inquiry I could make, that the ryots have certain qualified rights in the land which they cultivate; that those rights have been acknowledged by the Mahomedan government, both as to law and past practice; and that though the word ryot is a term of different significations, yet it does, with respect to a certain description under that denomination, give a determinate right.

478. Will you state what you consider to be the qualifications to which that right is subject?—The right is an hereditary right to raise the produce of the soil receiving of that produce a certain admitted portion, the remainder of which belong to the government. This opinion goes back to and is founded upon the Mahomedan law, as brought at the period of the conquest, into Hindostan. India having been conquered by force of arms, the Mahomedans applied their law of conquest to it, which authorizes them to deal with the conquered country in different ways. For instance, they can make the inhabitants slaves, and carry them off; they may replace them by others; or they may leave the inhabitants on the land, and impose upon them a certain tax, denominated kheraj, or revenue. There are other modes also by which the conquerors may proceed: they may divide the country among themselves, and impose a certain demand upon those who share, which is known by another name, and amounts only to a tithe. In the instance of the law of conquest, as applied to India, it is the same as that followed in Syria and Egypt; namely, that the original inhabitants were allowed to remain on the soil, and rendered subject to the tax particularly called kheraj, which thus transferred the property absolutely from the conquerors to the conquered inhabitants. The terms made use of in the Mahomedan law, both with reference to the inhabitants and to the property in the cultivator, are terms of the most positive and definite meaning. The inhabitants are called by the term "Ukul," which means those resident upon the lands; the cultivators are styled "Rub ool uruz," or masters or owners of the soil; and the term property is denominated "Milik," importing the most indefeasible right, and they have the power of disposing of it in any way they choose. The Mahomedan lawyers, in discussing the rights over the conquered land, in no instance mention any other claims to it than those of the cultivator and the emaan, or sovereign of the country; but in speaking of the rights of the cultivators, they define the proportion of the produce that is his, and that which is the emaan's, or governor's, by saying, that the cultivator has a right to so much as shall secure him and his family a comfortable subsistence till the approaching harvest, together with seed for the next crop; beyond that the remainder becomes the government's. There is a person to be appointed on the part of the governor, who is to be careful to collect from the cultivators according to the above data, and who is to be paid from the public treasury; nay, further, certain enumerated descriptions of produce are said how to be taxed.

2 April 1832.

479. Do you consider that at the time of the Mogul government in India, there was any intermediate class between the government and the ryot?—Certainly; but that class was not a proprietary class, generally speaking; exceptions of course there were; that class consisted of persons who were in possession of the privilege of arranging for the realization of the revenue from these cultivators, and forwarding it to the public treasury. In many instances they got grants or immunities from the ruling power in consequence of their influence, or the utility or the necessity of their official station, or from various other causes; but they did not become proprietors over the cultivators, with power to turn them out, nor did they attain to rights over those in their holdings or zemindaries, beyond that of taking from them the government share of the produce.

480. Was there any regular proportion of the produce to which they were entitled?—The proportion of the produce was to be regulated as I have just described.

481. Was there any fixed proportion of the produce which you could say the ryots were subject to pay to government?—I should say that the demand upon the ryot was always grounded upon this: that it was never to exceed that which should leave a sufficient competency for him and his family to subsist upon, and enough to enable him to cultivate.

482. Do

3 April 1832.

T. Fortescue, Esq.

482. Do you conceive that there was in practice any class similar to that which composes the class of zemindars in India now?—In practice, as we have given interpretation to the word zemindar, certainly not; and we find that the further we travel from the lower and older provinces up to the newer, the right of the ryot becomes more and more definite and tangible.

483. Have not the zemindars of Bengal for a long time assumed to themselves the rights of proprietors?—Yes; after the promulgations at the period of the permanent settlement.

484. Do the zemindars, in practice, upon the expiration of a lease, raise the rent upon the ryots, according to what they consider the value of the land to be?—They do, most frequently.

485. How long has that been the course of practice for the zemindar to act as the proprietor of the land in Bengal?—Since the permanent settlement, his power has been allowed to be nearly absolute; that is to say, applications made by the ryots have proved most generally fruitless, for the establishment of their qualified rights; the courts have not had the means of settling the rights of the ryots, or coming to a knowledge of them.

486. What do you mean by saying that the courts have not had the means?—They have not been guided by the regulations to a knowledge or sufficient estimate of the qualified rights of the ryots, as I have stated; for a ryot is not a tenant at will, nor is he a tenant for life, nor by lease, nor by any naturally expiring term by time, nor liable to be ousted by a higher bidder, as in this country; therefore such meaning or sense cannot be described by the use of the term ryot, whose holding is superior to these; though, at the same time, he is not an absolute proprietor, for he has not the entire right to what he gets. He has a right to the soil, to raise the produce of it, and to a proportion thereof, before the government's share or remainder.

487. Is his right hereditary?—His right is hereditary.

488. Then, according to the former law of Hindostan, he could not be dispossessed?—According to the Mahomedan law, he could not be dispossessed. His possession was fixed, and his interests or rights, with those of the government, secured by law.

489. Is not the Mahomedan law very much modified in the regulations?—Not in that respect; it has never been touched.

490. Do you consider that at this moment, under the regulations, the zemindar has no right to dispossess the ryot at the expiration of his lease, and to take another ryot as his tenant?—The term lease, as used in this country, in respect to the relation between a proprietor and the inferior, does not apply in India, because the ryot is a proprietor; he objects to take a lease from one that would assume that character over him.

491. Does he take a lease?—He is often now compelled to do so for his own advantage under the regulations; his rights are overlooked.

492. So that he is, according to the law and practice as obtaining in India under the regulations, compelled to take a lease in order to insure his possession of the land?—He is not absolutely obliged to take a lease, but it is strongly encouraged, and it is his interest under the regulations that he should do so : there has been much change in the regulations on this point.

3 April 1832.

T. Fortescue, Esq.

493. Do you consider that by the law as it now obtains in India, the zemindar has a right to raise the rent upon his tenant, and if the tenant will not pay the demand, to dispossess him?—I think by the spirit and intent of the regulations, he has not; and certainly by the Mahomedan law he has not, if the rent he raise trench upon or go beyond the data I have given.

494. By the Mahomedan law, could the government exact a greater quantity of the produce in proportion to the improvement of the land, provided he left sufficient for the maintenance of the cultivator and his family?—Yes, the government could; none but the government and the cultivator have a demand upon the soil.

495. Is the payment of rent in proportion to the produce, under the presidency of Bengal?—It is very much lost sight of; the government interfere little or nothing between the cultivator and the zemindar.

496. Do you consider the zemindar to have been originally the mere collector of the revenue of government?—Originally a person appointed to arrange and collect the revenue from the cultivators; his own profits were indirectly derived from various sources. The term zemindar has often been, and is still, applied to a person neither considered to be nor claiming the whole proprietary right in his zemindary.

497. Had he no per-centage?—It does not appear that there was an exact per-centage, but there was an allowance which was tantamount thereto, called "nankar;" "nan" meaning literally bread, or an allowance for subsistence. The persons denominated zemindars, did, many of them, possess property in a village, and whole villages too.

498. In point of fact, did he originally derive a certain profit from his situation as zemindar, out of the produce of the land?—Yes; but distinct from and without infringing the property right in the soil and its produce, as I have described, belonging to the ryots.

499. You consider, that under the Mahomedan law, the zemindar has no proprietary right in the land?—Generally speaking, it is so; in many instances he is a part proprietor with the rest of the cultivators, and has a village or villages cultivated by his own family or hired persons.

500. He is a participator in the produce of the land?—Yes, as I have just described.

501. You mean by the Mahomedan law, not in practice?—There is this distinction in the zemindaries; that in Bengal the zemindar is now held to be a large proprietor of estates, whereas in other parts of the country he is but a small real sharer or proprietor in them. The name is often made use of by and to a person dealing directly or indirectly with the government for his holding; and being the proprietor of it really, or not the proprietor, it is indiscriminately applied, without any consideration of locality, or correct notion of right.

502. Do you consider that the zemindar has not a right to raise the rent of the ryot?—He has a right to regulate his receipts from the ryots, according to the rates prevalent in the pergunnah and neighbourhood; beyond those rates he has not, nor beyond what shall leave him a secure subsistence.

3 April 1832.

T. Fortescue, Esq.

503. Do you consider that the law under the Mahomedan government is now modified by the regulations?—I think what I have stated was and is the Mahomedan law, and should be the just practice under the regulations. The persons termed ryots object to take leases from those placed over them by the term zemindar, because that implies a proprietor above them, whereas they consider themselves the proprietors, and it would be lowering themselves to do so; not that they dispute the right of the government to take the proportions due from them, but that they deny the right of any individual between them and the government as affecting their inherent prescriptive right of remaining upon and raising the produce of the property they cultivate. The Mahomedan law gives them liberty to dispose of that property as they choose; at all times, however, that property is subject to the demands of the government.

504. But of all that is not subject to the demands of the government they consider themselves the proprietors?—The Mahomedan law establishes their right first; it proceeds upon that principle. The instructions to their agents are to regulate their settlement with the cultivators, so as to leave them what I have described, and to bring the remainder to the public treasury; that is the Mahomedan law, and it never has been touched. I consider that the regulations have, in spirit and intent, always reserved the rights of the ryots, though they never defined them; but upon the data I have mentioned, they might build what would make the cultivators a contented and happy people, which is not now at all the case.

505. You do not conceive that there is any exact definition of the rights of the ryots by any regulation?—Certainly not; I believe also, that if the pergunnah rates for regulating the demand of the government from the ryots had, at the period of the permanent settlement, been recorded and fixed, the property of the ryots in the soil ere this would have been very valuable, and have rendered them most comfortable; such rates were recorded in some instances, and have been appealed to.

506. You think it is a defect in the permanent settlement that they did not fix and ascertain the exact rights of the ryots?—Certainly.

507. In point of practice now throughout Bengal, does not the zemindar, when he thinks that he can obtain a higher rent for his land, dispossess the ryot, and let it to a person who will give him a higher rent?—He cannot do so avowedly by aid of the regulations; but practically he can, though it is not intended that he should; the ryot is impotent, and cannot secure himself in the enjoyment of the qualified right I have endeavoured to describe.

508. Can he not maintain his right in the Zillah Court to keep possession of his land upon the terms that you have mentioned?—If the terms that I have mentioned were by the regulations acknowledged as a principle or basis which the courts might assume, he could establish his right; but there is no such data or ground given to all or direct them; they have no points or precedents as it were set before them.

509. Do you think that there is no regulation sufficiently explicit to enable a judge to decide any case where there is a contest between the zemindar and the ryot, in favour of the ryot who chooses to maintain his possession without agreeing to an increase of rent upon the part of the zemindar?—I do not think that the regulations regulations generally are sufficiently clear to enable him to establish that point; some particular cases are provided for.

3 April 1832.

T. Fortescue, Esq.

510. You say that the zemindar has no power by the regulations to increase his claim upon the ryot, but that he does it practically; how does he manage to do it?—The regulations have never intended that any rights which the ryots possessed should be violated; they have constantly and generally expressed that; but they have never distinctly specified what those rights are that they wished should be upheld in the person of the ryot, nor have they, in consequence of the want of that definition, given the court sufficient means of determining disputes of that kind between the two parties.

511. In point of fact, do you mean that those regulations have not been enforced in the way that they were meant to be enforced?—Yes, with respect to the ryots.

512. And that, in point of fact, the zemindar treats the ryots as a proprietor does his tenants in this country?—Yes, very nearly so.

513. Has there been any case brought into the courts in which a ryot has attempted to establish his claim?—Many; I have not myself had to do with any, but I know, from conversing with judicial officers on that point, that they have felt the impracticability of protecting the ryot, from want of any sufficient data by which to regulate their decisions.

514. In those cases where you state the zemindars come before the court, supposing the ryot to be able to establish his right, as derived from the Mogul government, and to show that the spirit of the regulations was, that that right should be preserved, would not that court listen to that right, and be likely to support it?—I think the courts would, and should be bound to uphold it.

515. Then the difference is, whether they have that right or not?—My opinion is, that the unaltered Mahomedan law gives them that right, and that if the government and the courts had gone back to look for principles to regulate their conduct, they would have found that there were only two persons, the government and the ryot; that the ryot had a certain proportion of the produce, and that the remainder was the government's. There has, in my opinion, arisen a great deal of difficulty and injustice from not following that course.

516. Supposing that it is acknowledged that there are only two classes, the government and the ryot, is it not possible that the government might transfer any portion of that right to other persons?—Certainly; but no more than its own remaining right. The Mahomedan law of conquest, and immediate practice, has already declared and settled the cultivator's rights.

517. But the zemindars, you say, exercise a greater right than the government possess?—The zemindars endeavour to become what the ryots ought to be considered as.

518. Do they act thus independently of any grant from the government?—The regulations declare them to be the zemindars or proprietors of the soil, reserving however, in the most explicit manner, the rights of all classes of cultivators.

519. By what regulations is that declared?—By the regulations of Lord Cornwallis in 1793, and also by the minutes of his Lordship recorded anterior to that.

3 April 1832.

T. Fortescue, Esq.

520. Was it a total departure, when he made those regulations, from the system which had been previously adopted?—When he formed the regulations, the government was satisfied that there were rights in the ryots, but what they were they knew not precisely. If they had adverted to the Mahomedan law of conquest, and its application to India, they would have found, in my judgment, a basis upon which to build.

521. Do not you consider that those regulations of Lord Cornwallis were settled, after considerable deliberation and inquiry, by persons who had knowledge upon those subjects?—Certainly, very great; but at this moment there are as many, and perhaps more, who upon research are disposed to favour the rights of the ryots, and to consider that the zemindars have none such as the regulations now give them.

522. Is it not a point upon which there is a very great division of opinion in India, the respective rights of the zemindar and the ryot?—Yes; but not so great as formerly, I believe.

523. Among persons well informed upon the subject?—Quite so.

524. You say that the spirit of the regulations has not been acted up to in that respect?—I think so.

525. You say that the spirit of the regulations has not been acted up to, therefore you suppose the spirit of those regulations to have been of that description as to acknowledge the right to be solely and simply in the ryot; but does that appear to be the case?—No.

526. Therefore the spirit of the regulations is not such as you have described?—What I mean is, that the intention of those who made the regulations, and of the regulations, was, when they constituted the zemindars such as they did, that the ryot's rights, undefined as they were, though evidently believed to exist, should be upheld; and that by the Mahomedan law and practice the ryot was entitled to possession, and such portion of the produce as would make him comfortable and easy, and secure the cultivation of the land, which is a right superior to most tenures. The spirit of the regulations does not go so far as the question implies; for if so, it is presumable they would have done more than guard by declaration that (the ryot's rights) of which they possessed not the requisite knowledge to describe minutely.

527. Supposing he neglected to cultivate the soil, what course would government take?—That is provided for by the Mahomedan law, which says with regard to it, that if a man does not cultivate, the governor or some person on his part shall, if he is unable to cultivate, advance him the means of so doing. If he neglects to cultivate, or abandons the soil, still the government have a demand upon him; and why? because he had the power of giving or lending it or hiring the land to whom he chose; and being therefore the proprietor, he is still liable to the claim of the governor.

528. Do you consider that the hereditary right of the ryot has been rejected, or in fact altogether done away by the regulations passed by Lord Cornwallis in 1793?—I think by the practical operation of the regulations they have been nearly effaced, except in some special cases provided for. Travelling to the Upper Provinces from the Lower, those rights are found to be much more respected and clear, clear, particularly so in Bundelkhand and Delhi; in short, where the government have least interfered, there the rights of the ryots are more marked in the soil.

3 April 1832.

T. Fortescue, Esq.

529. You do not consider that by those regulations of Lord Cornwallis the hereditary right of the ryots has been all extinguished?—No; there are particular instances in which that has been the case.

530. Are there particular parts of India in which that hereditary right is acknowledged more than in others?—Very greatly: passing from Bengal upwards into the Ceded and Conquered Provinces and Delhi, it is more distinctly marked.

531. Do you think that the judges in those provinces would decide in favour of the hereditary right of the ryot, if it came in question?—Distinctly so in many parts; I would not say in all.

532. And in the lower parts of Bengal the rights of the ryot have been put a stop to?—Almost, with certain exceptions.

533. And the zemindar possesses the same power with reference to his estate, that the proprietor in this country does?—Yes; very nearly so practically.

Jovis, 9^o die Aprilis, 1832.

The Right Hon. ROBERT GRANT in the Chair.

JAMES O. OLDHAM, Esq. called in and examined.

9 April 1832.

James O. Oldham,
Esq.

534. WILL you state in what capacity you have served in India?—I was Collector of land revenue in the Ceded and Conquered Provinces; and after that, Zillah Judge of Moradabad; and last of all, Judge of Circuit at Bareilly.

535. When did you go to India?—In 1798 I went, and in 1823 I left it.

536. Were you employed in the administration of the police?—I had the charge of the zillah of Moradabad; the police of zillah was entirely under me and my assistant for seven years.

537. Have you turned your attention to the question how far it would be possible and expedient to employ natives more extensively than at present in the administration of justice in India, and if so, be pleased to state the result of your consideration upon that subject?—I do not think that the employment of natives to a greater extent would be attended with any beneficial result in the police. I think the further the native police officer is from the European superintendent the more likely he is to abuse his office. That perhaps some of the situations are not sufficiently well paid. I think that many of the police situations are not paid agreeably to the responsibility. If you put men, whether Europeans or natives, in situations of great responsibility, the pay should in some measure correspond. I think that the jurisdictions are, generally speaking, too extensive for one European; that they should be subdivided; and young men, as soon as they get out almost, who, under other circumstances, would be hunting and shooting and idling their time, if employed, and feeling a responsibility, would become valuable servants within a year or two after they went out. I think that the whole of those who are now detained in Calcutta doing nothing should be sent up to the different zillahs, and immediately employed under the collectors or judges, where they would gain a knowledge of the languages, and of the customs and habits of the people by intercourse with them. Prior to their being nominated to any situations of trust, where they had any great responsibility in themselves, they might be examined as to their knowledge of the languages, &c. But they might be very useful long before that, when they are employed under an active watchful magistrate or collector, who will know exactly how far to avail himself of their qualifications for the public service. And I would not have the judge or collector bound by any law to employ them in any particular manner, but leave it to his discretion, agreeably to the ability and the assiduity which he may discover in them.

9 April 1832.

James O. Oldham,

538. Having said that some of the situations in the police are not sufficiently well paid, do you mean that they are not sufficiently well paid to induce the more respectable class of natives to become candidates for such offices?—I do; or at least if they become candidates, it is with an intention of peculating.

539. Should you make the same remark as to the employment of natives in judicial situations?—Yes, I should certainly, but particularly the Mahomedan law officers, who sit with the judges of circuit in court, and give their decision whether the fact is proved or not, as a jury do in England. Those officers have 200 rupees a month, and when on circuit, are probably obliged to spend 150 of it; and should they lose their situations they may starve, for there is no such thing as a pension for them to retire upon. Now, those men might be pensioned without any material sacrifice by the government, after a fixed period of service, because of their age, being usually upwards of 50 years of age before they get those situations, and they are not a long-lived race.

540. Do you mean to say generally that the judicial situations occupied by natives at present are not sufficiently remunerated?—Yes, I do. I have pointed out the law officers of the courts of circuit, and I may add to them those of the zillah courts.

541. Can you give some general idea of the scales of emolument; are they not matters of regulation?—No, I think they vary, and are fixed by government, on special representations. I dare say I am not inaccurate in stating that the law officers of the courts of circuit have 200 rupees a month; that the law officers of the zillah courts have 80 and 100; but then, again, the law officers of the zillah courts have a stated allowance upon their decisions; they decide causes to a certain extent.

542. By the law officers, you mean the Hindoo pundit, and the Mahomedan cauzees or moolavies?—Yes.

543. Are their salaries pretty much upon the same scale?—The law officers in the court of circuit are all Mahomedans, there are no Hindoos. There is a pundit belonging to the court, who merely answers questions as to law in the court of appeal. The same judges sit in both courts; no pundit accompanies the circuit, therefore when an opinion on Hindoo law might be required, reference would be made by post to the sudder station, or the opinion of the zillah pundit taken.

E.I.—IV.

K

544. In

9 April 1832.

James O. Oldham,
Esq.

544. In the court of appeal, which is composed of the same judges as the court of circuit, is there not for the trial of appeals in civil cases a Hindoo pundit attending on the judges?—Yes, in civil cases, but he has not a seat in court the same as the Mussulman law officer has, but he is in an apartment in the same building, and questions on Hindoo law are sent to him in writing, and his answer forms part of the record of the civil case.

545. Then the Committee are to understand that the Hindoo law officer forms no part of the attendants on the court of circuit?—No, certainly not; he remains at the sudder station, while the judges make the circuit. But any question on Hindoo law that requires an answer is referred to him, or the zillah pundit. The criminal law is Mahomedan.

546. The civil cases are not tried on appeal upon the circuit at all?—Oh no; the circuit is for the gaol delivery.

547. Will you state more fully your ideas as to the mode of training young writers in India to be employed in judicial situations?—I would, in the first place, insist upon their being with the judge of the zillah in court during the hours that he sits daily, for at least, we will say, the first twelve months, or with the collector, it would be just the same thing if the collector is making a settlement, by which he will get more practical information in twelve months than he would in ten years at a college in Calcutta, or any where else. By a settlement, I mean assessing the revenue of government on the land, which yet remains to be done in the Ceded and Conquered Provinces. I consider that the collectors so employed have a most laborious duty; that young men, if sent immediately up to them, instead of being kept at the College, might very soon be made useful, and certainly, as I have said before, would learn more in twelve months than they would in ten years elsewhere.

548. But with respect to the other provinces, what would you say?—I think the plan would succeed in every province of the British Empire.

549. It is understood that the education at the colleges in India is confined to the instruction of the native language?—Yes. Such was the case in 1801.

550. Do you think that there would be any use in having a system by which some of the general principles of law should be communicated to the young men who are to practise judicially?—Our courts are more courts of equity than law, and the less of law the better, I should think, generally speaking. I think if a man has the opportunity of gaining a general knowledge, it might be certainly of great benefit to him to attend public courts any where, either in this country or Calcutta, or any where else; and am of opinion, with regard to the native community, that the less of law and the more of equity they have the better.

551. What age would you have them go out, generally speaking?—I think about 18, not before.

552. And should you conceive that their education, previously to their going out, should be of a general nature?—Yes.

553. Not directed to any particular department which it was supposed they might pursue in India?—They have opportunities of hearing, I believe, lectures on jurisprudence, of attending and getting information on every subject at the College in England.

9 April 1832.

*James O. Oldham,
Esq.*

554. From your observation, should you say that the young men employed in judicial situations are competently instructed?—I answer to that (it is a general question), I have met with many young men that I should say were extremely well qualified; there may be exceptions.

555. You do not think there is any such deficiency as requires particularly to be provided for?—No, I certainly do not; and particularly the young men who go out in the present day; perhaps many years back there was some lamentable deficiency.

556. Do you think the College at Haileybury has answered a good purpose in that respect?—Oh, certainly, as far as regards general knowledge.

557. Do you not think that a young man having received a liberal education, and among other things, having been versed in the general principles of jurisprudence, would be more fit to enter upon a judicial function in India, than a person who had not the advantage of that education?—I certainly must admit that, inasmuch as all knowledge enlarges the mind.

558. But in general, perhaps, you think that the time which would be devoted to this sort of previous education might be better employed in obtaining a practical acquaintance with the manners and customs of the natives?—Yes.

559. But could he not obtain that after having gone through a certain degree of study of the principles of jurisprudence in this country?—There is nothing to prevent that, certainly.

560. Do you think that by those means his entering upon service would be protracted to any inconvenient period with respect to acquiring the language by his remaining in this country for the purpose that has been mentioned?—Perhaps not, supposing him to go out at 19 or 20, instead of 18.

561. Or 21?—No; we are getting on too much then; 19 or 20 perhaps.

562. You would not recommend any young man going out to India for the civil service, either judicial or revenue, to go out at a later age than 20?—I think not; from 18 to 20, I should say.

563. You say that on the ground, that past that time the language is not so easily acquired?—Yes; and that before that time their minds cannot have been sufficiently cultivated.

564. Do you think that the language is better acquired before or after 20, generally speaking?—Oh, decidedly before.

565. Should you say that from experience?—Yes, certainly. I have in my eye now several young men who came out very young, and who made such proficiency, that those who were a few years older felt a good deal ashamed and annoyed at being classed with them, although these were men perhaps of better sense and judgment than these lads, but had not the quality of attaining the language.

566. In speaking of the employment of natives in the courts of justice, do you think that it would be possible to employ them to judge alone, or must it be under the supervision and with the assistance of Europeans?—We dare not trust them alone.

567. Do you think that by giving the suitor an appeal from the judgment of the native judge, the native judge might not be trusted?—He is already trusted in a measure now, I think to the extent of 100 rupees. An appeal lies from the decision of the moonsif to the judge, and the judge either decides it himself, or again refers it to his registrar or to the sudder aumeens.

9 April 1832.

James O. Oldham,

568. The sudder aumeen is a superior officer to the moonsif, is he not?—Yes; the sudder aumeen remains at the principal station; it is a situation that the moonsifs look up to. The aumeen has a better salary, and tries original suits to a greater amount than the moonsif, upon which he has a per-centage.

569. In practice, did you find there were many appeals from decisions of native judges in these cases of small amount?—I think the decisions of here and there one or two of the moonsifs were uncommonly good; of those whom I had to look after.

570. Those that were appealed?—Yes. Although the judge usually makes them over to the sudder aumeen or to his registrar, yet he should occasionally take up a few from each to see in what manner they get through their business. Considering them as well educated for natives, they are sure to know almost on which side right and wrong lays, being on or near the spot where the cause of the action arises, and knowing the customs: if honest, they would be almost invaluable.

571. If they could be trusted they would make the very best judges, would they not?—I think undoubtedly they would, because they are not wanting in ability; but then the acutest are in general the most corrupt.

572. Do you think there is no hope, by establishing better pay, of trusting them more than at present, by giving them a sense of responsibility, and possibly by courting something more of the public opinion of the country than there is at present, that they should be improved for the purpose of the administration of justice?—Yes, I do think that selections might be made from among them, I would say from amongst the Mahomedans.

573. Why do you draw a distinction in favour of the Mahomedans?—I can only speak from my own observation of those who have been under me, and I have found them more trust-worthy than the Hindoos.

574. With this opinion, do you think it possible that the native Mussulmen might be more employed in the administration of the criminal law of India?—I think a selection might be made here and there, which would have a very happy effect in which case, the individual selected should be entitled to a pension after a fixed term of years of approved service. This provision for old age might be the means of ensuring honesty in the conduct of many whose principles might otherwise not have been proof against temptation.

575. Do you conceive that the employment of natives in judicial stations, either civil or criminal, would attract the confidence of the natives themselves, if they were not liable to the supervision of Europeans?—No; I do not think a native could trust a native; I should say, certainly, generally speaking, that they would prefer an European jurisdiction.

576. Should you say generally, that among the natives there is a want of regard to character?—Oh, most decidedly.

577. Is there any hope that that will be remedied, or in what way is that to be hoped?—The state of feeling among the natives affords little hope of a change.

578. Then

9 April 1832.

James O. Oldham,
Esq.

578. There has been an idea started, that an increased employment of the natives, and showing them more confidence, would have the effect of reducing the qualities for which credit is given to them?—In a certain degree I should think it might have a beneficial effect. Although they might receive a higher pay, and be put into situations of greater trust, yet I would not remove them far from European superintendence.

579. Do you think it would be safe or politic to employ the natives as justices of the peace in India?—By no means.

580. From what cause do you think it would be unsafe or impolitic?—That they would abuse the trust, and make it a source of emolument to themselves, and that in such a manner that it could not be easy to detect them, for they would not absolutely seize on a man's person, but they would let that man know that he may be called before the police unless such sums were paid, and let him know it in such a way that it could not be traced out; and the very circumstance of a native of any rank being called before the police is a disgrace; it is considered so among themselves. But what I am saying now refers entirely to the Ceded and Conquered Provinces; it may not be the case to that extent about Calcutta or in Bengal generally. But the last 17 years that I was in India I was in the Ceded and Conquered Provinces, and am speaking only of those provinces.

581. Do you mean that your answers generally have reference to those provinces?—I should say all, except to such questions as have been put to me regarding European writers and so on. I give no opinion as to Bengal, Behar, or even Benares.

582. Should you suppose if Europeans were to enter the country in greater numbers, either as residents or settlers, that means could be found for any system of justice adapted to that state of things?—The present jurisdictions there must be reduced greatly; jurisdictions might be made of perhaps one-fourth of the present extent if there were European settlers.

583. The extent of country you mean?—Yes, the extent of country, supposing the zillahs now to be of as great extent as they formerly were, having myself had charge of zillahs of 140 miles and upwards in length.

584. Would that change involve the increase of the number of European judges of all kinds, or European justices of peace?—Why, yes, I think it must, for a young man of three or four and twenty could scarcely be trusted, I think, in such a jurisdiction where Europeans would have to come before him.

585. Do you think that in any case Europeans could be safely made subject to the jurisdiction of a native judge?—I should be very sorry to see it; I do not think that a native judge, generally speaking, would have firmness sufficient to act in that capacity where Europeans were concerned; and if he had, then on the other side of the question, I think it would have a bad effect.

586. In what way?—It would serve to depreciate the character of the Europeans in the estimation of the natives. I am now talking of the Ceded and Conquered Provinces. There are no Europeans there but the Company's civil and military officers, except perhaps here and there half-a-dozen camp followers, who are treated as sutlers of the camp.

587. Aro

April 1832.

James O. Oldham,
Esq.

587. Are there no indigo planters there?—There was not one in either of the districts I had charge of; there was not an European indigo planter in them all. I believe that there might have been one or two after I left.

588. Does your objection to the employment of native judges apply to the police as well as to the civil and criminal law?—Certainly, to both branches.

589. Then, in point of fact, the administration of justice would be much more expensive in case of the introduction of European settlers and increased numbers?—Undoubtedly; to say double would be short of the consequent increase.

590. Do you think there must be a very great change in the state of feeling of the natives and of the Europeans, before the native agency can be employed as judges where Europeans are suitors, or where they are the persons tried?—Certainly, that is what I think.

591. Do you think that natives, in civil cases between natives, might be employed to a very considerable extent in point of amount, liable to the supervision of a European judge?—Perhaps the amount might be increased, that is, the sudder aumeen might decide to a greater amount, and I say that, because they are immediately under the personal observation of the judge himself, and if there was any great rascality going forward in the way of bribery, it must come to the knowledge of the judge through some of the people about, before it went to any great extent. Now, those who are employed at a great distance I should be loth to trust.

592. Then, generally, you think that even the presence of the European judge, or at least his vicinity, is of some importance?—No doubt, if he is a man who does his duty well, as I hope I may say the greater part of those with whom I was acquainted did; yet there may be exceptions.

593. Do you think very low natives could be employed to discharge properly the function of juries in either civil or criminal matters?—I have answered that question already in my letter to Mr. Villiers of the 28th of October 1831, and I beg to give that as my answer: "With regard to the employment of native juries, punchayets and assessors in civil or criminal trials, I am most decidedly of opinion, that the measure would be attended with great evil; the influence and authority of the zemindar is such, that individuals could not be met with sufficiently independent to give a just decision, when that decision should be at variance with the zemindar's interest. This I mean generally. The inhabitants of cities and large towns would form exceptions, but even from them I should not expect impartiality."

594. Do you think that for the purpose of forming a jury on circuit, the neighbouring towns could supply a sufficient number of persons to be jurors?—I think that men of sufficient ability may be found who, if not at all acquainted with the parties at issue, might give a just verdict; but corruption is so widely extended amongst them that the prisoners or their friends would, by some means, influence the jurors. Being therefore not independent men, their decisions could not be relied on.

595. When you speak of the influence and authority of the zemindar, will you explain to the Committee why that should prevail in all the ordinary cases that might be supposed to occur between individuals with respect to their private affairs—or

9 April 1832.

James O. Oldham,

or in criminal matters?—I would say, in nine instances out of ten of the cases that occur out in the villages, the zemindar has an interest one way or the other. Of the zemindar's authority and influence I will give you one instance, in a case that occurred to me. A murder had taken place in the district of Moradabad, about forty miles from Moradabad. The thannadar, as is usual in those cases, proceeded to the spot to make an inquest on the body, and to inquire for witnesses of the fact: he took the evidence of one witness, who deposed he was present at the time the murder was committed, relating circumstantially the number of sword wounds given, the distance he stood from the deceased, &c. I mean merely to state that the most minute particulars were given by this man as an eye-witness; the man was summoned before me as a magistrate, for his evidence to be taken again. The man's name, as usual, was asked; he gave his name correctly. His father's name was asked; he gave that correctly. He went through the whole circumstances verbatim, as reported before the thannadar; but when I began to ask him a little more, and cross-questioned him a little, he lost himself quite, and seeing that I suspected there was something that there should not be, and followed it up, the man having no answer to give, at last said, "The whole of the evidence I have given is by order of the zemindar. I am not the real witness, but am come to personate him by the zemindar's orders." "Well," I said, "don't you know you are liable to seven years' transportation for a thing of this kind? here you are taking a man's life away by swearing this." To which he said, "What can I do? the zemindar told me to do it." Now, when matters are in that state, would you have a jury of such men?

596. Would that be at all a just sample of the feelings of men of that class?—I have no doubt but what there are numerous other instances of it; and I have no doubt that a large proportion of those men acting or immediately near their zemindar, and depending upon him for their food, &c. would in that manner personate any body else at the instigation of the zemindar.

597. Do you think the authority of the zemindar capable of suborning persons to act in that manner?—I do not much doubt that, whenever their interest is materially concerned. I think at that time Mr. Ross was the circuit judge, and when he came round (I was then magistrate), he sentenced the man to six or seven years' imprisonment for it.

598. The man who had sworn?—Yes.

599. In the criminal courts, the moolavie, or Mahomedan law officer, hears all the evidence, does he not?—Yes, he does in the court of circuit.

600. And does he find the fact?—Yes, he does; he says "guilty," or "not guilty."

601. Does that finding or verdict of the Mahomedan law officer include both law and fact?—The futwah of the law officer declares whether or not the fact is proved, and states what the Mahomedan law may be; but the judge decrees the punishment according to the regulations of government, substituting imprisonment and stripes with the corah, for the sanguinary awards of amputating limbs, &c.

602. Upon a charge of murder, does the moolavie find the verdict of "guilty," or does he find specially the fact?—No, "guilty," or "not guilty." As soon as ever the whole of the evidence is taken, the judge makes it over to the moolavie for his

9 April 1832.

James O. Oldham,
Esq.

his futwah, which is his decision of whether the fact is proved, and how far perhaps the whole may not be. Sometimes, if the judge agrees with him, and it falls short of death or transportation for life, the judge records his opinion, sentence is carried into execution; if the judge disagrees with him, then the whole trial goes down to the sudder nizamut. But if the law officer finds that the fact is not proved, the prisoner is released immediately, unless indeed the judge, as an extraordinary circumstance, sees there is something improper, and takes on himself the responsibility of sending it down; but generally speaking, the prisoner is released immediately.

603. Now, supposing the charge is murder, and the facts given in evidence do not support that charge, is the verdict of the Mahomedan law officer confined to finding the facts not proved, or may he go on and say, that the facts do not amount to murder?—Certainly, he may say “homicide.”

604. He may say it does not amount to murder, but to a lesser description of crime; “homicide?”—Yes.

605. If the Mahomedan law officer finds the prisoner guilty, the judge must either pronounce sentence, or he must refer the whole matter to the sudder, must he not?—If he finds him guilty, yes; if it is a minor offence, anything short of transportation or death.

606. He has no power to reverse the verdict, or futwah as they call it?—Oh, no. I have never met with but one man who would write his futwah and give his judgment without trying first indirectly to obtain the opinion of the European judge.

607. Do you think that that feeling would operate full as strongly, if not more so, if there were juries in civil or criminal cases?—Decidedly so, if they were neither under the influence of the zemindar, nor biassed by their own interest in favour of either party.

608. When you speak of the law officer attempting to ascertain your opinion before he gave his own, do you suppose that that was owing to a distrust of his own judgment, or a desire to win your favour?—No distrust of his own judgment; certainly not.

609. Purely a desire to win your favour?—Exactly so.

610. But when, as of course you resisted that attempt and compelled them to decide, could you trust their judgment?—Certainly; and I have met with one man, as I mentioned before, who never tried to ascertain the opinion of a judge, but gave his opinion.

611. Does the judge put the questions in general to the witnesses?—The native sheristadah or moonshec, who writes the examinations, puts the usual preliminary questions, and will continue to go on until the judge takes it up himself, and puts questions: and perhaps in little thefts, and matters of that kind, the judge will let the sheristadah go on, as a matter of course, with a great deal of it; but in matters of moment the judge will take it up sooner.

612. Does the law officer put questions?—The law officer is at liberty to do it, and perhaps occasionally may, but it is seldom that he does; the law officer is at liberty certainly by the regulations to do it.

613. Does he suggest questions?—I think he rather suggests than puts them.

614. Now after the judge has taken up the examination, does the sheristadah afterwards interfere at all in the examination?—The judge, when he leaves off

9 April 1832.

James O. Oldham,

will sometimes say, go on, and ask as to such a question; sometimes the examinations are so very voluminous, and some of the evidences very material, and others not so.

615. Is the whole taken in writing in civil as well as criminal cases; are the whole proceedings taken down in writing?—Why, with regard to civil cases, the vakeels, who are the counsel, do not plead viva voce, they give in their plaint and answer, reply and rejoinder. They bring it written into court, so many days being given between the receipt of each for them to answer. The evidence of the witnesses is also taken by the sheristadah in presence of the vakeels, and signed by the counsel on either side. If they were only signed by the counsel on the side of the plaintiff or the defendant, there might be a doubt about their being admitted by the other party, and therefore they are signed by both.

616. But, pray, are the vakeels of either party not heard on matters that occur during the pendency of the cause from time to time, what we should call interlocutory matters?—I cannot say they are not heard, but they do not plead in the manner they do at the bar here: they may find occasion sometimes for an observation, but not at any length.

617. No presenting a petition, for instance, to the judge?—Undoubtedly they may, and do present petitions constantly. After the answer has been given, the reply or the rejoinder, something may have escaped them, and then they will give in a petition; requesting that evidence may be taken on that point, so as it is given in before it comes to the hearing.

618. And they may be heard viva voce on the merits of that petition?—No, not heard viva voce, if it is given in beforehand in that manner; but occasionally during the trial they will be heard to a certain extent, if they have anything to bring forward in proof that the proceedings are at variance with the code of Indian laws.

619. Anything to show the proceedings are at variance with the regulations?—Yes, anything to that effect.

620. Are they heard willingly by the judge when they apply to be heard upon those particular points?—I have never been in any other man's court than my own, and therefore I can only speak to what I have done myself as judge of circuit or appeal. I do not recollect any complaint of that nature against the zillah judges.

621. You heard no complaint about their being prevented addressing the court on any point that was thought necessary?—No, it is not customary for them to address the court, but I have never heard any complaints of their being prevented.

Jovis, 12^o die Aprilis, 1832.

The Right Hon. ROBERT GRANT in the Chair.

IV.
JUDICIAL.

12 April 1832.

Hon.
W. Leslie Melville.

The Honourable WILLIAM LESLIE MELVILLE called in and examined.

622. To what department do you belong?—The Bengal Civil department.

623. In what capacity did you serve?—I was for a short time in the Commercial and Salt departments, and I have been occasionally employed in the Revenue, and in some degree in the Political department, but I have served principally in the Judicial line.

624. In what judicial situation were you?—I served as Registrar in different districts; and in the year 1817 a rebellion broke out in the district of Kuttack, and I was employed with others in endeavouring to restore order in that province. I was afterwards Judge and Magistrate of the district of Ghazeeepore, and I subsequently officiated as Judge in the court of appeal and circuit of Moorshedabad; and before leaving India in 1830, I was Commissioner of Circuit under the new arrangements at Bareilly, for one year.

625. Has it occurred to you that the judicial system, as administered by the Company's court, is susceptible of any improvements; and if so, name them?—The administration of criminal law seems to me much more satisfactory and perfect than the administration of civil justice. It is efficient in declaring punishment, in trying offenders, and more particularly in securing the innocent; but I am of opinion that the trial of offenders was better conducted under the courts of circuit than under the establishment recently created of resident commissioners. Some of the reasons for this opinion I stated in what is technically termed a Circuit Report, or Report written at the conclusion of a half-yearly sessions for Bareilly, and dated in October 1830, at the time I filled the office of commissioner there. I am further of opinion that the variety of characters and of views prevailing among the successive judges of circuit, with jurisdiction over an extensive range of country, freed them from local bias, while it tended to keep the whole of the subordinate district establishment alive and active. On the other hand, the more limited and local jurisdiction of the commissioners contributes, I think, to narrow and dull what falls within reach of their influence. Much immediate inconvenience has been occasioned too by suddenly placing officers whose lives had been passed in the revenue department, to preside in courts of circuit and regulate the conduct of experienced magistrates. The administration of criminal law under the system devised by Lord Cornwallis, has always appeared to me, as well as to other much more competent judges with whom I have communicated, to be the most successful part of our administration. Our civil courts are less successful, principally, I suppose, because the transactions coming before them for investigation are, as in other countries, much more difficult and complicated. Two or three circumstances appear to me to have contributed also to render

12 April 1832.

Hon.
W. Leslie Melville.

render the civil courts less efficient than the criminal; one is the absence of check over inferior courts, from the want of a sufficiently rapid decision of appeals. The case of a criminal must be decided in a few months, and any error of the judge is promptly rectified by his superior; but a civil trial, however erroneous the decision, generally lies over for years untouched, and before it is examined the subordinate judge who has decided it is removed, the interest is passed, and the dry correction of the error is inserted in a fresh decree. In criminal trials, again, the highest court (or nizamat adawlut) holds English proceedings, and records in that language its opinion upon the case, pointing out any particular error committed in the conduct of the trial; while in civil suits there is generally no such powerful check. It must be admitted, too, that the constitution of the courts of appeal, and the perpetual liability of the judges to be interrupted in the middle of the civil causes before them by the return of the period for making the circuit, very much impeded and injured the transaction of civil business, and tended to throw much indirect power into the hands of the native officers. Much attention has been paid to the maintenance of proper tribunals and the use of effective processes, and many sound and right decisions are certainly given; and yet I am afraid we have failed considerably in giving a prompt restitution of things unjustly taken away or withheld. There seems to me a particular deficiency in the simple, distinct, uniform and constant recognition of rights, and in the effective enforcement of them: the rules, principles and precedents which should guide our decisions are not sufficiently adhered to; a succession of judges in the same court or in appeal take different views and pass a variety of orders; the case swells and too often exhibits a mere mass of confusion, from which it is no easy task to select the materials necessary for arriving at a correct conclusion. There are scarcely any laws, correctly so speaking, defining rights; we are obliged to frame our decisions either with reference to general principles or to the decisions of the sudder dewanny adawlut, or chief civil court, five or six volumes of whose reports have been published. I should conceive that they compose a valuable foundation on which a system of law might now be commenced. The recent arrangement, which will draw many valuable officers from all concern in the administration of civil business, to employ them as commissioners of revenue and circuit, seems to me to have further tended to deteriorate the administration of civil justice; but so lately as November last I understand that a civil court has been established in the western provinces. The measure appears to be a very judicious one, but I am not yet informed of the details. Perhaps I may be allowed to recall attention to an observation of the late Sir T. Munro, that the constitution, by which I understand the system of administering law and collecting revenue, should not be altered in India without authority from England: although in many respects the Indian government cannot be left too free to act on its own responsibility, yet I incline to think that such changes as these should only be undertaken after that deliberate and cautious inquiry, and with that prospect of stability which a full and anxious discussion has so great a tendency to promote.

626. You have alluded to the employment of natives in the judicial administration; do you conceive that they might be more extensively employed than at present, or that any arrangement might be made so as to render such a change of system efficient with respect to the administration of civil justice?—I observe that by a recent alteration in November last, the powers of the moonsiffs are considerably increased. I am generally favourable to the extension of the power of the moonsiffs, but in regard to the exact mode in which the recent change will operate, I am not yet sufficiently informed of the details to be able to judge.

2 April 1832.

Hon.
Leslie Melville.

627. Is there less complication in pleading in criminal causes than in civil, in your courts?—Pleading in criminal causes we have none.

628. Are your proceedings ore tenus?—Entirely; there is simply a charge inserted in the calendar, and that charge comes to trial without any pleadings.

629. In civil causes are your pleadings conducted in Persian?—They are.

630. Do you think that a desirable system, being in a language foreign to all parties, plaintiff, defendant and witnesses?—It is at the same time generally and familiarly studied by every native of education or rank in India. I have never paid any particular attention to the point myself; but partly from its having been so long and generally employed, and partly owing to the structure of the language, I believe it is found a more convenient and shorter mode of expressing evidence than the other native language of India.

631. Should you think the gradual substitution of English advisable?—The gradual substitution of English I should certainly think very desirable, but it must be very gradual. Our Bengal provinces are not at present prepared for such a change.

632. What is your opinion as to the substitution of the language of the country in which the court may be held, instead of a foreign one, such as Persian is in most parts of India?—I am not aware that much practical inconvenience is experienced from conducting the pleadings and from writing the evidence in Persian; some facilities exist, for the reasons I have already assigned.

633. Is an interpreter employed?—No; in point of fact, ordinarily speaking, the evidence which is delivered in the vernacular language, whatever it may be, of the witnesses, is seldom written down in that language, but it is translated into Persian by the writer, as he goes along. The confessions of prisoners, by a special order, must be taken down in the language in which they are delivered.

634. What means has the prisoner of checking the evidence taken down in a language he does not understand?—Certainly not much; it is the duty of the presiding judge to take care of that.

635. Do the prisoners commonly employ vakeels or agents of any kind to conduct their defence?—No; I do not recollect any instance of that kind.

636. Is the evidence, when taken down in Persian, ever read over afterwards, or translated and read over to the prisoner?—He hears it when it is delivered, and if any question arises regarding it, of course it would be translated and read over to him.

637. But it is not the common practice to do so?—It is not the common practice to read it over in the language in which it was delivered, after it has been taken down.

638. In what language is the judgment delivered in criminal cases?—The judgment is delivered, in fact, by the issue of a warrant; an intimation is given which

12 April 1832.

Hon.
W. Leslie Melville.

which is written in three languages, English, Persian, and the language of the country.

639. Is the judgment written down?—The warrant is issued by the judge holding the circuit in those three languages, in the heavier class of offences; and intimation is given accordingly to the prisoner of the punishment to which he is sentenced, in his own language.

640. How is it in the lighter cases, misdemeanors for instance?—The magistrate intimates, in the prisoner's own language, the sentence passed on him.

641. Is that sentence formally reduced into Persian also?—The sentence is also reduced into Persian, although no warrant is issued. By a recent rule, a copy of the sentence passed on each prisoner is furnished to him, in consequence of some mistake having occurred.

642. Is that copy in his language?—It is in the vernacular language.

643. Does the judge who tries the prisoner commonly understand the Persian, in which the evidence is taken down?—I should suppose so.

644. Those judges are at the present moment commissioners of revenue, are they not?—I am not quite sure; I think I have heard that in the western provinces the office of commissioner of circuit and commissioner of revenue had been separated very recently, the duties being found too laborious.

645. How was it at the time when you were in India?—At the time I was in India I held the office of commissioner of both revenue and circuit.

646. Is a prisoner allowed to cross-examine a witness?—Certainly.

647. Is the evidence always delivered within the hearing of the judge in criminal trials?—In the heavier class of offences, in trials before the court of circuit, the evidence is always delivered in the hearing of the judge. In misdemeanors and the smaller offences, the evidence is taken down in the presence of the judge; but the cases are so numerous that it is found impracticable that he should superintend taking down the evidence in each separate trial. The parties, witnesses and prisoners, therefore, are brought up before the magistrate after the evidence has been taken down, and such questions as may be necessary to verify the examination and elucidate the case are then asked by the magistrate. The evidence which is taken down in Persian, is read over in Persian to the magistrate.

648. In the case of a prisoner wishing to cross-examine, does he cross-examine the witness in the presence of the judge, or does he cross-examine him in a corner of the room where the evidence is taken down?—More usually while the evidence is being given in court.

649. Do all the witnesses constantly attend before the magistrate at the time the evidence is read over?—Uniformly.

650. But then the evidence is read over in the language which they do not probably understand?—Certainly; and that is the object of the questions put by the magistrate, to verify the evidence.

651. Is the evidence taken down in the language of the witness, or only in Persian?—Only in the Persian; but in the province of Bengal I think it is occasionally taken down in Bengalee.

652. And is that Bengalee in writing turned into Persian by any officer of the court?—It is. It was found, to the best of my recollection, that those local dialects were 12 April 1832.

Hon.
V. Leslie Melville.

were so numerous that there was considerable difficulty in understanding them. In the serious trials which were referred to the court of nizamat adawlut, or superior criminal court in Calcutta, circular instructions were issued directing that all evidence or depositions not taken down in Persian should be accompanied by a translation into Persian.

653. Is not the Bengalee the language of a great nation?—It is; but on the borders there is a different dialect.

654. Is not Bengalee the language of many millions?—I should think so, certainly.

655. Is it not the only language in general which those millions speak?—The much larger proportion in every village of Bengal understand nothing except Bengalee.

656. But rarely any that understand Persian?—No. In any considerable town there are always two or three schools for Persian.

657. What class of cases would those be in which the evidence was not taken down within the hearing of the magistrate?—Misdemeanors principally, and occasionally cases of petty theft; the magistrate is occasionally empowered to sentence to two years' imprisonment for certain offences. In these the evidence is taken under the magistrate's superintendence.

658. Is it not so universally?—I can only speak of my own practice.

659. In your own practice were those cases always taken in your own hearing?—Generally, I should say, the evidence was taken in my presence.

660. How often are the assizes for the trial of crimes of a graver description held?—The rule is that the sessions should be held half-yearly, but sometimes owing to various causes much longer intervals elapse.

661. What is the longest interval that you have known to have elapsed?—I think, in some of the trials that came before me at the sessions that were held immediately before I left India in 1830, some of the cases had lain over for 18 months, and I rather believe there were a few which had remained untried for nearly two years.

662. How frequently had the sessions been held within those two years?—There have been one or two sessions, and the one in which I was engaged occupied several months.

663. Then there is not a complete gaol delivery at each sessions?—The particular cases I have referred to occurred on the introduction of a new system and a new tribunal; and thus, I suppose, some delay and embarrassment arose.

664. Previous to the introduction of a new species of tribunal there was a complete gaol delivery each sessions?—Certainly; complete in the ordinary acceptation of the term, the cases of all the prisoners committed were disposed of unless special reasons occurred for postponing the trial.

665. Is the punishment of death frequently awarded in India?—Much more rarely than in England.

666. Can that punishment be carried into execution without the sanction of the Nizamut Adawlut?—Certainly not.

667. What is the usual mode of punishment in India of crimes of a serious description?—Imprisonment, frequently accompanied with hard labour on the public public roads; often with banishment, and sometimes with corporal punishment. Some few offences are punished by public exposure.

12 April 1832.

Hon.

W. Leslie Melville.

668. Is mutilation discontinued?—In every case in which mutilation is prescribed by the Mahomedan law, it is commuted to imprisonment.

669. What is understood by banishment?—Partly being removed to a different part of the country, remote from the residence of the prisoner's family; partly transportation beyond sea, as to Prince of Wales' Island or Malacca, within certain limits prescribed by Act of Parliament.

670. What change in the judicial system will be expedient and practicable, in the event of a materially increased influx into the Indian provinces of European settlers or residents?—I have never much considered that question, but I conceive our institutions and laws ought to be framed with reference to the great mass of our population; for the millions and not for the tens. I do not see any good reason why a few British subjects should have special laws, special tribunals, and special protection for themselves; as in other foreign countries, they ought, I conceive, to content themselves with an administration of justice inferior to that of this country. For a special purpose they choose to sacrifice a portion of their rights, and I do not conceive that they are entitled to complain of their bargain.

671. Then you conceive it necessary that they should be amenable to the law as administered in the provinces?—Yes.

672. Do you think that British subjects would feel any indisposition to be tried in criminal cases according to the rules of the Mahomedan law?—If it is supposed from the question that the Mahomedan criminal law is now administered by our courts, I conceive that not to be the case, it is so entirely modified to correspond with the provisions of the codes of Europe.

673. Is it modified by the regulations?—Yes.

674. Is the Hindoo law administered in any criminal cases in India?—No, not in any.

675. Then the criminal law which is administered in India is the Mahomedan law, unless in cases where that Mahomedan law is modified or qualified by the regulations?—By the regulations in some degree, also by practice and precedent, and what is termed circular orders from the superior court.

676. Are those circular orders mere explanations of the laws then enacted?—They are.

677. Have they in fact any power to change the law at all?—Certainly not.

678. Must any modifications or qualifications of the Mahomedan law be made by the authority of the government by regulations?—Alterations must be so made; that is provided for by Act of Parliament and by our regulations; explanations may be conveyed in circular orders.

679. Do you think there would be any objection that a British subject should be tried by the Mahomedan law, modified as it is by the regulations?—No; generally speaking, no particular objection occurs to me. Perhaps I ought to explain that I conceive that the power of legislating on the subject should belong to the local government, and should not be reserved to the authorities in this country.

680. Upon

12 April 1832.

Hon.
J. Leslie Melville.

680. Upon a criminal trial, does the Mahomedan law officer sit with the judge?
—Yes.

681. Does he hear all the evidence?—Certainly.

682. And he by his futwa finds whether the fact is proved or not?—Yes.

683. Then he is somewhat in the nature of a jury in that respect?—Yes, excepting that he does not decide the cause; whatever his finding may be, it does not bind the judge.

684. Can the judge decide contrary to the finding of the Mahomedan law officer?—If the trial is held before the court of circuit, in the event of the judge differing from the Mahomedan law officer, a reference is made to the court of Nizamut Adawlut or superior criminal court in Calcutta. If a difference of opinion occurs in that superior court, I think reference is made to another judge, and it is competent to a majority of the nizamut adawlut to pass any sentence without reference to the futwa.

685. If the futwa has acquitted the prisoner, can the nizamut adawlut direct punishment to be awarded against him?—By Section 4, Regulation XVII. A. D. 1817, and by Section 7, Regulation IV. A. D. 1822, the nizamut adawlut appears to have the power.

686. If the judge does not object to the finding of the Mahomedan law officer, in all cases except capital, he may immediately award punishment on the finding?—Yes, excepting where the punishment is either capital or involves imprisonment for life. Perhaps I ought to explain, that it is in the power of the Governor-general in Council to dispense with the sitting of the Mahomedan law officer altogether, in any case which it appears more desirable to conduct without his interposition. The law, Regulation I. 1810, originated I think in consequence of a quarrel between two French gentlemen at Chandernagore, which terminated in the death of one of them in a duel; the inconvenience of having a Mahomedan law officer to pronounce in such a case was felt, and the enactment was passed.

687. Was that a general regulation passed upon the happening of this very particular case?—My impression is that it arose principally from that circumstance; I had nothing to do with it; probably other cases occurred.

688. Is it now the law, according to the regulations of the government, that a Mahomedan may be tried by the English judge without the presence of the Mahomedan law officer?—My impression is so, under the regulation above quoted.

689. Do you think the law, as you have stated it, of criminal trials in India, under the regulations, such that there would be no objection that a British subject should be exposed to that mode of trial?—No material inconvenience immediately occurs to me, and if any arose I conceive it would be easily rectified by the government by another regulation. As far as I am capable of judging, I should say Acts of Parliament are found wanting in the pliability and adaptation to the actual wants of the people which is desirable in legislation.

690. May a regulation of government be passed in matters relating to the administration of justice, operating upon all persons in India, excepting British subjects?—Yes. Perhaps I ought to mention that many provisions in Acts of Parliament relating to India, passed within my own recollection, have been found inoperative when attempted to be enforced.

691. Would

12 April 1832.

Hon.
W. Leslie Melville.

691. Would you recommend the establishment of anything in the nature of a legislative body or legislative council in India, to make laws for all persons whomsoever, including British subjects?—I think I have heard that such a proposal was made, but I have not seen the papers with regard to it, and I am not prepared to pronounce upon it. It occurs to me that the judges of the supreme court, whom I believe it was proposed to include in the council, might assist most materially in compiling a civil and criminal code from the mass of decisions passed by the King's and superior native courts, but I should doubt whether they would find themselves equally competent to pronounce on other very important subjects, as the relative rights of landholders and tenantry; and by the time they could among their other occupations have acquired that knowledge, the period of service which can be expected from them would perhaps have expired.

692. Do you think they might be safely associated with persons conversant with the administration of justice in the province, for the purpose of making laws from time to time, as occasion required?—I conceive they would be extremely useful in compiling laws in the mode I have indicated; but I should doubt, in our revenue system and in various other details of our administration, as they are very complicated, whether the subjects came so much before the judges in their ordinary occupation as to facilitate their mastering those questions.

693. Have you any doubt that if it were expedient to establish a legislative body or council in India, for the purpose of making laws from time to time for all descriptions of persons, including British subjects, that the judges of the supreme courts could be very usefully associated as members of that body?—Certainly very usefully, to the extent I have endeavoured to point out; but further it might depend upon the provisions under which such a council might sit. If any member had the power of deferring the enactment of the law until he had thoroughly satisfied himself of the expediency of passing it, embarrassments might arise.

694. Have you made up your mind at all whether it would be expedient to have a council in India for the purpose of making laws for India, either council or government, or whether a body ought to be established to make laws in India for India, whether that body be composed of the judges and the council, or whether it be composed of the government alone?—I have already, I believe, pointed out that in my opinion no alteration should be made in the constitution in India, that is, as I understand it, the system of administering law and of collecting the revenue, without communication with this country, but all other subjects I think had better be subject to the regulation of the authorities in that country; and I can easily suppose certain regulations under which a legislative council composed in the manner suggested, partly of judges of the superior court, partly of the government, might be rendered extremely useful.

695. But in matters of revenue do you think they ought to communicate with some authority at home?—I do not think the system under which our revenue administration is conducted should be changed without previous reference to this country; I may add, that I think changes have been so frequent as to be very prejudicial already.

696. Would you not think it right that the power of legislating in matters of revenue should be confined to this country?—By no means.

E.I.—IV.

M

697. But

2 April 1832.

Hon.
Leslie Mcville.

697. But you think important matters affecting the revenue ought not to be legislated upon in India, without communication with the authorities at home?—I conceive they do not acquire the degree of consistency and stability which is the foundation of all improvements without such communication.

698. But do you think that all matters relating to the administration of justice for all descriptions of persons could be safely confided to such a legislative council in India?—Generally speaking, with the control that already exists in this country, partly from public opinion, partly from the appeal allowed to the King in Council, and the other checks which exist, I should apprehend that it was extremely improbable that government would abuse any authority of the kind that might be entrusted to it.

699. If opportunity was given for the admission of British subjects to settle in any parts of India, do you not think such a power of providing by a legislative council for the administration of justice in the country would very much tend to render the step more safe and proper?—Yes, certainly, either by the government or the legislative council.

700. Do you conceive natives might be more generally employed in the administration of justice in India than they are at the present moment?—If it was proposed to substitute native juries for the present tribunal, I apprehend the result would be an entire failure. As I have already explained, I am very sensible of the defects of the present establishment; but I conceive much greater and more hopeless disorders must ensue from such a change as that. There seems to me great want of the materials necessary to compose tribunals at all resembling English juries. If all the testimony delivered on the subject of India agrees in anything, it surely is in representing the low state of moral feeling exhibited in our courts of justice. Native officers and retainers, no less than suitors and witnesses, are all represented as false and corrupt. With the exception of the class of native officers called sudder ameen, or superior native judges, or the law officers, there is little of native respectability to be found. That the native character possesses much that is estimable, is unquestionable; but we have not very well succeeded in bringing the virtues of integrity and truth to assist in the administration of justice. That by legislation on the supposition of the existence of those virtues we should immediately bring the virtues themselves into active exercise, is I fear a theory more pleasing to the imagination than founded in any extensive experience of mankind. I speak not of other countries or of other societies, but of the presidency of Bengal; and I am persuaded the soundest opinions there will be adverse to supplying the demand for justice by juries independent of European control. Most judges are, I believe, at first smitten with the idea of disposing of cases by arbitration, by punchayet; under the rules already in force, it appears as if it would both save trouble and give satisfaction: Soon impediments multiply: one or other party objects to the course of proceeding, or some of the punchayet is ill, or cannot or will not attend, or it is alleged that they will not hear some of the evidence, or that the decision is directly at variance with the evidence. The court gets embarrassed between the desire to support the punchayet and to prevent the abuses charged; whatever the errors of the punchayet may be, it is reluctant to make them defendants; the cause lingers, and I fear little satisfaction is offered. From my own experience, I should say say punchayets seldom answered, excepting in the very rare case where the opposing parties both desired in good faith to have their respective rights ascertained and determined. Another tribunal, somewhat analogous to what is proposed, is that of native courts-martial for the trial of offenders against military law. These are independent courts, and I think it is admitted that they have altogether failed in administering impartial justice. They are either merely passive instruments in the hands of the judge-advocate or superintendent officer, or more frequently, where the offender is a native officer, they deliberately shield him, whatever may be the evidence or charge against him. The general orders of the Bengal army constantly recorded the most severe censures passed by the commander-in-chief against the sentences of native courts-martial; and whatever difficulties may arise in recalling the power of trial, I believe all intelligent officers regret it was ever conferred. It is to be borne in mind that the army of Bengal is not, like European armies, recruited from the lowest ranks of society, but from that rank which should furnish jurymen.

12 April 1832.

Hon.
W. Leslie Melville.

701. You state that those who compose the army in India are generally of a more respectable class than those who compose the armies of Europe?—Yes.

702. And yet you state that great objections have been taken to investing those persons with the powers of sitting in courts-martial?—Yes, as a court having the power of pronouncing sentence on their fellows.

703. You believe private soldiers do not sit in courts-martials, but their native officers do?—Yes. The people of India possess a singular facility of combining, and silently but effectually resisting authority. Where so many circumstances occur to fetter the mind, much freedom in opinion and integrity in judging is scarcely to be expected, and influences very different from the abstract love of justice must be anticipated. If juries should be tried and fail to answer the end proposed, I fear they might be a very grievous instrument of oppression, injustice, and fraud; the more intolerable because no mode occurs to me of correcting their errors on appeal, however gross the failure of justice. I have, however, for some time been of opinion that some additional facilities in employing natives in administering both civil and criminal justice might be afforded to the courts. It occurs to me that it might be rendered optional with judges to summon punchayets or assessors, to aid him in cases in which he saw a reasonable ground to believe it might promote the ends of justice; but they should rather act as assessors to advise the judge than decide themselves. A discreet judge, and probably only such would summon a jury, would treat them with a degree of respect and consideration which would afford them ample encouragement; and should the institution be found to answer, their powers might be increased. To illustrate my meaning, I may mention a criminal trial, my notes in which I happen to have with me: it was a charge against two bankers composing a firm, for stealing a letter containing drafts for large sums of money, forging and uttering the indorsement, and thereby obtaining the money. The greater part of the trial consisted of an examination of the truth or falsehood of certain bankers' books; and another point was respecting the usages of brokers in negotiating bills. The trial lasted, I think, ten or twelve days, and I remember feeling how much assistance I could have derived from some of the many bankers and merchants whom curiosity led to attend, had the law or usages of our court permitted me to have availed myself of that knowledge and experience.

2 April 1832.

Hon.

experience in a description of business with which I was unacquainted. After the trial, I heard that a punchayet sat to determine whether business should in future be transacted with the firm in question, and I found I had arrived at the same conclusion with the jury, though probably by a much more circuitous course. In the very common offence of affrays or village quarrels, and in numerous others, I incline to think that material assistance might often be obtained from a punchayet, and I perceive no material objection to making the experiment. In civil suits, in like manner, in questions of disputed boundaries, of disputed accounts, or of caste or others, much aid might be obtained from the natives. At present, all reports on matters of fact are prohibited, except where both parties agree to a reference to arbitration; and if one party absent himself, the court, however unequal to the duty, must enter into the examination of the most complicated accounts and transactions, and I think some discretion on this point ought to be vested in the court. I understand that some provision of the nature of that above suggested has been introduced under the presidency of Bombay, but I do not know with what success.

704. You have stated in your evidence that larger powers have been given to the native judges to try civil causes than they possessed heretofore; do you know to what extent that power has been increased?—The principal sudder ameens are empowered to try to the extent of 5,000 rupees, the ordinary sudder ameens to the extent of 1,000 rupees; the powers of the moonsiffs are also increased, they are now entitled to try suits for personal property to the value of 300 rupees, and also suits for real property for the same value, with certain exceptions.

705. Do you conceive that such increased powers can be given to natives as judges or assessors, consistent with the large introduction of Europeans in the interior as settlers or residents?—I should certainly not consider it desirable to vest natives with jurisdiction over British subjects at any place other than that in which a European judge holds his court. I think assistance might be derived from the natives, in administering the law with regard to Europeans, if an European judge presided.

706. Then you conceive that all the cases which might arise between the European so situated and a native, should be tried in the zillah court, before an European judge, and not before a native judge?—Generally I should conceive it desirable that cases in which Europeans are concerned should be tried under the immediate superintendence of an European judge.

707. Do you think it would be satisfactory to the natives themselves that their causes were tried by a native judge, without the supervision of any European?—Generally speaking, I should say it was not desirable to invest the natives with final jurisdiction. There are instances of persons as able and as intelligent and as pure as any European, but the general tendency is otherwise, particularly in regard to integrity. The natives are inclined to suspect the integrity of each other.

708. Have the salaries of the judges been increased from the time their powers have been augmented?—I am not aware whether that is the case; I have merely seen an abstract of a regulation, in which the remuneration to be afforded them would not be inserted.

12 April 1832.

Hon.

W. Leslie Melville.

709. Do you not conceive, the suspicion of our impure administration of justice in the hands of natives, in some degree arises from the lowness of the salaries they receive?—The class whom we have paid as native gentlemen, and treated as native gentlemen, is the only class who I conceive have maintained their respectability.

710. In what way are the native judges generally treated by the European judge; with respect or otherwise?—Certainly not with disrespect, but there are different grades of native judges.

711. Are they allowed to sit in the judge's presence?—The higher class undoubtedly.

712. Are the sudder ameen allowed?—Generally; but it depends on their rank.

713. Is it not frequently the case that a native of some rank is not allowed to sit in the presence of an European judge?—The feeling on that subject, and the observances on this point were very strictly enforced, I imagine, under the Mahomedan government, and in the earlier periods of our government we were perhaps somewhat tenacious upon it, but I think we are gradually becoming less so. In the great majority of cases it is immediately understood whether the person is or not sufficiently high in rank to sit, and in doubtful cases the general disposition is to allow him a chair.

714. Is there any addition you wish to make to the evidence you have given?—
Several questions were put to me upon the subject of a legislative council as applicable to India; and it has occurred to me to mention that an admixture of the gentlemen educated at the Scotch bar might be useful in a council of that nature, in administering the law contained in the Mahomedan and Hindoo codes; the code of Scotland being more founded on the civil law and on general principles than perhaps the law of England.

Veneris, 13^a die Aprilis 1832.

The Right Hon. ROBERT GRANT in the Chair.

ROBERT NORTH COLLIE HAMILTON, Esq. called in and examined.

715. WHERE has your service been?—In the Bengal presidency, chiefly in the Judicial department at Benares as a Magistrate, and latterly as Deputy Secretary in the Judicial department at Calcutta.

13 April 1832.

R. N. C. Hamilton,
Esq.

716. On the supposition that Europeans in increased numbers were to become settlers in the interior of India, should you consider the judicial system of the country courts as at present established to be sufficient for that state of things, or would you recommend any and what changes?—It depends chiefly on what will be the nature of the settlers; if they were people of large property and capital simply residing there on estates, the present system would be sufficient, but if there were to be a mass of people of an inferior order it would require some alteration. I do not suppose that the natives themselves would be fit or capable.

717. Do

13 April 1832.

N. C. Hamilton,
Esq.

717. Do you mean to say that the courts in which natives were judges are not competent to try Europeans?—They would not be.

718. Do you speak of the natives immediately at the present time, or do you suppose that by degrees their general character has so improved as to render them competent to try Europeans, either criminally or civilly?—I should think it would take a great lapse of time before they were competent.

719. Could you not say that within the period of your acquaintance with India there has taken place among the natives, especially at the presidency, a very great change of character?—A material change.

720. Have they not acquired more confidence in themselves, and do they not more easily conform to the European modes?—They acquire more confidence in the European modes, and are more confident in the system under which they live.

721. It is found that what at that time was a prevalent opinion of the unchangeableness of the native character has been a good deal modified?—Yes, they are fast improving now.

722. You think any further change so great as to render it fit to seat them in judgment on Europeans, must be the work of a very long time?—To make them impartial judges.

723. You do not mean by competency that the state of their minds and faculties is so inferior, but on account of their moral character?—Certainly.

724. What do you conceive would be the defectiveness of a native tribunal sitting in judgment where Europeans were concerned, civilly or criminally?—If the Europeans were influential persons, they would be partial; if there was a lower class of persons of no importance at all, they might be tyrannical and arbitrary.

725. Do you think that any evil effect would be produced, on the opinions entertained among natives in general of Europeans?—I think every decision that tended to lower the character of the Europeans, would lower them in their estimation.

726. Would the circumstance of the natives sitting in judgment upon the Europeans impair the native in the estimation of the Europeans; the fact of their being subjected to the natives?—Certainly; it is not under a native state, for in a native state an European is nothing more than another subject.

727. Supposing an increased number of Europeans to reside in the country, either as settlers having property, or in any employment in the country of a lower kind, do you think the present judicial system of the Company, in point of extent and magnitude, sufficient to administer justice under such circumstances?—I think the present judicial system is as small as it can possibly be, it is barely sufficient in some of the largest districts to superintend now sufficiently every part of the district, but I do not think the increase of Europeans would cause an increase of crime so as to occasion greater work. I think you would require Europeans to try Europeans, and therefore that would be an additional expense and a material one.

728. In addition to the present courts?—I do not think the present native courts constituted of natives are calculated to try Europeans for criminal offences.

729. Do you mean with an European judge remaining as he does; do you think the court under such judge or assistant is not sufficient to administer justice where the Europeans are concerned?—Certainly, I consider it very doubtful.

730. Do

13 April 1832.

R. N. C. Hamilton.
Esq.

730. Do you think the European judge or assistant would be relieved by the native officer being appointed to try the native cases; and being so relieved, do you suppose the present European establishment sufficiently large?—Confining it to this; if the Europeans are to hear cases in which the Europeans were concerned (taking them entirely from the natives), it ceases to be a native tribunal.

731. In that case you think the present European judicial force would be sufficient?—Yes. There is a system about to be introduced in which the powers of the natives would be equal almost to what was the power of the European judges in civil courts some years ago; it is with reference to this my answer applies. I do not think those natives who have got the additional power, are competent to give impartial decisions in a case. I confine my remark to a court in which a native alone presides, of course subject to appeal.

732. It is understood that the Europeans going into the interior under local licenses, did thereby subject themselves to the country courts; at present would that engagement oblige them to submit to the jurisdiction of courts where the natives alone preside at present?—Yes, it would, according to the tenor of their local license.

733. Do you know, in point of fact, whether the Europeans have ever been subjected to courts where natives preside, by local license or otherwise?—In civil matters.

734. You know that?—An European can hold land now for any suits that arise out of his engagements with natives in the course of trade or agriculture; those suits may be heard in a native court, where a native only presides; he is obliged to abide by the decision of that court as much as another.

735. Does it in point of fact frequently happen?—Not very frequently.

736. Not often enough so that you can draw a general rule how far the natives could be found efficient?—The case is this, an European seldom lets his name appear to a suit; so that if you were to take the file of a court and look through to see who sues, you would find the agent, who is the native prosecutor; unless therefore you know for whom he was the agent, you could not know who was the principal.

737. This is confined to civil cases?—In criminal cases he must appear in person.

738. According to your opinion, the effect of the experiment which is now trying of the more extensive employment of natives in the administration of justice, is comparatively of very little value on the supposition that a great number of Europeans became residents in the country?—In that point of view it is.

739. Can you state the outline of any changes that were in contemplation in the administration of civil justice, at the time of your leaving India?—When I left India in last January twelvemonth, the draft of a regulation had been prepared by which the native courts were to be remodelled. Formerly the civil courts consisted of a judge or registrar, who was limited to hear suits under 500 rupees, and from 500 rupees to 1,000 rupees. There were two classes of registrars. The native judges, called sudder aumeens, were limited to the trial of suits not exceeding 500 rupees, generally not exceeding 250. Under these, sudder aumeens there was a class of civil officers, moonsiffs, who tried suits of a minor extent in the interior of the districts. By the new scheme the office of registrar was done away, and sudder

13 April 1832.

N. C. Hamilton,
Esq.

sudder aumeens were to be empowered to try suits from 1,000 to 5,000 rupees, and an increase of powers of a corresponding nature was given to the inferior courts. This would materially lessen the business before the judge, who was to confine himself to hear the original suits of a larger amount; appeals from the superior sudder aumeens sedam, who were competent to hear appeals from the inferior courts. This was the outline of the measure which had been before government, but was sent for report to the judges of the superior court, sudder dewanny adawlut, whose opinion on it had not been received. That would alter the whole system of civil courts.

740. Has the salary of native judges been increased?—The salary of the native judges of the first class was to be from 500 to 1,000 rupees a month.

741. What are they now?—From 100 to 200, some 350 rupees.

742. Some were 350?—Their salary ranged from 100 to 350 rupees a month.

743. What was to be the salary of the moonsiffs?—That was to be raised to 100 and 150, from 25 to 50 rupees.

744. Is there to be any regulation about these?—Yes; there was to be an extension of power in proportion to what they had before. The moonsiff has a local court in the districts.

745. The sudder aumeen being extended to 5,000 rupees, is there a similar extension?—There are three classes of sudder aumeens; one to hear suits under 5,000 rupees, another from 500 to 1,000, and the third from 1,000 to 5,000. The moonsiffs were to hear minor suits in the interior of the districts; the other courts being at the zillah station. An ultimate appeal would come to the zillah judge (the European functionary), and that would be final, from the moonsiffs.

746. Would the provincial courts be done away with?—Yes.

747. Do you know anything of the calculation of the expense of the new system as compared with the old?—It was calculated not to increase the expenditure, by the reduction of the office of registrar; his salary, as well as the expenses of the provincial courts of appeal, would defray the increased salaries of the natives.

748. What would become of the provincial judges, those who act now?—They were to be absorbed into the service.

749. In what way was criminal justice to be administered?—Its administration is completely changed: the court of circuit and the provincial court of appeal were one; they are subdivided; there is now a commissioner of circuit, and the old provincial court of appeal remains.

750. The alteration has been some time; the commissioner of revenue has been the judge of the circuit?—I think the regulation was in 1829.

751. That has been fully carried into effect, it is no part of this new plan?—The part relating to criminal courts had been carried into effect, and failed. I am afraid from uniting the revenue and judicial powers, thus loading the functionary with work he could not do.

752. It failed from the incompetency of the individual to discharge both duties?—From want of time he was incompetent.

753. Have the Hindoos or Mahomedan natives ever been employed in juries in Calcutta to your knowledge?—I have not heard of any jury being empannelled solely of Hindoos or Mahomedans.

754. You

13 April 1832.

R. N. C. Hamilton,
Esq.

754. You doubt, if it is possible they should be?—I consider it impossible for a native jury to be empanelled for the trial of any native, from the natural prejudices as to caste; a respectable or high-caste Hindoo would think it a degradation to sit upon a jury in which an inferior caste was to be tried, and an inferior caste would, by his religion, consider he had committed a sin in bringing disgrace and punishment on a Brahmin.

755. How far does that principle operate in courts-martial among the native troops?—I believe there is no low-caste man enlisted in the army. I cannot be competent to give evidence on military matters, but the common soldier is supposed to be a man of respectable caste before he is enlisted; I do not suppose there is the lowest caste of Hindoo in the army. I do not believe a native court-martial ever sits without being superintended by an European officer; the interpreter of the regiment is usually the superintendent of all native regimental court-martials.

756. Do you not conceive that a species of jury might be appointed in different courts, taken from officers and agents who were in the habit of attending the courts?—I think that would be most prejudicial as far as impartiality is concerned; I think every man who receives pay about the court is the last man who ought to be employed. If you take a man who holds an office in one district, and make him a juror in another, you must have some one to do his work during his absence. Competency as to intellect I do not dispute; but the question is, if a man who has retired from the service from age, living 200 miles off, would like to be summoned to sit on a jury. There was a calculation made of what would be the expense supposing native juries were to be assembled at the assizes or sessions, and the expense of one sessions was nearly 50,000 rupees per annum; that is the amount by a calculation of Mr. Leycester, late chief judge of the sudder, recorded on the minutes of the court.

757. But upon the trial of criminal cases the native officer who attends acts somewhat in the nature of a juror?—There are regulations empowering the presiding judge to set aside the (futwah) opinion of the moolavie, who is always attended by one.

758. Who finds the matter of fact?—He finds guilty or not guilty; but there is a regulation by which the courts are empowered to set aside that decision.

759. If it is a conviction, but not an acquittal?—The futwah which is given acquitting a man at Benares, may be reversed by the superior court; or the commissioner's decision at Benares can be reversed by the nizamat adawlut.

760. What can he do; can he reverse the judgment?—The whole trial goes down.

761. Supposing a person is acquitted by the futwah of the Mahomedan officer, if the commissioner of circuit approves of it, it is final; if he disapproves of it, it goes to the nizamat adawlut?—Yes.

762. May the sudder nizamat adawlut set aside the futwah, and pronounce judgment on this person who is declared not guilty by the futwah?—By the futwah the court are not guided; they give their opinion as if it were a new trial before them, on the whole case.

763. But without hearing new evidence?—They can send the case back to have more evidence taken. It is almost a new trial in the event of the European func-

R. N. C. Hamilton,
Esq.

tionary and the law officer not agreeing; if they agree, the thing is final; still the higher court has the power of sending for the evidence.

764. Do such references often take place?—Constantly; that is in case of the judge disagreeing.

765. Upon the same evidence upon which the Mahomedan law officer has found that the party is not guilty, the nizamat adawlut may pronounce him guilty, and sentence him to punishment?—It is their verdict on the evidence that comes before them; every word having been taken down. They may quash the indictment and send it back, or they may decide the contrary.

766. What is the usual practice; to refer it to another trial, or give a decision upon it?—I do not think I ever recollect a trial in that way being quashed; not commonly; they generally decide on it as it goes down.

767. If the moolavie (the Mahomedan law officer) should pronounce and say “not guilty,” and the opinion of the European judge should be “guilty,” in that case the nizamat adawlut would decide in favour of the judge?—The nizamat adawlut will sometimes decide one way and sometimes another; they sometimes agree with the moolavie and sometimes not.

768. Suppose the native should say “guilty,” and the European judge should be positive it is a case for acquittal, is not his decision final?—No; in all cases in which they disagree, let their disagreement be how it may, it must go to the superior court.

769. A capital sentence cannot be pronounced unless submitted to the nizamat adawlut?—I do not think the commissioner of circuit can sentence to more than 14 years’ imprisonment or banishment.

770. Does the nizamat adawlut hear fresh evidence?—They are empowered to hear it if they think fit.

771. Hear it, or send for it?—They must send for it; sometimes it is 1,200 miles.

772. They rarely send for fresh evidence?—There must be one opinion for an acquittal, and they generally acquit where there is a doubt; they are more disposed to acquit than convict in those cases; but then the court of the nizamat adawlut consists of three or four or five judges, two of the judges may acquit and three convict. There is a curious case of embezzlement for a large amount of the Benares mint pending, in which the judges of the nizamat adawlut found the prisoner guilty, and the quantum of punishment is what they do not make up their minds to; they differ among themselves, and the case is lying over owing to the death of the senior judge.

773. In that case there was a difference between the moolavie and the European judge?—Yes; I think the moolavie acquitted and the commissioner of circuit found guilty: it has gone to the sudder nizamat, and the judges have found the guilt, but the measure of punishment remains doubtful.

774. Are there no means of coming to a decision on the punishment?—There ought to be.

775. Is the judge in the habit of making observations on the evidence, before the moolavie pronounces his futwah?—No: I never have myself sat on those cases. On the close of an evidence the moolavie can cross-examine any witness he pleases, and and on the close of the case the European judge desires him to give his futwah in writing, first as to the guilt, and in the event of guilt, what would be the punishment by the Mahomedan law. If he agrees in the guilt, and it is a case in which he is competent to pass judgment, he does so, reporting it to the nizamat adawlut; but if he disagrees with the futwah as to the guilt or innocence, he sends the case down with the futwah, and his own opinion on the merits and particulars of the case. To the superior court he gives his reasons in detail.

776. Do you think, by the forms of law in criminal proceedings in India, the life and personal liberty of the native are well secured, or otherwise?—I think for the purposes of justice it is perfectly sufficient.

777. There is often considerable difficulty in convicting?—In the course of nine years' residence at Benares, in which I was connected with the magistrate's office, I do not think there were above three capital punishments, that is, sentences of death.

778. How many capital charges might there be in that time?—There is a statement I have given in; I suppose the capital charges were 200 a year.

779. Did that number arise from acquittals or commutations?—There were plenty of punishments of imprisonment and transportation.

780. There is considerable difficulty, is there not, in convicting in the criminal courts of India?—Yes; I think the tendency is more to acquit than convict. If you take the result of the trials, you will find more acquittals than convictions.

781. To what do you attribute that?—To the difficulty of convicting; to the difficulty of finding conclusive evidence.

782. Is not the law of evidence the Mahomedan law of evidence, unless it be modified; and is any particular number of witnesses required to prove a fact in a criminal case by the law as it obtains?—No.

783. Can one witness be sufficient if the moolavie believes him?—The moolavie will not give his futwah by our law; it will be according to the Mahomedan law.

784. His decision will be according to the Mahomedan law?—Yes.

785. Does that require more witnesses?—It requires two witnesses, and in some cases it requires eye-witnesses.

786. Can any person in India in the criminal courts, that is, any native, be convicted on mere circumstantial evidence of any criminal offence, without direct testimony of the fact?—The Mahomedan code of law requires direct testimony of the fact.

787. Then the moolavie would not convict, he would not find a futwah against the prisoner, unless there were two witnesses to the fact?—They have a technical term, and they would find him guilty on presumptive evidence; he would state that in his futwah, but not guilty on direct evidence; that is, supposing the man were by circumstantial evidence found guilty of an offence that would involve death, he would state in his futwah that the extreme sentence was barred for want of a witness or direct testimony, but that he would be guilty on presumptive evidence.

788. That is, that he would be suspected?—No; his futwah would be "guilty."

789. He would be liable to punishment?—Yes, to the minor punishment.

790. Is there much difficulty in obtaining evidence, arising from the parties who might give the evidence being intimidated?—It did certainly exist to a great extent,

13 April 1832

R. N. C. Hamilton,
Esq.

but it is fast decreasing. If you separate Bengal and the Western Provinces, it may exist in Bengal, it is known to; in the Western Provinces it is not by any means so frequent.

791. Has the crime of decoitee decreased?—Yes; it is a crime confined to one or two districts.

792. Is it to the improvement of the police you describe that decrease?—A great deal of it depends upon the settled state of the country, and likewise to the police.

793. How often are the sessions held in each district?—Half-yearly.

794. Are all the prisoners brought to trial?—They are all sent up for trial.

795. Are they all tried in each session?—They are all put on their trial, except there is something that makes them lie over, but the judge is obliged to dispose of the calendar and account for the prisoners in every case; the gaol is delivered. The law is, if a case stands over two calendars the prisoner is acquitted and set free. Before the system of commissioners of circuit, a man might be confined for a year before the sessions, the commissioner of the circuit never reaching the place: it ought to be half-yearly.

796. Under the present system is it the fact that the gaols are regularly delivered each half year?—I think, under the new system of commissioners, it is delivered twice within a twelvemonth. If they have a sessions this month, six months from this date there may be very few for trial.

797. But still they deliver twice a year?—It would be twice a year, though not six months apart.

798. They are delivered twice a year?—Yes.

799. You stated that the system of employing commissioners rather than judges going the circuit, has failed from the accession of the revenue duties?—Yes.

800. Does not that circumstance prevent the complete gaol delivery?—No; because another officer has been sent to hold the gaol delivery, and this proves the failure of the new system.

801. What description of person is he?—An officiating judge for the circuit to all intents and purposes; he has the same power as the commissioner of the circuit.

802. It is another qualified person?—Yes.

803. Do those commissioners of necessity possess a knowledge of the law when they are first appointed?—To answer that, I must go more into detail than the Committee may think it right to do.

804. Will you inform the Committee whether, in your opinion, the proper means for qualifying these Europeans and writers who are employed in judicial functions are sufficient; and if not, what other means you would recommend for securing the proper qualification and the proper execution of the administration of justice, generally?—I think that a writer who has been attached to the judicial branch, by the time he comes to the commissioner's office is qualified to perform the functions of a commissioner of circuit, but I doubt much whether he is qualified supposing that he has been brought up in the revenue branch and then made a commissioner of revenue and circuit, I doubt if he is qualified for the circuit, though he is fully qualified for the revenue; or vice versa, a man who is brought up in the judicial branch is not qualified

13 April 1832.

R. N. C. Hamilton,

qualified perhaps for revenue; but the appointment under the system as it now is, of the commissioner of revenue and circuit, was in this way: The government abolished the courts of circuit and the boards of revenue; they had numerically a sufficient number of men, and they divided the country out: there were three boards of revenue and five courts of circuit; they parcelled out the whole country into jurisdictions, each containing three or four zillahs, or districts, and government appointed a judge from a court of circuit to be a commissioner of revenue and circuit, and a district was placed under him, with the powers of the board of revenue and the commissioners of the circuit: so also an officer was taken from the revenue board and made him the same. It is no imputation on an individual to say he might not be qualified for one department; the first man in the service may be qualified in one line, though he may not be so competent in the other: it is upon that partly the system has failed.

805. So far as acquiring a knowledge of the natives goes, is not experience in the revenue department important?—I think that the judicial officer gains more insight, in the course of his service from a writer to the office of commissioner of circuit, in revenue matters, than a revenue officer does of the judicial, in rising from a writer to the board of revenue. As a civil judge he has to look over the revenue proceedings.

806. Have you any plan by which this mischief might be rectified?—The commissioners of circuits were an improvement on the old courts of circuit, by ensuring a half-yearly gaol delivery in each district, from giving them a space they could travel over within the period. In the Bareilly circuit the judge had to travel 1,200, or perhaps 2,000 miles in the half year with all his office; that was under the old regime; now he has not to travel more than 60 miles from a given centre. The new arrangement diminishes the sphere in each case, but it blends the functions of the judicial and the revenue departments. Had they given each six instead of three districts to superintend in one branch only, if a revenue officer had six instead of three, with the duties of circuit judge, confined only to revenue matters, the business would have been performed; that is, the improvement would have been substantial.

807. You would send the same officers on their circuit?—Let them be wholly distinct from each other; restrict the duties, and put one in the revenue and one in the judicial.

808. You would enlarge the spheres, and divide the duties?—Yes, I think it is wrong to give them both functions; a positive evil.

809. Are the natives ever employed as judges in criminal cases to any amount?—No.

810. Not as magistrates?—No.

811. Do you think it would be advisable to make natives justices of the peace?—Certainly not.

812. Do you mean that answer generally?—I mean that a native is not a qualified person to perform the duties of a justice of the peace.

813. Even over natives?—No, not beyond the present police jurisdiction and authority he possesses.

814. As

13 April 1832.

R. N. C. Hamilton,
Esq.

814. As you say you would not employ natives as justices of the peace, do you think it would be safe to have a power of employing them to any limited extent at the presidencies in the functions of police?—It might do no harm; it would be inoperative. I think they are not yet capable.

815. Do you think the natives would of themselves have confidence in a native justice of the peace?—No, certainly not.

816. Do you think there would be any advantage in having some means of instructing these writers employed in the administration of justice, in the general principles of law, before they commence their judicial career?—I certainly think a man who knows something of law is much better qualified than one who knows nothing; but the local regulations are what he must know.

817. Do you think a person better qualified to discharge the judicial functions if he were grounded originally in the general principles of jurisprudence?—That is the object of Haileybury, supposing he attends to those lectures delivered there.

818. Has the instruction which he gets in the principles of law in Haileybury been found useful?—Yes, I think so; as far as it goes it is most useful.

819. Is it desirable to extend it?—I do not know how it could be extended, unless writers were kept longer in England.

820. Might you not by altering the course of study?—I myself went there. I do not think you could increase the study of law without decreasing something else; to keep within the present limit of residence in the College, you must take away something equally useful to learn, to give more time for the study of law.

821. And what is that?—I think a writer learns least of the languages. In my opinion, the three principal things a man learns at Haileybury are law, political economy, and history. Afterwards he has no opportunity in India of gaining similar information.

822. Would there be an advantage in excluding classical and mathematical instruction from Haileybury, and substituting many of these more available and practicable branches?—I do not think it desirable to exclude classics and mathematics.

823. Supposing a certain part of the youth destined for India should be intended for the judicial line, would it be advisable to prolong their stay in this country to enable them to acquire a knowledge of the principles of jurisprudence more perfectly than they do now?—It is difficult to tie a man down in this country to say what line he shall pursue in India. In my own case I should have conceived it would have been hard to tie me down in England, for it might have happened that there was another branch that I might have been more disposed to turn my mind to after I had seen India.

824. You are of opinion that the choice of the particular line in which he is to be employed cannot well be fixed until he gets to India?—Yes; and not till he is out of the Calcutta college; till he sees the country: he is sent up as assistant to a place there; he sees the nature of the business, and he may then fix himself to one branch.

825. It is pretty much left to the young men there to choose their own lines?—It is; but I fancy the exigency of the service often requires them to be sent. Formerly a man was appointed assistant to a judge and magistrate, which is wholly judicial,

13 April 1832.

R. N. C. Hamilton,

judicial, or he chose, and was sent as assistant to the collector, which is wholly revenue; now they are appointed as assistants to the commissioners of revenue and circuit, it remains for them then to be sent where they may be most wanted.

826. They are not now enabled to choose whether they will be in the revenue or judicial line?—Every young man on his emancipation is appointed now assistant in the revenue and judicial line; he is appointed assistant to the commissioner of revenue and circuit; and he is not appointed assistant to a magistrate or collector of a specified place, as he would have been formerly, but under a commissioner, who assigns him to any place within his jurisdiction.

827. Does he assign him after he has some knowledge of what he is fit for, having employed himself?—He assigns him as soon as he thinks him qualified; it is left entirely to him: sometimes he deposes him under a relation, for it is fair to conceive he would learn his duty better under a person interested in him.

828. Is he generally employed in both departments?—Yes; alternate days usually.

829. How long upon an average would a young gentleman remain as an assistant before he would be appointed a commissioner?—I suppose 18 years, perhaps 20.

830. He would be assistant?—No; intermediately he may be a magistrate and collector, but before he becomes a commissioner he would see 18 years' service. A writer, after having passed the required examination at the college of Fort William, is first appointed (according to the present system) assistant to a commissioner of revenue and circuit, at whose disposal he is placed to be deputed or attached to any office (revenue or magisterial) where his service may be most required. Supposing him deputed to a magistrate's office, his prospect of rising in the service would be thus:

1st. Assistant to magistrate: On a salary from 400 to 600 rupees per month, for a period of near five years.

2d. Joint magistrate: On a salary of 800 to 1,000 rupees, for a period of three years.

3d. Magistrate: On a salary of 1,200 to 1,600 rupees, until he might be appointed judge of a civil court, and his magisterial functions would cease; from which he would

4th. (Commissioner). Rise to a commissioner, after 18 or 20 years.

It will be seen from this scale that an officer may be appointed a judge of a civil court without having gone through the training which he would have under the former system, which was thus:

Assistant to judge and magistrate;

Registrar and joint magistrate;

Judge and magistrate.

By the abolition of registrars (the intermediate step between assistant and judge), it is difficult to see how a man, whose time is fully occupied, can get that same degree of knowledge under the new system he might naturally have gained in the 10 or 12 years' apprenticeship before he attained the office of judge and magistrate, as far as civil judge is concerned. But suppose the commissioner to depute the assistant in the revenue department, he would become,

1st. Assistant to a collector, and wholly confined to revenue matters.

2d. Deputy

13 April 1832.

R. N. C. Hamilton,
Esq.

2d. Deputy collector: Deputed to make settlements and assessments, and possibly created joint magistrate, with all the powers.

3d. Collector: In charge of a district in every particular relating to revenue.

4th. Commissioner: He would become a commissioner of revenue and circuit, after 18 or 20 years.

The powers vested by regulation in an assistant to a magistrate, are "to hear and determine any case made over specially for that purpose by the magistrate, and on proof and conviction to order a punishment not exceeding one month's imprisonment, or a fine not exceeding 50 rupees.

A magistrate, on conviction of certain offences, may punish with six months' imprisonment, with or without labour and irons, 30 stripes, and a fine not exceeding 200 rupees, commutation to imprisonment not exceeding six months. A magistrate, by Regulation XII. I think, of 1818, may on conviction of a burglary (and thefts exceeding 100 rupees in value) sentence to two years' imprisonment with labour; and by another Regulation, in cases of serious affrays, sentence to one year's imprisonment. In all cases of murder, homicide (or attempts), burglaries exceeding 100 rupees, woundings, administering drugs, child stealing, and other heinous offences, the magistrate must, in the event of there being sufficient evidence, commit the accused to take his trial before the commissioner of circuit, at the assize or session next to be holden.

831. Is the assistant ever employed in delivering the gaols?—Never.

832. What means has the assistant of learning the judicial part of his business?—He is generally appointed to be the assistant to a district; after having been a short time at the commissioner's office, he assigns him to a district, and in the office of that district he learns the routine of duty and gains experience.

833. But in the district to which he is appointed as assistant, what is the nature of the judicial functions he discharges?—In preparing cases and taking evidence.

834. What cases does he prepare?—Any the magistrate may send to him.

835. What is the nature of the preparation of a case; how does he prepare a case?—Much in the same way as a magistrate prepares a case before he commits it in this country.

836. Taking the depositions of witnesses?—Yes; and making the case as complete as he can, so that the magistrate may come to a decision upon it: the magistrate can send for more evidence and make further inquiry.

837. That is in the case of minor offences or commitments?—Of any case that may be sent to him.

838. Does he do so in cases of a graver description that are for trial?—Yes; he prepares it for trial; he passes no decision.

839. Are not all the cases of a graver description tried, and the depositions taken, before the commissioner of revenue himself?—Before the magistrate, in the magistrate's office, in the first instance; but the commissioner of circuit has the whole over again before himself and the moolavie. The commissioner is the superior authority in the district.

840. The commissioner is the judge of the circuit?—Yes.

841. And assists in the delivery of the gaols?—Yes; the judge of circuit only delivers the gaols.

842. Suppose

13 April 1832.

R. N. C. Hamilton,
Esq.

842. Suppose a case of theft of a serious nature, would not that case be entirely heard from its commencement to its termination before the commissioner, at the time of trial?—Suppose a theft takes place in a district under 200 rupees in amount, the magistrate disposes of it entirely himself, even as to the punishment. Supposing it to be a heavy case he commits it for trial before the commissioner of circuit, who hears the case, and has all the witnesses before him, and takes it all down as a new trial.

843. When you speak of the preparation of a case by the assistant, you allude to a case below 100 rupees?—He prepares it for the opinion of the magistrate; the magistrate may say, this is a case which should go to the commissioner at the next circuit.

844. Is the preparation carried on by the assistant, having the witnesses in the same room, though the magistrate does not interfere?—Every evidence ought to be taken before the English functionary. The assistant takes evidence and tries to make the case as complete as he can before he sends it up to the magistrate, who goes over the case completely, although he does not take it again in writing; but if it goes to the commissioner of circuit the trial is taken down in writing de novo before the commissioner.

845. So that the instruction of the assistant is brought in actual contact with the persons?—He is the person who superintends the whole evidence.

846. Is it compatible with the judicial service that a young man should attend the court as a student; could that be made compatible with the practice in judicial courts?—No.

847. You say there is no opportunity in which he could be attending, his services being required immediately after college?—Yes.

848. Would he not be better qualified if he attended as barristers bringing up for the bar attend here?—If you make them barristers you deprive the natives of the office of pleaders.

849. But could you not give him an opportunity of acquiring a knowledge of the law by attending as a student?—I think he acquires it by the preparation of the cases and the taking of evidence.

850. You think that is better than attending as a student?—It is his own interest to get up the case as completely as if it was for his own decision; he is not fettered except by the law, which he must inquire into and study.

851. Does he not act sometimes himself in a judicial capacity as assistant to the judge?—Yes, in petty cases.

852. So that in fact he is to discharge the functions of a judge almost immediately on his leaving college?—In disputes in small cases.

853. At that time surely he cannot be qualified?—He cannot of himself hear a single case until it is sent from the magistrate; he cannot try any case, or look at the papers even, until it is made over regularly by the magistrate.

854. He may give a decision?—If he is ordered by the magistrate.

855. If the magistrate refers a case for his decision he can decide?—Yes; the responsibility of being able to do that rests with the magistrate; if it is made over to him by the magistrate for his decision he can decide it.

13 April 1832.

R. N. C. Hamilton.
Esq.

856. You assume that he would not make it over to him if he did not think him qualified?—When I was assistant I had not a case made over to me for six or eight months after I was in the office.

857. In what language are the depositions taken down?—In Persian.

858. Who does that?—A native writer.

859. What means has the assistant of knowing if they are correctly taken down?—By knowing the language.

860. But supposing he does not understand Persian?—He would not be out of the college. Persian is the language by which the assistant is qualified for the service: he has given into his hand a Persian paper, and he is to translate it into English, and an English paper which he is to translate into and write in Persian; he is supposed to be able to read and write after having done this.

861. You think him sufficiently qualified in his knowledge of Persian, in the first instance, to superintend the depositions?—Provided he has passed college, he knows it beforehand; a man the first time does not understand so much as he does by practice after.

862. Do they learn Persian at Haileybury?—Yes; that is one of the tests.

863. And he is examined in Persian before he leaves the College at Calcutta?—Yes. I do not mean that a man when he leaves college reads as fluently as he does after having been in an office for a year or two.

864. You have spoken of the magistrates; what description of persons are the magistrates?—The commissioner on circuit is much the same as the judge who goes of the assizes in England, and the magistrate is there much in the same way as a bench of magistrates at the petty sessions.

865. It is a class of civil service?—Yes: the first step from an assistant is to be a joint magistrate, he then has a portion of district over which there may be a magistrate; he then becomes magistrate, and from that he becomes a commissioner of circuit: the rise from an assistant to a commissioner is not without intermediate grades.

866. The commissioner, the magistrate and the assistant, are all engaged both in judicial and in revenue functions?—Not always; the magistrate is a distinct authority from the commissioner: the revenue duties are performed by the collectors, not by magistrates.

867. That is what you referred to when you said a young man chose what line he would take?—He rises to a magistrate, then he becomes a commissioner; ultimately he is not so well qualified to be a commissioner of revenue as a person who has risen from an assistant to a collector, and thence to a commissioner of revenue.

868. If he keeps to the revenue line his step is to be a collector?—Yes; those who have been totally confined to one branch cannot be so well qualified for the other.

869. Do you think an assistant is ever called upon to give a judicial opinion upon a question before he acquires sufficient experience to do so, that is, soon after leaving the college?—If he is called on for a decision it is not final; every decision is appealable to the magistrate, and every decision of the magistrate is appealable to the commissioner.

13 April 1832.

R. N. C. Hamilton,
Esq.

870. In order to qualify himself for judicial duties he has to acquire a general knowledge of law, and also a knowledge of Mahomedan and Hindoo law?—The Mahomedan and Hindoo law (except in cases in which there is caste or anything of that kind) forms a very little part of judicial education; the regulations are the principal thing he must know; the regulations he is bound by his oath of office to conform to, and in their preparation the Hindoo and Mahomedan law were taken into consideration. The regulations are enforced, and they are the law of the land now; he is bound on his oath to administer justice by them.

871. That, then, is his only judicial study?—That is his only judicial study.

872. Are the commissioners at the present moment taken from the class of collectors and magistrates, either one or the other?—They have not been in existence above two years and a half; they then were taken from the boards of revenue as well as the courts of circuit; now, of course, they would be taken according to their standing. A man who would have been eligible to a court of circuit is eligible now to a commissioner of revenue and circuit, and he has the two functions, and if he is of standing in the service he is a commissioner of revenue and of the circuit.

873. He may be equally chosen from the classes of the magistrates or collectors?—The magistrate or the collector equally are steps to a commissionership.

874. Is not experience in the revenue department of some service to a man in adapting him to the judicial?—That is quite a party question. I think a man is a better judge if he knows the detail of revenue proceedings, the same as any man must be a better judge the more information he has. The powers of the magistrates at Madras and Bengal are not equal. It is a common mistake to suppose that the magistrates of Bengal and Madras have the same powers.

875. In what direction does the zillah judge rise?—It used to be assistant, then he was made registrar and from that a judge, in which capacity he had no magisterial duties at all; no police.

876. To what does he arrive beyond that of being a judge of the zillah court?—He used to rise to the court of appeal.

877. Those provincial courts being removed, what is his next step?—The commissioner; every thing ends in the commissioner. In fact there is no distinction of lines such as used to prevail in the revenue and judicial departments; the union of these two is most prejudicial, in my opinion, in many respects.

878. What is the salary of a commissioner of the circuit?—Thirty-six thousand rupees, and 6,000 rupees for travelling allowance.

879. And what is that of the zillah judge?—Twenty-eight thousand rupees.

880. And of the magistrate?—From 1,000 to 1,600 rupees a month.

881. And of the assistant?—On quitting his college he gets 400 rupees a month, and he gets an increase of 100 rupees; two years after leaving college it is 400 or 500 rupees a month; on that he remains till he gets higher.

JUDICIAL.

16 April 1832.

W. B. Bayley, Esq.

WILLIAM BUTTERWORTH BAYLEY, Esq. called in and examined.

882. WILL you give to the Committee any information as to the present state of the judicial establishments of the Company, or any suggestions as to the improvements in it which are required and practicable?—I have explained my sentiments on the administration of civil justice under the presidency of Bengal, in a minute recorded in November 1829; on that occasion I observed that the machinery of Lord Cornwallis's system for the administration of civil justice was from the very first inadequate to accomplish more than a small portion of the work it was expected to perform, and that it was soon found necessary to introduce various modifications in that system. The higher courts were from time to time relieved from details of minor importance, the powers of the inferior European courts were increased, the aid of the revenue officers and of assistant judges was called in, the jurisdiction of the native tribunals was largely though very gradually extended, objectionable forms were amended or dispensed with, and more summary processes were introduced, so that scarcely a year had passed since the promulgation of the code of 1793, in which attempts had not been made to remove the grounds of civil controversies, to expedite their adjustment or to reduce arrears of suits, which had nevertheless continued to accumulate. It was the principle of Lord Cornwallis's system to provide for the administration of civil as well as of criminal justice by the almost exclusive agency of European functionaries. The districts into which the country was parcelled out were far too extensive and too populous to be successfully superintended by the individuals to whose charge the judicial administration was entrusted; and where the population amounted, as it did in many instances, to upwards of a million, the duties required from the judge and magistrate were far beyond the powers of the most active and intelligent officer. The difficulties thus experienced have been since augmented in the degree in which the extension of trade and cultivation, the advance in the value of land and the progressive increase of population have multiplied the demands of the public on the time of the civil tribunals. It is obvious that we began by aiming at more than could possibly be accomplished; that the expectation of being able to carry on the administration of justice, civil and criminal, by European agency, was utterly fallacious; that no addition of numerical strength to the European portion of the judicial establishments, which the public finances can at present afford, will do more than yield a partial or temporary relief, and that we must necessarily look to the still more extended employment of natives (subject to European superintendence). The system when originally introduced in the year 1793, was ill calculated to encourage the formation of a class of natives qualified by their education and character to fill responsible situations in the administration of justice; they were employed employed at first either in matters only of very inferior importance or under the immediate eye of the judges, but as the necessity of having recourse to their assistance became more and more obvious, the original principle was gradually departed from, and a body of native judicial officers has been formed who now exercise very considerable powers. At first they were entrusted only with the decision of suits for money to the extent of 50 rupees, but in the year 1803 a new class of officers, called Sudder Aumeens, was established. They were invested with power to determine claims referred to them for real and personal property to the amount of 100 rupees. In 1814 their powers and those of the Moonsiffs were increased, and their situations rendered in all respects more efficient and respectable. In 1821 they were still more enlarged, the jurisdiction of the Moonsiffs being extended to cases of 150 rupees, and of the Sudder Aumeens to cases of 500 rupees. In 1827 a regulation was passed, by which the Sudder Aumeens were under certain circumstances vested with power to try claims to the amount of 1,000 rupees; so that, as stated in a minute of one of the judges of the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut, nineteen-twentieths of the original suits instituted in the civil courts throughout the country are now determined by native judges. The most favourable testimony has been borne to their talents and assiduity by many of the authorities to whom they are subordinate, and in the districts where the inhabitants enjoy the benefit of a comparatively efficient administration of civil justice, it is ascribable in a very extensive degree to the instrumentality of those officers. The Sudder Aumeens are now generally men of experience and legal learning; they are assimilated in religion, manners, habits and customs with the people, and they are generally regarded with respect and confidence both by Europeans and natives. The Moonsiffs, where proper persons have been selected, are likewise found to be extremely serviceable, and are well fitted from the local position which they occupy, not only to render justice acceptable to the great body of the people, but to execute a variety of duties delegated to them in the interior of the districts by the superior tribunals. In order, however, to render them generally trustworthy and efficient, they should be placed on a better footing in respect to emolument. With our past experience, we have every reason to believe that if the Moonsiffs as well as the Sudder Aumeens meet with liberal and due encouragement, the agency of both may be safely employed to a much greater extent than it is at present in the administration of civil justice, and that in course of time they may be entrusted with the disposal in the first instance of all original suits now cognizable by the civil courts. But in considering the extent to which powers might at once be raised, I thought it desirable that they should not take cognizance of suits exceeding 5,000 rupees in value or amount. I ascribed much of the success which had attended our efforts to improve the character of our native officers to the caution with which we had proceeded; increased power was conferred upon them so soon as experience justified it, and in proportion to the confidence reposed in them by their fellow subjects. I proposed, therefore, 1st, That the Moonsiffs should be empowered to decide suits for money and other personal property to the amount of 300 rupees, without any restriction as to the period within which the cause of action might arise beyond that which is at present imposed by the regulations on the institution of suits in all other courts, and that they should be remunerated for their trouble to the extent of 100 rupees per mensem.

16 April 1832.

W. B. Bayley, Esq.

2dly, That

16 April 1832.

W. B. Bayley, Esq.

2dly, That the present Sudder Aumeens should be empowered to decide generally all original cases referred to them, to the extent of 1,000 rupees, as well as cases in appeal from the Moonsiffs, on a monthly salary of 200 rupees, with an increase of 50 rupees for such as might hold the office of Moolavie or Pundit; and 3dly, That a superior class of Sudder Aumeens should be entertained for the trial and decision of civil suits between 1,000 and 5,000 rupees, and with powers to determine appeals from such decisions of the second class of Sudder Aumeens and Moonsiffs as might be referred to them for that purpose. I recommended that they should be selected from the law officers of the provincial courts, or that other individuals, of whatever class or religious persuasion, should be chosen, who might, in the opinion of government, on the joint report of the local commissioner and judge, be deemed qualified for the trust, and that they should receive a monthly allowance of not less than 500 sonat rupees. Such an arrangement, I observed, would provide for the disposal, through native agency, of the whole of the original suits regularly cognizable by the zillah and city courts up to 5,000 rupees. The appeals from the Moonsiffs would be referred to the ordinary Sudder Aumeens, and appeals from the ordinary Sudder Aumeens would in like manner be referred to the principal Sudder Aumeens, with a special appeal in both cases to the zillah or city judge. The latter officers would be at liberty to retain on their own files any suits they might think proper. It would be the special duty of the judge to superintend and regulate the proceedings of the native judges, reporting through the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut periodically the degree of estimation in which they might be held. I recommended that the summary jurisdiction with which the judges were invested in matters of rent should be transferred altogether to the collectors, whose decisions should be open to revision by the zillah and city judges on the institution of a regular suit, the parties still retaining the option of instituting a regular suit in the first instance in any court, instead of having recourse to summary process before the collector. I recommended the gradual abolition of the provincial courts, and that their jurisdiction should be transferred to the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut, which latter should be divided into two courts, one for the Lower, and one for the Upper Provinces. I observed, that unless a new Sudder Court were established in the Upper Provinces, or several new judges added to the old one in Calcutta, the provincial courts must be kept up, an arrangement which would in the end be attended with a much heavier cost, and was otherwise undesirable. To augment the numerical strength of the present Sudder Court would not produce a corresponding increase of efficiency, and the control of the judges over the remote districts of the Western Provinces would be exceedingly imperfect and unsatisfactory. I thought that the office of magistrate might continue united to that of judge, where the civil business of the district was so light as to admit of it; but feeling that the efficiency which the police had at length attained, compared with what it was twenty years ago, in promoting the security both of person and property, was perhaps the greatest blessing which the inhabitants yet enjoyed under the British Government, I did not desire to see the office of the magistrate generally united with that of the collector. I observed, that by several late regulations the criminal powers of the magistrates had been greatly increased, and their duties augmented, and that in many districts the heavy duties of the collector could not

16 April 1832.

W. B. Bayley, Esq.

not be superadded without imminent danger to the public interests. In those provinces where the detailed settlement absorbed, and in the opinion of the best informed persons, would continue for very many years, to absorb the attention of the collectors, and where they were in future, by a recent enactment, to undertake the investigation of almost every question which could arise relative to rights and interests connected with landed property, I could not contemplate the conjunction of the two offices in the same individual, without entertaining serious apprehensions, that as heretofore one or other department must suffer in the union. It appeared to me important, therefore, that separate magistrates should be appointed wherever practicable. The following memorandum exhibits, in a concise point of view, the nature and extent of the alterations which would be effected in the system by the measures proposed.

JUDICIAL ESTABLISHMENT.

PRESENT SYSTEM.

1. Moonsiffs empowered to receive, try and determine suits preferred to them for money and other personal property not exceeding 150 sicca rupees, provided the cause of action shall have arisen within the period of three years previously to the institution of the suit.

2. Sudder Aumeens authorized to determine original suits referred to them to the extent of 500, and specially 1,000, and to hear appeals from the decisions of the Moonsiffs.

3. Registers empowered to determine suits up to rupees 500, and specially to any extent referred from the judges' file, as well as appeals from the Moonsiffs and Sudder Aumeens.

4. Zillah and City Judges empowered to determine suits to the amount or value of 10,000 rupees, and regular and special appeals from the Registrar and native functionaries.

5. Provincial Courts with original jurisdiction in all cases preferred to them, above the value of 5,000 rupees, and appeals regular and special from the Zillah and City Judges and Sudder Aumeens.

6. Court of Sudder Dewanny and Nizamat Adawlut, consisting of five judges, a registrar, deputy, &c.

PROPOSED SYSTEM.

Powers extended to 300 rupees, without any restriction in regard to the limitation of time beyond what is contained in the Regulations with reference to suits generally.

Powers extended to 1,000 rupees generally, and appeals from the Moonsiffs as before.

Office of Registrar discontinued, and special Sudder Aumeens established for determining suits from 1,000 rupees to 5,000, and appeals from the ordinary Sudder Aumeens.

Original jurisdiction restricted generally to suits the amount of which is not less than 5,000, and to the cognizance of appeals from the native judicial functionaries; jurisdiction in summary suits for rent transferred entirely to the collector.

Provincial Courts to be abolished as soon as they shall have completed the business now depending before them.

Two Sudder Courts, one for the Lower Provinces on the same establishment as before, and the other for the Western Provinces, to consist of three judges, one registrar, assistant, &c.

1833. It is understood that the improvements proposed in the latter part of that minute have been in a considerable degree acted upon subsequently?—I have reason reason to know that it has been determined to establish a distinct court of Sudder Dewanny Adawlut and Nizamut Adawlut in the Western Provinces, to limit the original jurisdiction of the zillah and city judges to suits above 5,000 rupees in value, all suits below that amount being rendered cognizable by native judges. The salaries of the native judges have been fixed at different rates, some at 100 rupees a month, some at 150 rupees a month, some at 250 rupees a month, and some at 500 rupees a month. The provincial courts are gradually to be abolished as well as the office of registrar, and summary suits for rent are to be transferred to the collectors. In addition to those changes, it has been resolved to unite the offices of magistrate and collector, to confer police powers on tehsildars, to relieve the revenue commissioners from their duties as criminal judges, and to confide those duties to the zillah and city judges. The latter arrangements were not advocated by me; I do not concur in the expediency of generally uniting the offices of magistrate and collector, or of giving police power to the subordinate revenue officers, and I think that the zillah and city judges cannot perform the duties now executed by circuit judges, without precluding them from the effectual administration of civil justice.

16 April 1832.

W. B. Bayley, Esq.

884. Will you state what your objections are to the union of the functions of collectors and magistrates?—The objections are very fully stated in paragraphs 185 to 200 of a letter addressed to the Court of Directors by the government of Bengal, under date of the 22d of February 1827. The chief practical objection in my judgment is, that the collectors of the extensive districts in the ceded and conquered provinces, whose time is already entirely occupied by their other duties, and must continue to be so occupied till the formation of a permanent settlement of the land revenue, cannot adequately perform the additional functions of a magistrate and superintendent of police. The same objection may likewise be applied to several collectorships in the province of Benares and in the Lower Provinces. Other objections exist, but this is the principal one.

885. Do you think that on principle there is any objection to the union of the functions of justice with those of revenue?—I do; but the objection does not appear such as to prevent the arrangements where the officers may have leisure and capacity to undertake both duties. The objections to vesting tehsildars and other subordinate native officers of revenue with the power and functions of police officers, appear to me very serious, conceiving as I do that they would be more likely to abuse their authority even than the present class of police officers. My own opinion, as to the best mode of administering the internal affairs of our old established provinces is, that there should be a separate judge, a separate collector, and a separate magistrate in each district; this plan has been urged and recommended in paragraphs 201 to 208 of the letter addressed to the Court of Directors on the 22d of February 1827, to which I have already referred.

886. Will you suggest any improvements which occur to you in the system of administering civil justice?—I have no doubt that by degrees still more extensive powers may be safely vested in the native judges, and that in the course of time our European judicial officers ought to have no other share in the administration of civil justice than that of superintending the proceedings and hearing appeals from the native judges. At the same time I repeat, that much of our success in qualifying qualifying the natives for such trusts is owing to the manner in which those powers have been gradually conferred upon them. The native judges now decide about nineteen-twentieths of all the causes adjudicated by our civil courts; the delay in those cases does not on the average exceed seven or eight months from the first institution to the decision of the suit. In the remaining cases, which are of higher amount, the delay is undoubtedly great; but generally speaking, the delays of our courts are less injurious, in my opinion, than is supposed in this country. It is of course desirable to expedite the decision of all civil controversies as much as possible consistently with justice; and there are means, in my opinion, by which that object may be promoted. The heavy arrear of civil business in our European tribunals in the Lower Provinces is ascribable chiefly to the precipitation with which the permanent settlement was carried into effect, without sufficiently ascertaining and recording the rights and interests of the various classes of proprietors and cultivators of the soil in relation to each other and to the government. The arrears have been further augmented by growing confidence in our tribunals, by the increased value of land, the increased population, and the march of general prosperity and improvement.

W. B. Bayley, Esq.

887. When you speak of Europeans superintending the native courts, do you mean that they should be present?—No; I meant merely that they should control and watch over the processes of inferior tribunals, acting as an appellate court, as a court ready to correct errors, to prevent abuses, and to apply a prompt remedy to any evils which might arise.

888. Under such a control, and with a power of appeal hanging over them, you conceive the natives might be fit to carry on the functions of judicature without the presence of Europeans?—Yes, their character and capacity for judicial business is improving every day, but they must be sufficiently encouraged and rewarded. In this case I am persuaded they will prove very trust-worthy.

889. Do you conceive that in that respect in which the natives were unfit, namely moral character, they are improving?—Yes, in connexion with an improved education.

890. State why you conceive that the delay which you admit has taken place to some extent in the administration of civil justice is not so injurious as is occasionally supposed?—I think the delay originates in a great degree in the parties themselves, in both parties being frequently desirous of protracting the decision of the court: suits of large amount may generally be supposed to concern rich individuals, to whom the delay of even two or three years in the realization of a claim is of less importance than of a small amount to a poor man. In the latter class of cases, that is, in 19 out of 20 of the whole number, the delay does not appear very considerable.

891. Do you conceive that means might be taken for expediting the proceedings?—I think so.

892. What are those means?—By far the greatest part of the business in the zillah courts, and no inconsiderable portion of that in the criminal courts (of the Lower Provinces especially) originates in the want of Regulations explaining and recognizing the different tenures, and of records defining the relative rights, interests and duties of the proprietors, tenants and cultivators of the soil. I am persuaded that not more than one quarter of the business in our civil courts arises from claims or disputes unconnected with land. For the adjustment of mercantile disputes, debts and simple contracts, little more is required than the application of general principles of equity, regulated by a due regard to established usages and customs. What we chiefly want are accurate records and regulations, defining the rights and interests of the cultivators and proprietors of land, in relation to each other and to the government. An intelligible exposition of Hindoo and Mahomedan law would also be useful. It is true that the principles of the law of inheritance, and generally speaking the main branches of the civil law of the Mahomedans, are pretty well known, and do not very frequently give rise to conflicting or irreconcilable opinions amongst the Mahomedan lawyers. By the aid of precedents in cases decided by the Supreme Court and Sudder Dewanny Adawlut, the leading principles of the Mahomedan civil law might be embodied, and might be determined and recognized without difficulty. It is far otherwise, however, with the Hindoo law. On the most important questions connected with the Hindoo law of inheritance, adoption and gift, different commentators give different expositions, and not only pundits of different provinces, but those at the same place, will often give opposite bebustaks on the same question. Some of the most important questions of this description have been decided by the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut. Reports of the cases have been printed, which now form precedents for the guidance of the civil courts, and the Hindoo law may be considered therefore to be fixed as to the specific cases in point. In addition to those cases, the decisions of the Supreme Court in Calcutta, of the Supreme Court and Sudder Adawlut at Madras, and of the Recorder's Court and Court of Ultimate Appeal at Bombay, on questions of Hindoo law, would furnish other adjudicated precedents, some of which might be adopted and recognized as law. Still these cases would be far too few to serve as a solid basis for general legislation, and a long period must elapse before they would materially increase in number and value. To form a plain, practical and efficient code of laws for the administration of civil justice amongst the Hindoos, and perhaps the Mahomedans also, especially in relation to the most important heads, such as inheritance, adoption, dower, gift and some others, the plan suggested by Mr. Mill in his History of British India, appears to me the only one likely to be attended with success. The following extract will show what I mean: "In the first place, as the law, according to what we have already seen, is in a state in which it is to a great degree incapable of performing the offices of law, and must remain almost wholly impotent in a situation in which the deficiencies of law are not supplied by manners, let the law be reformed and put into that state in which alone it is adapted to answer the ends for which it is intended. Let the laws, whatever they may be for the security of existing rights, or the attainment of future advantages, be determined to be, receive what alone can bestow upon them a fixed or real existence; let them all be expressed in a written form of words, words as precise and accurate as it is possible to make them, and let them be published in a book." This is what is understood by a code; without such a code there can be no good administration of justice in such a state of things as that in India; there can, without it, be no such administration of justice as consists with any tolerable degree of human happiness or national prosperity. In providing this most important instrument of justice, the further difficulty will be found than the application of the due measure of virtue and intelligence not to be looked for in the classes whose interests the vices of the law promote. Sir William Jones and others recognized the demand for a code of Indian law, but unhappily thought of no better expedient than that of employing some of the natives themselves, as if one of the most difficult tasks to which the human mind can be applied, a work to which the highest measure of European intelligence is not more than equal, could be expected to be tolerably performed by the unenlightened and perverted intellects of a few Indian pundits. With no sanction of reason could anything better be expected than that which was in reality produced, a disorderly compilation of loose, vague, stupid or unintelligible quotations and maxims, selected arbitrarily from books of law, books of devotion, and books of poetry, attended with a commentary which only adds to the mass of absurdity and darkness, a farrago by which nothing is defined, nothing established, and from which, in the distribution of justice, no assistance beyond the materials of a gross inference can for any purpose be derived. To apply the authority of religion, or any other authority than that of the government, to the establishment of law, is now unnecessary, because the great and multiplied changes which the English have made in all the interior regulations of society have already destroyed, in the minds of the natives, the association between the ideas of religion and the ideas of law. But at any time for combining the authority of religion with that of law, nothing more was required than what might still be advisable, namely, to associate the most celebrated of the pundits. For digesting the law into an accurate code, such men would be altogether unqualified; but they might lend their peculiar and local knowledge to him to whom the task is assigned, and they might easily and effectually annex the authority of religion to his definitions, by subjoining quotations from their sacred books, and declaring the words of the code to be the true interpretation of them. The law of the natives, and the minds of its interpreters, are equally pliant. The words to which any appeal can be made, as the words of the law, are so vague and so variable, that they can be accommodated to any meaning; and such is the eagerness of the pundits to raise themselves in the esteem of their masters, that they show the greatest desire to extract from the loose language of their sacred books whatever opinions they conceive to bear the greatest resemblance to theirs. It would require but little management to obtain the cordial co-operation of the doctors, both Moslem and Hindoo, in covering the whole field of law with accurate definitions and provisions, giving security to all existing rights, and the most beneficial order to those which were yet to accrue." The difficulty of successfully executing a task of this nature is considerable. The public officer or officers employed upon it should be in possession of qualifications not ordinarily to be found in the same person, viz. a familiar acquaintance with the habits and feelings of the natives, an intimate knowledge of the Sanscrit language, some, if not a very extensive, acquaintance with the civil laws both of ancient Rome and of the nations of Europe, a clear and comprehensive judgment, and great industry. The promulgation of a code so concocted and supported by the opinion of the pundits and natives, as to its general correspondence, in its main features, with the doctrines of Hindu and Mahomedan commentators, would not shock the prejudice of the natives, although it might be found in some instances to differ from the construction commonly prevailing in some parts of the country, or amongst some tribes and sects, and in others even to be decidedly at variance with principles hitherto more generally recognized. The minute subdivision of real property, which both the Hindoo and Mahomedan laws of inheritance have a rapid and direct tendency to produce, is a very serious evil, and might be beneficially restrained. It might also be rendered imperative that all mutations and transfers of real property, all wills, deeds of dower, gift and adoption, should be recorded in registry-offices established on similar principles to the registry required by law in Scotland, Middlesex, and part of Yorkshire. Benamie transfers or transfers in fictitious names of real property might be guarded against. With regard to Regulations which relate to particular branches of revenue, such as salt, opium, customs, stamps, coinage, or to the duties, powers and functions of different classes of our native officers, or to the forms of procedure in any particular department of the administration, the details of each subject might be consolidated and included in a distinct law, to which all subsequent rules or emendations might be annexed as a supplement. This has already been done in many instances in Bengal, and generally at Bombay. All or most of these measures would be beneficial; but they appear to me to be matters of much less importance than that of defining and recognizing the claims, rights and interests of the various classes of cultivators, farmers and proprietors of the land. To the want of such information is to be ascribed almost all our difficulties in the administration of civil justice, and the chief part of whatever distress and oppression prevails in the Lower Provinces.

16 April 1832.

W. B. Bayley, Esq.

16 April 1832.

W. B. Bayley, Esq.

16 April 1832.

W. B. Bayley, Esq.

893. Would it not be possible to make provision in any code for the various customs of different districts?—Certainly. I do not of course propose that there should be one code for the whole of India, or for all the provinces under one presidency; but by supplying the defect which I stated of the want of records, by defining the rights and tenures of the cultivators of the soil, and the different classes of tenantry, we should do more to diminish the mass of civil business, than by any other measure which occurs to me.

894. Notwithstanding our administration of civil justice has been defective, do you think it has been sufficiently good to attract the confidence of the natives in general?—I do. Their confidence in the European courts proceeds no doubt from their opinion of our greater integrity, and the superiority of our moral character; but if the natives had the same advantages in those respects, I should consider them infinitely better qualified for the administration of justice in India than any European possibly can be.

895. Do you conceive that the natives would become qualified for the situation of justices of the peace?—I feel more hesitation in giving an opinion as to their fitness at present to exercise the powers of a magistrate, but I see no reason why by degrees they should not be entrusted with duties of the nature alluded to. They are already empowered to take cognizance of, and to punish for petty offences.

896. Would there be an objection to render them eligible to be justices of the peace, at least at the presidencies, leaving it to the local government to select individuals who might be qualified to discharge the duties of the office?—Under the vigilant superintendence of an European officer, the experiment might be tried without material danger, but I do not think they could be trusted trated with extensive magisterial functions, especially at a distance from European superintendence.

W. B. Bayley, Esq.

897. Are there any defects in the laws on any particular subject which you think require to be removed?—I think it desirable that the laws on the subject of usury should be modified or abolished. Our laws with regard to interest are, that claims upon bonds, &c. stipulating for more than 12 per cent. are void so far as regards the interest; a plaintiff cannot obtain a judgment for interest in such cases; though if the rate of interest has been openly stated on the face of the document, however much it may exceed the legal rate, our courts can give judgment for the principal; if, on the contrary, there be any attempt to elude the law, by a deduction from the loan, or by other disguise, neither principal nor interest can be recovered in our courts. In lieu of this law, I would leave parties at liberty to fix their own terms, without any restraint whatever.

898. You would have the rate of interest wholly unregulated by law, and that that particular agreement should be vitiated as others would be, only by fraud?—Just so.

899. The rate of interest is now much below 12 per cent., is it not?—Among respectable bankers and European traders in large towns, the rate of interest is much below 12 per cent., but in small dealings in the interior among the natives, it is much larger; 24 and 30 per cent. is not at all unusual. The borrowers pay, of course, for the risk which is run by the lenders in violating the law. Another measure which would facilitate the administration of justice has been already adverted to; I mean the registry of deeds in the manner long practised in Scotland. The process also, in cases of bond debts, and of other claims on written documents, might be materially simplified, and the decision of such cases greatly expedited. We might limit the minute subdivision of landed property which now prevails to an injurious extent both amongst Hindoos and Mahomedans. Lastly, I would say that every effort should be made to raise the standard of qualification of European judges, as well as of native judges.

900. In what manner do you conceive that the qualifications of the native judges may be raised?—By suitable salaries and a more perfect education. Integrity is in one sense a purchaseable article, and by paying the natives whom we employ more liberally, we shall have a much better chance of securing that qualification in which they are most deficient. By the process of an improved education we are now raising up men infinitely better fitted by their knowledge for the discharge of judicial and other duties than the country has yet furnished.

901. Would the increased emolument have the effect of merely improving those who would otherwise attain those situations, or be candidates for them, or do you think it would be the means of attracting into the profession men of a higher caste?—It would sometimes perhaps attract men of higher rank, and possessing better qualifications, and the enjoyment of an office of considerable emolument would generally render the temptation to be corrupt much less powerful, and would make men careful to avoid the hazard of the loss of their offices by misconduct.

902. With regard to the qualifications of the Europeans who are to exercise judicial functions, what means would you suggest for the improvement of those?—By a more careful selection in England of the individuals who are destined for the civil civil service generally, and in India by a selection of the very ablest and most competent of those civil servants for judicial offices.

16 April 1832.

W. B. Bayley, Esq.

903. Are not the fittest persons selected in India for judicial situations, generally speaking?—For the higher offices I think they are, but not always for the situation of zillah and city judges. I think that latterly the feeling has been towards appointing the ablest men to the revenue department, the duties of which are indeed highly important, particularly in the Western Provinces.

904. What effect has the institution at Haileybury had with regard to the qualifications of the writers, as evinced in India?—Speaking from a general recollection of the young men of my own standing, and of those who subsequently came out before the College at Haileybury existed, I should say that I have not observed any very material improvement from the education of Haileybury. Better qualified persons for the civil service in India might be obtained by appointing to Haileybury two or even three individuals for every one individual who is ultimately destined for the civil service in India, so that out of 20 or 30 men the 10 best should be selected. It is in vain to deny the fact, that very unfit men have occasionally gone out as civil servants to India. Another suggestion which I have heard is, that officers for civil duties in India should be selected from the general body of military officers in the Honourable Company's service, after they shall have been for a considerable time employed in the country, and their qualifications, talents and capacity shall have been fully developed and ascertained.

905. According to that scheme, all those who are to serve the Company would go out as officers in the army, and be eligible afterwards for civil situations?—Yes; the prize would be so valuable that it would induce a great number of the young officers to study the languages, and to conduct themselves with propriety, and generally to qualify themselves for situations in the civil service; the only danger would be, that undue influence might be used in the selection of the individuals.

906. Would not there be a danger of raising discontent in the army on the part of those not selected?—That danger certainly would exist in some degree; but the same objection may be urged against a selection of officers from the whole body of the army for staff situations, not merely of a strictly military nature, but of a civil nature. Several military men are employed in the political department, and in charge of districts as collectors and magistrates.

907. Would you recommend the adoption of the plans you have proposed; or do you merely suggest them for consideration?—I merely allude to them as deserving consideration, not having formed any very decided opinion upon the subject myself.

908. Recurring to the questions of qualification to be acquired in England by writers going to India, do you conceive that means should be taken of giving a full education in the principles of law to the writers, or some of them; or would it be proper that the selection of European servants for the judicial or other situations should be made only in India?—I am of opinion that it would be desirable that the education of young men destined for the civil service in India should be carried to a greater extent than it is at present in England; that they should not go out to India much before the age of 21 or 22; that they should have every possible advantage advantage of general education in England, without any of their time being sacrificed, as I think it is sacrificed, to the study of native languages; and that the selection ultimately for judicial offices should be made exclusively in India: but I would give, if possible, to those young men who in India make choice of or are selected for the judicial department, special opportunities of attending the superior courts of justice; both the Supreme Court and the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut. Instruction in the general principles of civil law and the laws of evidence would be useful; but I would say, that no one can be well qualified for a judicial office in India without going through some of the details of the revenue department in the interior of the country, as giving them the opportunities of becoming familiarly acquainted with the language, the people, and the usages of the country, and with questions most frequently litigated in our courts of justice.

W. B. Bayley, Esq.

909. On the supposition that a young man, in the course of education in this country, showed any particular aptitude or inclination for some specific branch of study, do you see any objection to allowing his proving his qualification to go out, by his superior eminence in that department, without exacting from him an average share of qualification in other departments?—I am aware of no objection, provided his general character and past conduct be also satisfactory. A habit of dissipation and extravagance should be a complete disqualification for the service; it has, in individual instances, proved very injurious to the administration of India; and that is one motive for recommending that civil servants should leave England at a later period of life than they do at present.

910. Have the young writers arriving in Calcutta had opportunities of dissipation and temptations to it, which under a better system might be avoided?—There can be no doubt that the collection together of a number of young men in a place like Calcutta, which affords great facilities for dissipation, has led to much extravagance and much injury to individuals and the public; but of late years, during the administration of Lord William Bentinck, the mischiefs arising from that cause have, in my opinion, been materially diminished, so as not now to form any solid ground of objection to the College in Calcutta. Under the present vigilant superintendence, no young man who is either in a slight degree dissipated or habitually neglectful of his collegiate studies, is permitted to remain in Calcutta, but is immediately removed to a station in the interior of the country, and placed under the eye of some respectable civil servant. Those who do remain in Calcutta, who have no such tendency to dissipation, possess great facilities, by the establishment of the College of Fort William, for the acquisition of the native languages, and the period employed in acquiring those languages is very much shortened in consequence.

911. Do you think that a young man going out so late as 21 or 22 would be able to acquire the native languages sufficiently for the purposes of judicature?—I have no doubt that the acquisition of the languages would be rendered more difficult by the difference of age, but I see nothing to prevent a man at the age of 21 or 22 from acquiring the native languages with sufficient accuracy to transact those duties which would eventually devolve upon him.

912. If a writer does not go out till 21, might he not previously acquire some acquaintance with the rudiments of the languages, without its interfering with his general acquirements?—He certainly could do so; I have known individual instances stances of men coming out to India well acquainted with the Persian language, who have had no other instruction than that which England afforded to them; but there are so many more facilities for acquiring the languages on the spot, that it is almost a waste of time to study them in England. That time might be devoted to more important studies.

W. B. Bayley, Esq.

913. Do you think a person arriving there at 22 could acquire the language so as to hold familiar conversation and communication with the natives in their own language?—I see no reason why he should not; the organs of utterance are certainly not so flexible at a more advanced age, and probably he will not speak, as he would by learning at an earlier age, quite so idiomatically or with so perfect a pronunciation, as he would if he learnt the language on the spot at an earlier age.

914. You think it is not at all an insuperable obstacle?—I think it is not.

915. Will you state what is your opinion as to the efficiency of the present system of criminal justice established in the Company's courts; can you suggest any improvement in it?—I entertain, upon the whole, a very favourable opinion of the manner in which criminal justice is administered in the interior of the Company's provinces in the Bengal Presidency; our criminal laws are mild in the degree of punishment they award; prisoners are brought to trial without any great delay; abundant care is taken to guard against their being convicted unjustly; and, upon the whole, I think the system works very well. I am possessed of a memorandum intended to show the operation of the criminal laws and the state of crime under the Bengal Presidency. The Memorandum in question, with the Tables annexed, were prepared by the late lamented and very intelligent public officer, Mr. Edward Strachey, who sent them to me not long before his death. It was his intention to have submitted them to the Committee, as containing a full and satisfactory view of the operation of the criminal laws as administered in Bengal. The Memorandum commences with a short explanation of the system of police and criminal judicature established in the Lower and Western Provinces, explaining the powers and authorities exercised by the magistrates, the judges of circuit, and the Nizamut Adawlut. The Tables exhibit a list of the most heinous crimes ascertained to have been committed in the Lower and Western Provinces of Bengal for a series of years, the number of commitments and convictions in the criminal courts, with the punishments to which those convicted were sentenced. The results are afterwards compared with the convictions and punishments in England and Wales, in Ireland, and in several countries in Continental Europe.

[The witness delivered in the same, which was read. —See p. 126.]

Of late years the punishments formerly applicable to crimes of different denominations have been very much mitigated in severity; extraordinary care is paid to the comfort and health of the prisoners confined in our gaols; our police officers have been furnished with a manual of instructions (Regulation XX. 1817), which I conceive to be valuable in themselves, and to have operated to prevent in a considerable degree abuses which formerly were prevalent among the police officers; and, generally speaking, the whole system of police and administration of criminal justice has greatly improved of late years, and is in practice very efficient. I am of opinion that the use of oaths in our courts of justice might be abandoned with out injury, if not with advantage; the great cause of failure in the administration of criminal as well as of civil justice is the habitual disregard for truth, which unhappily pervades the bulk of the native community, and the little security which the obligation of an oath adds to the testimony of witnesses. I do not believe that this characteristic vice of the natives of India has been fostered or increased by the establishment of our courts of justice, as is generally imagined; the same vice has been found to prevail to at least an equal extent in Mysore, in the Mahratta country, and in other parts of India, to which our authority has not extended, and where our institutions were totally unknown; false testimony has, in certain cases, been directly encouraged and approved by the sanction of the great lawgiver of the Hindoos; the offence of perjury can be expiated by very simple penances, and the inhabitants of India generally must undergo a great moral regeneration before the evil which saps the very foundations of justice, and bars all confidence between man and man, shall be effectually remedied. My own impression is, that, generally speaking, the moral sanction of an oath does not, especially among the lower classes, materially add to the value of native testimony; that the only practical restraint on perjury, is dread of the punishment prescribed by law for that offence, and that the fear of consequences in a future state, or the apprehended loss of character and reputation amongst their countrymen, has little effect in securing true and honest testimony on the part of those who may be influenced by the bias of fear, favour or affection. I think the experiment of dispensing with oaths in civil and criminal cases of minor importance might be tried in the first instance, and afterwards extended, if it succeeded, to cases of higher importance. Already persons of respectability are exempted from taking an oath in our courts of justice on signing a solemn declaration, prescribed by the Regulations. Retrospective oaths are no longer taken by the law officers of our civil and criminal courts; and the ministerial native officer of the courts of judicature, and other native officers employed in the judicial or revenue departments, or in any public office whatsoever, are no longer compelled to take and subscribe an oath previously to entering upon the discharge of the duties of the office, but are now required only to subscribe a solemn declaration to the same effect. Every effort has been made by the government to promote a knowledge of our laws, by publishing, both in the English and native languages, abstracts and digests of them, as well as precedents of cases decided by the highest tribunals, and by instructing those natives who are destined for public situations in the principles of our judicial administration, as far as it can be done in the colleges and seminaries established by government. The progress of education in India within the last six or eight years, has been very rapid; and if funds could be afforded, a much larger supply of native officers, fitted for the administration of the affairs of the country, might be furnished. I do not think that there is any chance of the English language being introduced generally, or being made a substitute for the Persian language in our courts of justice; it might indeed be brought into use by degrees in the districts immediately proximate to Calcutta, but even then I should doubt the advantage or utility of a change.

916. Is the evidence of witnesses who do not understand Persian, put down in the Persian language, and in that only?—Every witness has the option of having his evidence taken down in Persian, or in the language or dialect with which he is most familiar, and in Bengal, I believe it to be the general practice to take down and record the evidence of the Hindoo natives of Bengal in the Bengalese language. Mahomedans, who speak the Hindostanee language, generally have their evidence taken down in Persian; the Hindostanee language having no proper character of its own, and Persian being understood by every Mahomedan of education. In the Western Provinces the dialects are various, and the Naguree character cannot be written very rapidly. On these accounts the evidence is, I believe, generally recorded in the Persian language.

W. B. Bayley, Esq.

917. You have stated your opinion as to the present state of civil and criminal justice in the courts of Bengal, and have suggested some improvements. On the supposition that there was an increased number of Europeans, either as settlers or as mere residents in the interior of the country, do you conceive that the present courts, or generally the present judicial system of the country, could remain, or that the improvements to which you have adverted could be in that case successfully introduced?—My answer to that question would be guided a good deal by the number of Englishmen likely to proceed to India. If the number were small, I should not consider any changes exclusively for the benefit of those few individuals necessary; if the number, on the contrary, was very considerable, and if it were designed to encourage the influx of Englishmen into the interior of India, then undoubtedly some changes would be desirable; but whatever changes are effected, if they are really improvements, should be shared by the natives in an equal degree with Englishmen. I think that we ought not to legislate with a special regard for Englishmen, and that the natives have a superior claim to consideration in questions of improving our system for the administration of justice in India. At the present moment foreign Europeans, Frenchmen, Dutchmen and Germans, of whom there are many individuals in the interior of our provinces, are subject to our laws and tribunals, civil and criminal, on precisely the same footing as the natives of India, and I have never heard of any serious complaints upon that point; at the same time, whatever improvements in the laws themselves or their administration may be desirable, should I think be left to the local administration in India, and should not emanate, except as regards general principles, from England. If the Parliament of Great Britain could be satisfied with leaving the legislative powers in the hands of the Governor-General and Council exclusively in India, I should prefer that to a Legislative Council; but if, as is perhaps to be expected, such should not be considered desirable, I see no objection to the plan proposed in Bengal of establishing a Legislative Council, comprising the judges of the Supreme Court and the members of government; nor should I see any objection to the admission of other persons into the Council, provided they were to be selected by the government in India, with the approbation of the home authorities.

918. If increased facilities were given to the entrance of Europeans into the interior of the country, and to their residence and settlement, do you think that a materially increased number of British subjects would be found to avail themselves of such facilities?—My impression is, that very exaggerated notions are entertained in England both of the advantages and disadvantages likely to result from affording increased facilities to the admission of British subjects into the interior of India.

I do

16 April 1832.

W. B. Bayley, Esq.

I do not think there would be any great influx of Englishmen, under any advantages which could be held out to them in India, or that they would bring any great accession of capital to that already existing there; and I do not, therefore, anticipate either any large benefits or any considerable injury from such a change in the present system.

919. What are your particular reasons for supposing there might not be a considerable influx of Europeans into India, if there were unlimited powers given to them to resort thither?—I think that of late years those who were desirous of settling there have had little or no difficulty in doing so. The government of Bengal has rarely, if ever, refused the application (however contrary to law) of individuals who wished to go into the interior of the country; and the Board of Control have, I believe, granted permission in instances in which it had been refused by the Court of Directors. My opinion that no capital will be brought from England into India arises from little or none having been brought hitherto, even at periods when interest has been at a much higher rate than it now is.

920. Do you think more capital would not go to India if the restriction on Europeans resorting to India was altogether taken away?—I do not think that capital would be sent from England, but I think that capital which would be otherwise remitted to England would probably remain in India.

921. Do you not think that Europeans without capital, persons of broken fortunes and character, might be tempted to go out as adventurers?—That is a mischief to be apprehended; but I think that they would fail of success there, and that their residence would be of short duration.

922. Might they not in the meantime create disturbance in the interior of India, if they were allowed indiscriminately to go there?—I think if there were no power vested in government to remove them that would be the case.

923. You think that a discretionary power ought to be vested in the government of India to remove Europeans who disturbed the peace of the country?—I would say, it is not necessary to remove them from India, but that a discretionary power should be vested in the government of removing them from the interior of the country to the presidency. I think that permission should be obtained by individuals wishing to go from Calcutta into the interior, and that the government should have the power of removing individuals grossly misconducting themselves from the country to the presidency; Europeans might be guilty of violent, insulting and offensive conduct, which though not perhaps punishable by law, might be extremely irritating and distressing to the natives.

924. You think that might answer the purpose without the power of deportation?—Yes, I think that the latter would then be unnecessary. So long as the government could remove them from the interior to Calcutta, the chief cause of danger would cease.

925. Supposing, for argument sake, an increased number of Europeans in the interior of the country subject to provincial judicature, do you think it would be possible in that case to extend the powers of employment of natives as judges in the provincial courts in the manner contemplated by some of your previous answers?—I think that under no circumstances would an Englishman residing in the interior of the country like to be subjected to the jurisdiction of a native judge either civil or criminal.

16 April 1832.

W. B. Bayley, Esq.

926. Do you think it advisable that he should be?—I cannot say that I do; unless the number of Europeans were great, I see no reason why an European judge should not be associated with a native judge in the cognizance of the few cases where Europeans were parties, the other parties being natives.

927. How far are foreign Europeans who reside in the interior of the country subject to the jurisdiction of the Company's courts?—In criminal cases they are subject like the natives to the jurisdiction of the Magistrates' Court, the Court of Circuit and the Nizamut Adawlut, all of which are superintended by British European subjects, and are not liable to be sentenced to punishment by a native. The only natives who are vested in any degree with the administration of criminal justice are the Sudder Aumeens, to whom petty cases are referred, assaults and trespasses and petty thefts and slight misdemeanors, at the discretion of the magistrate. In such cases they can award a judgment of imprisonment not exceeding fifteen days, and a small fine, but not corporeal punishment.

928. May those judgments be carried into effect without the authority of the magistrate?—The parties have a right to appeal to the magistrate from them, but if there is no appeal they are carried into effect.

929. Would Europeans, not British subjects, be subjected to those persons?—If the magistrate chose to refer the case to them they would, but that has rarely, if ever, been done, and I think it would be generally considered objectionable. In civil cases, a foreign European would have his claim decided precisely in the same manner as the natives themselves.

930. Has the circumstance of a foreigner, being subject in civil cases to the jurisdiction of the country courts, been found to operate as an obstacle to foreign Europeans settling or residing in those districts?—No, I do not think that their being subject to those courts has operated in the slightest degree to prevent their settling in India. Generally speaking, I should say the magistrate would not refer the cases of foreign Europeans to native judges, but would rather retain them on his own file, and this not from consideration to the European, but to the native judge himself; the danger being, in my opinion, that the native judge would either from fear or other motive be inclined to do more for the European or British subject than for the native.

931. Do you think that the employment of the natives in the administration of civil justice in India beyond that you have mentioned, would be satisfactory to the natives themselves?—I think that the natives employed as judges will, if properly treated and remunerated, merit and receive increased confidence from their countrymen as well as from Europeans, and this in the administration of criminal as well as of civil justice.

932. Can you give the Committee any information with respect to the costs of suit in the country courts of Bengal?—The amount of the expense to which the parties are subjected in the adjudication of cases in our civil courts in the interior of the country, has, I think, been misunderstood; the costs incurred by both parties in civil suits cognizable in the courts of Moonsiffs and Sudder Aumeens, which vary in their value from 10 to 500 rupees. or from 1*l.* to 50*l.* sterling. In cluding the expense of both parties from the commencement to the conclusion of the suit, amount on an average to 22 per cent. In suits from 500 to 5,000 rupees, or in those ordinarily cognizable by the Zillah Judges, the costs to both parties, as above explained, average about 16 per cent. of the value of the thing litigated. In the class of suits tried by the Provincial Judges, the expense is, on the average proportion, nine per cent. In suits cognizable by the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut, about six per cent. Those results were founded on official inquiries made in the year 1818; they include all authorized costs and expenses of every description charged to both plaintiff and defendant, the institution fee, the fees on exhibits and processes of all kinds, stamps, paper, pleader's fees, allowances to witnesses, &c. The amount is charged in the decree to the plaintiff or to the defendant, or divided between the parties, according to the nature of the decision. The expense, considerable as it appears in cases below 500 rupees, is not heavy, when compared with that incurred by litigants in courts of law or equity in England in contested claims to a similar amount.

W. B. Bayley, Esq.

933. If a suit goes through all its stages, the per-centage must be added in each court?—Yes; but in appeals the expense of taking fresh evidence is rarely incurred, and the pleadings are much shorter.

934. Are you favourable to the mode of trying by punchayet?—The subject of the punchayet has been very fully discussed in paragraphs 33 to 72 of a Despatch, dated 22d February 1827, from the Bengal Government to the Court of Directors. That Despatch contains a general review of the judicial administration, civil and criminal, under the Presidency of Bengal; and I beg leave to refer to it for my sentiments generally on the actual state, and the means of improving our judicial system.

See Appendix.

I am adverse to the introduction of punchayets as a formal and legalized part of our system for the settlement of claims to real or personal property, but as an institution for regulating questions of caste and religious discipline, of alleged breaches of the conventional rules or bye-laws of trades, professions, societies or classes of people united for civil or religious purposes, I consider the punchayet to be highly useful; it exercises a species of jurisdiction for which our tribunals are particularly ill qualified, and it is very important that the jurisdiction should remain as long as possible with those to whom it is confided by the voluntary acquiescence and submission of the parties most deeply interested.

It is a subject of regret that the natives can rarely be prevailed upon to submit ordinary civil controversies to the adjustment of a punchayet by arbitration.

Every European judge urges and encourages parties in suits before him to adopt this course, but with very little success. I may observe, that the Bombay Regulations authorize the European judges presiding over civil or criminal courts to seek assistance, whenever they may desire it, from respectable natives, by employing them as assessors; but without allowing their opinion to bind or control the final decision of the judge.

I think that a similar rule might be adopted with advantage in the courts under the Bengal Presidency.

TABLES intended to show the Operation of the CRIMINAL LAWS and the State of CRIME in BENGAL; referred to in the Evidence of W. B. Bayley, Esq., p. 120.

REMARKS.

THE countries here referred to are not the whole territory under the Bengal government, but that part of it only (called the Lower and Western Provinces) which is subject to the General Regulations.

Some explanation of the system of police and criminal judicature established in those countries is necessary before the Tables are particularly noticed.

The police jurisdictions under darogahs were originally intended to include spaces of about 20 miles square, but they are of greater or less extent as circumstances require. There are from 15 to 20 thannahs or darogahs' stations in a zillah, the total number being in the Lower Provinces near 500, and in the Western near 400. At each station under the darogah are a mohurer or writer, and a jemadar, with from 20 to 50 burkundauzes, peons, or irregular soldiers. It is not to be understood that the whole business of the police is performed by these establishments. The zemindars or their agents, or other local officers or servants under them, are required to give immediate information at the principal police station of all crimes committed within their limits, and the duty of tracing and apprehending criminals is chiefly performed by the village officers or servants under the occasional direction and supervision of some person from the thannah.

The darogahs report their proceedings regularly to the magistrate, and receive orders from him. Their principal duties are to receive criminal charges, to hold inquests, to forward accused persons with their prosecutors and witnesses to the magistrate, and generally to perform such acts as the regulations prescribe with a view to the discovery, apprehension and ultimate trial of offenders. The darogahs are prohibited from taking cognizance of charges for adultery, fornication, calumny, abusive language, slight trespass, and inconsiderable assaults; persons who prefer such complaints are to be referred to the magistrate.

The magistrate's duty is to apprehend all disturbers of the peace and persons charged before him with crimes and misdemeanors; he is authorized to try complaints for certain offences, and to punish to a certain extent. In other cases he commits offenders to be tried before the Court of Circuit. In cases of burglary, theft or other depredations not amounting to robbery by open violence, and of affrays unattended with aggravating circumstances, the magistrates are empowered to inflict punishment as far as two years' imprisonment, with hard labour and stripes with a rattan. For other offences the magistrates are empowered to punish as far as imprisonment for one year, or fine not exceeding 200 rupees. The crimes for which magistrates are authorized to inflict these punishments are in the regulations only, referred to generally in these words: "In all cases of conviction before them of any criminal offence punishable by the Mahomedan law and the Regulations,"* magistrates' assistants, when specially authorized by government, are empowered to punish to the extent of imprisonment for a year, or 200 rupees fine; and in cases of theft, 30 stripes with a rattan. Assistants not vested with special powers are authorized to punish in various cases of petty offences to the extent of 15 days' imprisonment, and a fine of 50 rupees, commutable;

* The Regulations, however, do not specify what those offences are which are punishable by the Mahomedan law, nor do they require that any reference should be made by the magistrate to a Mahomedan law officer, as in the Court of Circuit; and the offences declared by the Regulations to be punishable by the magistrates are spoken of merely as petty offences; such as abusive language, calumny, inconsiderable assaults, or affrays and petty thefts.

16 April 1832.

W. B. Bayley, Esq.

mutable, if the fine be not paid, to 15 days further imprisonment; and in cases of petty theft, to the extent of 30 stripes with a rattan, and a month's imprisonment. The Hindoo or Mahomedan law officers of the Zillah Courts also are empowered to try petty cases referred to them by the magistrates, and to inflict punishment to the extent allowed to assistants not vested with special powers. There were in 1825, in the Lower and Western Provinces, including Cuttack, 63 stations of magistrates and joint magistrates.

The Courts of Circuit, before the changes introduced in 1829, consisted each of four or more judges, with two Mahomedan law officers. There were four of these tribunals at principal stations in the Lower Provinces, and two in the Western. When the judges were on circuit, one of them, with a law officer as an assessor, formed a court, and held half-yearly sessions and gaol deliveries at each station, the judges going in rotation within their own divisions. Before this court all prisoners committed or held to bail by the magistrate were tried. The number of stations of magistrate and joint magistrates visited by them, were 29 in the Lower Provinces, and 21 in the Western. The duties of the circuit are in future to be performed by a commissioner; but the rules for the conduct of this officer as a judge of circuit are generally the same as the old ones. When the proceedings on a trial are closed, the law officer gives his futwa, or law exposition on the case. If the futwa acquit the prisoner, the judge, if he concur in the acquittal, orders the prisoner to be released. If the futwa declare the prisoner guilty, the judge, if he concur, and is empowered by the Regulations to pass final sentence in the case, passes sentence accordingly. If he disapprove the futwa, or is not authorized to pass a final sentence, he refers the proceedings to the Nizamut Adawlut. The judge of circuit is competent, in certain cases, to pass sentence to the extent of 14 years' imprisonment, and corporeal punishment. If the prisoner be liable to perpetual imprisonment, or the punishment of death, the proceedings are sent to the Nizamut Adawlut; in the former case sentence is passed by the judge of circuit, but it requires the confirmation of the Nizamut Adawlut, and in the latter he does not pass sentence. The Mahomedan law (notwithstanding the futwa) is not always the guide of the circuit judge, it is modified by many enactments of the Regulations, and it is according to the Regulations, and not, strictly speaking, according to the Mahomedan law that criminal justice is administered in the Courts of Circuit. These courts are bound to conduct their proceedings under prescribed rules. They are, moreover, vested with powers of superintendence and control over the magistrates within their respective divisions. They can call for the magistrate's proceedings, and pass such orders on them as they think proper. The judges on circuit, after their half-year gaol deliveries at every zillah station, make a report to the Nizamut Adawlut, comprising an account of all such matters as they deem of importance to communicate relating to the police and administration of criminal justice in each zillah, with any propositions for improvement which they may think fit to make, and the Nizamut Adawlut forward the reports with their comments to Government.

The Nizamut Adawlut, or superior criminal court stationed at Calcutta, has for some years past consisted of five judges, with a sufficient number of law officers. By this court orders or sentences are passed on trials referred to them by the Court of Circuit. They are empowered to mitigate punishments, and in cases not specially provided for, they can inflict on criminals, punishment to any extent short of death. They superintend and control the proceedings of the Courts of Circuit and the magistrates; they take cognizance of all matters relating to the administration of justice in criminal cases, and to the police of the country, and they expound the Regulations in all doubtful points.

The powers of all the judicial officers have been from time to time defined and modified by various regulations, and rules of procedure, with every check against abuse, and every safeguard for justice that could be devised, have been prescribed. In every case provision is made for the due reception of all evidence on both sides, all the proceedings are recorded, and all (except those before the Nizamut Adawlut) are subject to a revision by a superior court.

W. B. Bayley, Esq.

Although all final sentences of death, or perpetual imprisonment, are passed by the judges of the Nizamut Adawlut, the opinions of the judges of circuit, of the law officers, of the Court of Circuit, and of the law officers of the Nizamut Adawlut, must be submitted to them with the trial in every case, and must be considered before such sentences can be passed. Under the checks thus provided, the fate of persons subject to the extreme penalty of the law is decided with the most scrupulous care and humanity *.

In some parts of Europe (England and France for example), where information affecting the interests of men in society is extensively and easily diffused, most of the offences highly injurious to individuals or to the community are made generally known soon after they are committed, but no accounts of them are recorded; and it is only by statements of the operation of the criminal courts that any sort of approach can be made to an official knowledge of the number of crimes committed throughout the country. In India, however, the state of things is different, and unless through the intervention of officers employed by government, the commission of offences is little known beyond the immediate neighbourhood of the place where they have occurred. It is the special care of the Bengal government to procure an account of every considerable crime committed in the country, whether the culprit be brought before a tribunal or not; but the statements of the number of persons convicted of different crimes, especially those referred to the Nizamut Adawlut, are yet in an imperfect state.

The yearly reports made to government by the superintendents of police contain statements of the number of heinous crimes committed in each zillah or magistrate's jurisdiction, distinguishing them under several heads, of the computed value of property robbed or stolen, and recovered; of the number of persons supposed to be concerned in the crimes committed; of the number convicted and acquitted before the Courts of Circuit and the magistrates, their assistants and law officers, and of the number of persons in confinement in the several gaols at the end of the year. The superintendent sends also occasionally special reports to government, and he corresponds, as circumstances may require, with the magistrates who are subject to his control.

In

* The manner in which this duty is performed in Bengal will be seen from the following account:

In five years, viz. from 1816 to 1820, the cases of 734 persons, charged with murder in the Western Provinces, were referred to the Nizamut Adawlut; of these, 307 were acquitted, 349 were sentenced to death or perpetual imprisonment, and 78 to inferior degrees of punishment.

In 325 cases, the decisions of the judges of the Nizamut Adawlut were opposed to one or more of the inferior judicial authorities; that is to say, the circuit judge, the law officer of the Court of Circuit, law officers of the Nizamut Adawlut.

In 78, their decisions were opposed, not to the conviction of the prisoner, but as to the degree of his criminality and his punishment.

In 331, their decisions were not opposed.

Of the opposed decisions, 37 were acquittals, and 288 convictions.

Of the 37 acquittals, 7 were opposed to the opinion of the judge of circuit alone, 2 to the opinions of the judge of circuit and his law officer, 17 to the opinion of the law officers of the Court of Circuit alone, 1 to the opinions of the law officers of both courts, and 10 to the opinions of the law officers of the Nizamut Adawlut alone.

Of the 288 acquittals, the opposed opinions were, 70 of the judge of circuit alone, 99 of the judge of circuit and the law officers of both courts, 41 of the judge of circuit and his law officer, 21 of the judge of circuit and law officers of the Nizamut Adawlut, 37 of the law officer of the Court of Circuit alone, 20 of the law officers of both courts.

In 349 convictions by the judges of the Nizamut Adawlut, their sentences were in opposition to the judge of circuit in 9 cases, to the law officers of the Court of Circuit in 20, to the law officers of the Nizamut Adawlut in 11.

In

These statements, however diligently compiled, are subject to errors from various causes. Crimes committed may have been concealed from the native police or from the magistrate, or they may have been misrepresented; the same sort of crime may have been arranged under one head by one officer, and another head by another; often it cannot be known whether crimes were committed as stated, till after a full investigation of circumstances, perhaps not till after trial of the accused.

W. B. Bayley, Esq.

From these documents the Tables (A.) (B.) and (C.) are taken. The others marked (D.) and (E.) which contain lists of crimes, with the number of persons convicted of such crimes, and those marked 1 to 9, which contain lists of persons punished, without any account of the crimes for which they were sentenced, are, with the exception of No. 3, and those connected with it, extracted from statements of the operation of the criminal courts which were furnished by the Nizamut Adawlut.

The following is an account of the contents of these Tables :

TABLES

In 307 acquittals by the judges of the Nizamut Adawlut, their sentences were in opposition to the judge of circuit in 231 cases, to the law officer of the Court of Circuit in 197, and to law officers of the Court of Circuit in 140.

There are 99 instances of acquittal by the judges of the Nizamut Adawlut, in opposition to the unanimous opinions of the other judicial authorities ; but not one instance of conviction.

ABSTRACT OF THE ABOVE.

	Not opposed, 331.	{	Convictions	-	312
			Acquittals	-	19

(a) Cases are referred, either because there is a difference of opinion between the judge of circuit and his law officer as to the guilt of the accused, or because the accused having been convicted of murder by their concurrent opinions, is liable to a sentence of death, which can be passed by the Nizamut Adawlut only, or of perpetual imprisonment, which requires the confirmation of the same authority.

(b) The number of acquittals by the judges of the Nizamut Adawlut, against the opinion of the circuit judge, as to the guilt of the accused, seems great; but as the circuit judge merely gives an opinion, and has not the responsibility of the capital sentence, he probably refers many in which he has a strong impression of the prisoner's guilt, but doubts whether the evidence is sufficient to convict him.

TABLES referring to Statements of Crimes reported.

(A.) Contains a list of the most heinous Crimes ascertained to have been committed in the Lower and Western Provinces of Bengal from 1818 to 1828; extracted from the periodical statements of the superintendents of police.

(B.) An Abstract of (A.), showing separately, 1st, the number of depredations with murder; 2d, those with wounding; 3d, those with open violence without personal injury; 4th, the number of murders; 5th, of homicides; 6th, of affrays attended with loss of life.

(C.) A Summary of (A.) and (B.), showing the Crimes as in (B.) committed in nine years, ending with 1826, and in the years 1827 and 1828; also yearly averages in the two periods, the crimes of the Lower Provinces being set down separately from those of the Western.

TABLES referring to the operation of the Criminal Courts.

Crimes. Convictions in lower courts. (D.) Contains a Statement of the Offences for which persons were convicted before the Courts of Circuit in the Lower and Western Provinces together, from 1816 to 1826, with a list of the persons convicted.

(E.) A similar statement referring to the courts of the magistrates for 1826 and 1827 for the Lower and Western Provinces separately.*

TABLES referring to the Number of Persons sentenced, and their Punishments.

No. 1. Contains a list of persons convicted before the Criminal Courts in Bengal in several years, viz. before the Nizamut Adawlut, from 1816 to 1827, before the Courts of Circuit, from 1816 to 1826, and before the Magistrates, from 1824 to 1827, with the punishments to which those persons were sentenced.

No. 2. List of persons sentenced to Imprisonment for above seven years (not for life); ditto, above one year, not above seven years; ditto, not above one year; abstracted from the Table, No. 1.

No. 3. Extract of statements ordered by the House of Commons to be printed, showing the number of persons sentenced to punishment in England and Wales for seven years, ending with 1828.

No. 4. Summary of No. 3, arranged so as to correspond in form nearly with No. 2.

No. 5. Summary showing the number of persons sentenced for four years, viz. by the Nizamut Adawlut, and by the Magistrates, from 1824 to 1827, and by the Courts of Circuit, from 1823 to 1826, taken from No. 1.

No. 6. Extract from No. 3, showing the sentences for the last four years, viz. from 1825 to 1828. These compared with No. 5.

No. 7. Yearly averages in the periods of four years, from No. 6, with the same in proportion to the supposed population of the two countries.

No. 8. List of sentences to Death and Transportation, or Imprisonment for life, from 1816 to 1828, for the Lower and Western Provinces, separately extracted from the statements of the Nizamut Adawlut.

No. 9. Summary for six years, ending with 1827, in Lower and Western Provinces, separately extracted from No. 8, with a corresponding summary for the same six years, extracted from No. 3; also yearly averages of these numbers, and the same in proportion to the supposed population of the Lower and Western Provinces, and England and Wales, respectively.

* No statement can be given referring to the Courts of Circuit for the years 1827 and 1828, or for the Lower and Western Provinces separately; nor any corresponding to that of (E.) for other years besides 1826 and 1827. No similar statements can be given for the Nizamut Adawlut.

Note.—The statements of the sentences of the Nizamut Adawlut refer to the years from 1816 to 1827; those of the Court of Circuit, from 1816 to 1826; and those of the Magistrates, to four years only, viz. from 1824 to 1827. Sentences of death and transportation, or imprisonment for life, are passed by the Nizamut Adawlut, exclusively; sentences of imprisonment for above seven years are passed by the Nizamut Adawlut, or by the Courts of Circuit (who have power to pass sentence to the extent of 14 years' imprisonment in certain cases); sentences to imprisonment above one year, and not above seven years, are passed by the Nizamut Adawlut, or the Courts of Circuit, or by the Magistrates (who are empowered to pass sentence of imprisonment as far as two years in certain cases); sentences to imprisonment not above one year are passed by the Nizamut Adawlut, the Courts of Circuit, or the Magistrates. In these Tables, the sentences by the Courts of Circuit to imprisonment for one year are included under the fourth head, not the fifth. In the documents from which the numbers are taken, such sentences are mixed up with those of imprisonment for two years, and cannot be separated. The statements of the sentences of the Nizamut Adawlut are in great detail, without any abstract, and they are incorrect and imperfect in many places; but the errors on this account, or from the irregularity above noticed, are not of a nature materially to affect the general results which the Tables are intended to show.

In the seven years there were accused of murder 2,604 persons, of whom 224 were sentenced to death, and 155 executed (aa).

In France in 1829 there was 89 persons sentenced to death, and 273 to hard labour for life. These numbers are as 1 in 337,078, and 1 in 109,813 respectively in a population of 30,000,000. One thousand and thirty-three were sentenced to temporary hard labour, and 1,222 to imprisonment (reclusion), or 1 in 29,041, and 1 in 24,549 of the population (bb). In other countries the number of crimes and criminals appear to be much greater in proportion to the population.

In seven provinces under the Austrian government, the population of which is stated to amount to 14,436,000, it appears from a statistical table, that in two years (viz. 1819 and 1823) the number of homicides brought to trial amounted to 1,032, the yearly average of which (516) is 1 in 27,976 of the population. In one of the provinces, Dalmatia, the population of which is stated to be 318,000, the number of trials for homicide in 1823 is set down at 179; for robbery, 489; for burning, 200; for wounding and maiming, 304 (c).

In Spain the state of crime is described in the following account, which has been published in this country as an extract from the Madrid Gazette.

Martis, 17^o die Aprilis, 1832.

The Right Hon. ROBERT GRANT in the Chair.

IV.
JUDICIAL.

17 April 1832.

Thomas Fortescue,
Esq.

THOMAS FORTESCUE, Esq., called in and further examined.

935. How long is it since you returned from India?—I returned in 1821.

936. Did you while you were in India reside much in or near Calcutta?—I resided in Cuttack as Secretary to the Commission appointed for arranging the civil affairs of it after the conquest. I have been also officiating Collector of the district of Midnapore in Orissa, officiating Collector of the district of Dacca, and officiating Collector of the district of Moorshedabad in Bengal.

937. Have you frequently visited Calcutta itself?—Yes, very frequently; and I was there as Secretary to Government in the Territorial department for a short time.

938. While you were in India did you observe a great approximation in the natives at the presidency to the habits or modes of thinking of Europeans?—A good deal, certainly. The number of Europeans, and the establishment of His Majesty's Court, led them much to a knowledge of the character and bearing of the laws of the Europeans.

939. Before

17 April 1832.

*Thomas Fortescue
Esq*

939. Before you left India were there any institutions for the education of the natives established by government?—They were commencing.

940. According to your information, has not a considerable effect been produced by those institutions since that time?—As far as I can learn there has.

941. Are you aware also that since that time there has been an increased employment of natives in the administration of justice, or otherwise in the administration of public affairs?—I have been informed so.

942. What would be your general idea of the expediency and practicability of gradually increasing the degree in which they are employed in such ways?—I think, both in justice to them in their own country, and in point of talent, they ought to be more employed, particularly being so well qualified for almost all the duties of the different situations connected with the administration of the country; I have had a good deal to do with them myself in that way.

943. How far have you had opportunities yourself of seeing them employed in the administration of public affairs?—In the different situations I have held in India, I have particularly attended to their mode of conducting the business entrusted to them, and have most frequently found them extremely capable, particularly when confidence and salary have been fair and liberal; their conduct too has been very satisfactory to the natives. In general, when they have misconducted themselves, it has been greatly owing to the want of consistent conduct towards them.

944. Do you mean to say that if they received a liberal remuneration, they would not be tempted to those deviations from duty to which in many cases they are liable; such as the pursuit of irregular gains, or the indulgence of partialities or corruption?—I think they would not; I have had means of observing them in situations where their authorized emoluments have been below what it is possible to conceive could induce a man to labour, and in which the temptations to unlawful gain might scarcely be, in consequence, one would say, to be resisted. I could mention several instances, in the course of my experience, where the average of the net fees of native commissioners was but 10 rupees a month, yet they were employed every day in the week from morning till night. I noticed also that that small pittance was not paid to them till months after it became due; and with respect to the vakeels officiating under them, their net income too has not exceeded four rupees a month; and moreover, it should be remembered, that there are instances, under the Regulations in which the native commissioners and their officers are subject to much official labour and expense, and yet receive no remuneration at all, or but a most disproportionate one; for example, in pauper suits they get nothing; in other cases, when a compromise or razeenama is tendered before the pleadings are completed, they get nothing; if it is tendered at any time after perusal of the record, they are entitled but to half their ordinary commission; again, in cases nonsuited, they get nothing; further, a vast detail and trouble is imposed upon them in respect of distrains and bringing property to sale, yet if nothing is sold, they get nothing. It is obvious that all this is unfair, when the commissions are paid, not by fixed salaries, but by their fees, and that all their establishments, pens, ink and paper, &c. are defrayed at their own cost; and equally obvious that their duty and interest clash. These duties relate to the agricultural community; yet the Regulations for the benefit of this class, which authorize the employment

17 April 1832.

Thomas Fortescue,
Esq.

employment of the native commissions in the interior, were at times not acted upon, and in some instances certain Regulations were not to be found in the district office.

945. By whose neglect had that taken place; who had the charge of those?—I cannot particularly say; the ordinary course is for the government to send up the Regulations, when a certain form of promulgation takes place, after which the enactments are deposited amongst the records.

946. As far as you have observed, under a proper system the employment of them might be very considerably extended, only proceeding gradually and with prudence?—I consider their capacity for investigation in India to be, I would say, superior to our own; I have often associated them with me, both in the investigation of civil and criminal matters, and have derived the greatest assistance from their quick penetration and knowledge of the character of those whom I had to deal with.

947. Do you speak of Hindoos or Mahomedans?—Of both Hindoos and Mahomedans, and those principally attached to my office; I make no distinction between them.

948. Should you however say that there was a want of regard for character among them, in comparison with Europeans?—Their loss of character is certainly much more common, and they have not those high principles which European officers have; but it is greatly to be accounted for in the subaltern offices they hold, to the paltry allowance they receive, to the strong temptations thrown in their way, and the consequent distrust manifested in general towards them.

949. You think that a regard to character might be created by proper measures?—I have no doubt of it; for I have known them in the interior of the country acting greatly upon their own responsibility, and to the entire satisfaction of the neighbourhood. I have myself often deputed them for special purposes, as a kind of local commission, and they have performed the duty to content me and gratify the people; they have brought litigated points to a quick and final close, which but for their aid would have harassed the zillah (or European's) court for an indefinite period.

950. Do you ascribe the advantage that they have over Europeans in the investigation of difficult points, to their much better acquaintance with the habits and manners and feelings of their own countrymen?—Certainly; for when I have been sitting with them rather as an arbitrator than judge, and they have discussed matters in the form of punchayet, I have observed the mode of questioning and the attention they paid to gesture and manner to be more particular than would probably have occurred to an European, yet more suited to the character of those examined by them, and better to elicit the truth; the subject of dispute has in consequence been settled satisfactorily, and with a quickness of repartee that I was quite unable to follow. Besides, in taking evidence they often interrogate so as to get at truth through aid of prejudices; for they will consider caste, rank in life, being single or married, &c., and so frame their questions as to call down the worst of consequences upon children and relations if falsehood be spoken. Such points have astonishing influence with the natives, though often but little attended to by us.

951. Should

17 April 1832.

Thomas Fortescue,
Esq.

951. Should you think that they are as yet ripe to act in judicial situations, except under the superintendence and perhaps the strict supervision of Europeans, and subject also to an appeal to some European tribunal?—I think so great a transition at once from what their situation was when I resided in India, would not be advisable, but gradually they would become so. They are exceedingly quick in acquiring knowledge, and very desirous of it when it meets the approbation of those whose good opinions they solicit.

952. Have you considered how far they could be invested with the functions of police, at least in the presidencies; as for example, of justices of the peace?—I think they are perfectly competent to such duties, and might be entrusted with them; it is an opinion which I submitted during my residence in India to the government, suggesting that they might be entrusted with petty criminal jurisdiction, and empowered to inflict punishment by fine, or by imprisonment, or by stripes, according to the circumstances of the case.

953. Would it be proper to employ them in the presidencies in those duties which are understood to belong to magistrates in this country, namely, that of committing persons for trial before the courts?—I think perfectly so; for as officers employed under the magistrate in preparing commitments, they have, I may say, often performed the whole of the detail; their judgment is sufficiently good: but I should say that they ought not for the present to have cognizance of cases in which Europeans are concerned. Amongst themselves they might act, but not where an European was either the complainant or the person aggrieved; for they have so great a deference for their character generally, and often in such awe of them, that they might be induced by lenity or apprehension to swerve from an equitable decision.

954. Does that awe and deference proceed mainly from their having to do with officers either civil or military employed by the government?—I think their feeling towards an European is such, and their manner too so disposed to court them, that I should be apprehensive they might favour the Europeans to the prejudice of their own countrymen.

955. The Committee has been informed that zemindars and other natives of power have such influence as to render it unlikely that persons in such a situation would act impartially in cases arising between natives; does your opinion coincide with that which has been given to the Committee?—Neither my experience nor my opinion coincide with that notion. I am satisfied that if they were liberally paid and a fair confidence shown towards them, they would maintain their situation with great credit to themselves and impartiality to the community. I am of opinion that the distance constantly subsisting between the European officers of government and the native judicial officers is such as not to give satisfaction or confidence to the natives; further, that when they do well it is not generally known perhaps, nor noticed to them in terms of encouraging approbation, and that when they do ill they are censured without sufficiently liberal construction of their motives and the merits of the complaint against them; and that there is not such easy intercourse to discuss points of general duty as to enable them to receive instruction from the European officers. The native I have always found anxious to pick up whatever was useful for his proper and official conduct. All this is often

17 April 1832.

Thomas Fortescue,
Esq.

owing to the want of time on the part of the European; and this want of time proceeds from an injudicious division of the aggregate duties of the whole country, amongst the officers of the government, and not calling in the aid sufficiently of the Indian community. A great deal of trifling matter is obliged to be brought before the European, which could with superior advantage be originally disposed of by the native.

956. Are the native judicial officers allowed to sit in the private apartments of the European functionary?—Yes, most frequently; I ever found them, when a new regulation appeared, glad to come to me and talk it over.

957. Is that a usual practice?—I do not believe it to be very general.

958. On the supposition that by any change in the system of intercourse with India, the number of Europeans settled or resident in the interior of the country were considerably augmented, do you think that any and what changes would be requisite or expedient in the system of the judicial administration, as conducted by the Company's courts?—With reference to their being enabled to purchase lands and become proprietors, I think a great desideratum, amongst many others, is the unsettled state of property in India with respect to the ryots' rights, which it should be a primary object to adjust. A very great change would be requisite in the judicial system were Europeans to be numerous: it would have to be determined whether the present existing Mahomedan law, as modified by our regulations, should remain, or whether the English law be more generally administered; and in either case it would be necessary, I presume, to have the establishments augmented by European functionaries subordinate to the judge and magistrate. The ordinary gaols are not suited for European constitutions, and must be considerably and suitably enlarged. The subject however is so wide and embraces so much, that it is not possible in a short reply to allude to its great details.

959. When you speak of the necessity of the gaols being very much enlarged, do you not contemplate a very considerable resort of the lower class of Europeans to them?—No, not so much as to that, as to their being comfortable, because our gaols are at present such as would render it death probably for an European to be confined in them: the processes to be served must be by Europeans, for violent offenders would not be manageable by the native officers.

960. If they were subject to one general law, and that law administered partly by the medium of the natives, why should not the native power be able to master a single individual?—Occasions for such interference, when they have occurred in India, have generally been very disgraceful to the European character; and the natives are so disposed to cover the misconduct of Europeans on the one hand, and so afraid of them on the other, that I apprehend there would be a very great difficulty, though it might be overcome.

961. What are the species of outrages committed by Europeans to which you especially refer?—Great contempts of court, if there were but one European judge; there is no community, no publicity, no public out of court to appreciate what is done in it: an European in his own language might be extremely offensive, and make it very difficult for the judicial officer to conduct a case before him with decorum.

962. Are

17 April 1832.

Thomas Fortescue,
Esq.

962. Are you aware of many cases of the description to which you have alluded which have occurred?—No, I am not; but I can well imagine such to occur, from what I have understood to have happened, upon such characters as I contemplate coming into court.

963. Were the Europeans, with respect to whom you have alluded, heretofore chiefly officers either civil or military in the employ of government?—No; I allude chiefly to persons out of the service.

964. Are there many, except the indigo planters residing in the interior of the country, out of the service of the Company?—No; there are sometimes low subordinate Europeans, but not many; they have got to India by working their passage out or abandoning their ships; persons of that kind have often acted very offensively against the natives. The persons I allude to would be perhaps few, but they would be very mischievous.

965. In what capacity were those whom you have known employed?—They were generally assistants under some head person either managing the indigo manufacture or some other manufacture.

966. What other species of manufacture?—Besides indigo, collecting in cotton or sugar. I am alluding rather to what might be from an increase of Europeans than what has been, because the law has hitherto been such as to render Europeans very cautious how they subject themselves to removal. There is, I believe, a strong opinion in the Indian service in favour of the introduction of Europeans, but it is to be considered whether the improvements in India shall be based upon its institutions, or sought for through our own. I think the natives of India are entitled to have their interests favoured in preference to those of this country. I look to the further introduction of Europeans, and the other arrangements that are going on, as tending ultimately to the abolition of the present laws of India, their language and religion too. There is no doubt that the intelligence of the Europeans and their skilful application of capital will very much improve the country at large, and in respect of cultivation and population, but I have great doubts whether the result of all such improvements will not be vastly on the side of our own country.

967. When you say that you believe there is a general idea that it would be advantageous to have an increased number of Europeans in the country, do you suppose that the opinion is in favour of Europeans who should enter for the purposes of settlement, or of carrying on some commercial or agricultural pursuit in the country, or do you suppose that the opinion is in favour of an unrestricted entrance of Europeans of all classes?—The opinion that I alluded to has reference to Europeans going to and residing in India for the purpose of commerce.

968. Supposing the resort of Europeans in future to be very limited in point of number, and to consist mainly of individuals either possessed of capital or of very superior skill, should you then imagine that it would be necessary to make the great alterations in the present system of India to which you have previously already adverted?—The alteration would depend necessarily very much on the number of Europeans; but what I mean to say is, that in cases coming before the courts it must be determined by what law they shall be adjudged, and also in case of punishment, what is to become of the individual.

17 April 1832.

Thomas Fortescue,
Esq.

969. Do you not conceive that, taking the present regulations, and the laws at present enforced, both criminal and civil, throughout the provinces of India, a code might be framed applicable to Europeans as well as natives residing within them?—I think, without any great difficulty: as to the Mahomedan criminal law, it is a mere name at present; and as far as the civil laws go, they would of course be allowed to operate between the Hindoos and Mahomedans.

970. Supposing, then, such a code to be framed, would not that remove much of your objection to the settlement of Europeans in India, in so far as the judicial system goes?—Certainly. I would still advert to the administration of those laws when so modified.

971. Do you conceive that the laws being so modified, and the native judges being sufficiently remunerated for their trouble, and being treated with the respect due to their station, there would be any difficulty in their administration arising from the settlement of Europeans among them?—I think at first there might be, but as they gradually became familiarized with their duty, and felt themselves upheld in the responsibility they undertook, they would execute the laws well. They would themselves however have at present, I think, objections to administer the laws between natives and Europeans.

972. Do you not contemplate that the settlement of Europeans in India, with their knowledge of the language and of the habits and of the manners of the people, acquired by their intercourse with them, would enable you to select from amongst those settlers individuals capable of acting as magistrates, and in some instances of filling with benefit judicial situations which might become vacant?—That must depend a good deal upon their capacity and intelligence in those various points. I have certainly seen individuals, out of the service, whose character and knowledge perfectly qualified them for such duty; but it must entirely depend upon that.

973. Would they not have the means of acquiring a knowledge of the feelings and manners and habits of the people, as well as of their language, very far superior to those which are now possessed by the European functionaries in India?—By no means. I should say their intercourse is comparatively very much limited; because, in the first place, they do not move like our officers all over the country: there is the greatest contrast in its different parts; yet such does not prove any fallacy, though indispensable, I would add, for forming anything like a just opinion on the customs, habits, &c. of India.

974. Supposing an individual to manage, for instance, a commercial concern, would it not be necessary for him to mix with much greater intimacy with the natives, than it would for a public functionary of government residing in the country?—Not more than a collector, for instance, does in general; he would be in immediate intercourse certainly with the people much more than the judicial officer usually is, but not more than the revenue officers or custom officers; besides, his duty would be to attend to his own business, more than to seek to attain to knowledge qualifying him for a foreign station.

975. Would not he be prompted very much more by his own private interest to acquire a knowledge of the manners and habits of the people, than the public functionary would?—Merely to enable him to conduct his commercial affairs with success

17 April 1832.

*Thomas Fortescue,

success, his knowledge would be very limited. I have known individuals who conducted business, and yet could scarcely speak the language. There are however others, on the other hand, out of the service, whose knowledge of languages and manners has been very superior.

976. Do you not conceive that the children of the country, born and educated in the country, would have a far greater knowledge of the manners and habits and language of the people than persons sent out of this country?—I do not think they would, judging from what I have observed: they are generally disliked and despised both by natives and Europeans, though their knowledge of the language is often very good; they are not in easy intercourse with either the native or European.

977. Are they not also looked down upon by the government?—Yes, but I know not how it could be otherwise.

978. And is not their condition one of considerable hardship?—It is; it seems to be a great difficulty, and I believe the government acknowledge it to be such, to determine what course to pursue with respect to them. The natives would, I have no doubt, be much dissatisfied to see those persons preferred, and placed over them.

979. So far as you have observed of the intercourse between European residents not in the service and natives, should you say that their treatment of the natives was decidedly different from the treatment of the natives by the Company's servants in public situations?—Yes, I should think so, from the circumstance of one having authority, that is the Company's officer, and the other having always to deal in a fictitious name with them; he could never appear openly as having any right to deal with them in matters of commerce; he was not allowed to hold land.

980. So far as that cause operates, if the law gave them a legal right in the country, would the inducement be removed which now operates upon them to treat the natives with more respect?—That would greatly depend upon their own characters; one must always recollect that their object would be their commercial pursuits, their gain, in short, and that it must mainly depend upon their internal feelings whether they would or would not abuse authority given to them. With respect to the Europeans in some parts of the country where I have been, I must say that I should have every confidence in their conducting themselves well, had they possessed the power which it is now proposed to give them, that is, authority to hold lands and to act openly.

981. Do you not conceive that the Europeans now residing in the provinces, and whose business requires that they should hold or occupy lands, are placed in a very false position as arising from their being prevented from holding and occupying land in their own names?—It is so; at the same time it has had the good effect of making them cautious how they encouraged or permitted disturbance in matters connected with their own mercantile pursuits, while the state of the laws and local courts rendered this extremely necessary.

982. Have Europeans the same means of preventing disturbances on the part of their native servants, when in truth they hold their lands in the names of those native servants?—No; because if they appeal to the courts it would be difficult for them to establish that power over their agents which their private arrangements have given them. Their agents are the ostensible holders of the land which they

Thomas Fortescue,
Esq.

(the Europeans) have the benefit of; and if disputes arise between them and their agents, who are in truth but agents, still they cannot bring that forward, it could not be supported.

983. Are the outrages that may have been committed either by or in the name of Europeans, in some degree attributable to the tardy and imperfect administration of justice by the civil courts in the provinces?—The courts certainly are so crowded and the business so much in arrear generally, that it has often happened, when there appeared no prospect of the decision of a civil suit being obtained within convenient time, that the European and his agents have taken the law into their own hands; but such occurrences could be readily provided against, by having natives, such as commissioners or ameen, dispersed through the country, when all such matters would be speedily settled.

984. Do you conceive that there is a good deal of venality among the native officers of the courts?—I do not think that there is generally, though at the same time I have no doubt that it does exist, its degree depending greatly upon the European officer's vigilance; but I account for it, and might even say apologize for it, in their very inconsiderable pay and hard work.

985. You have said, that you thought that a general code might be formed for the population of India of all descriptions; do you think that in place of having supreme courts at the presidencies, with one species of jurisdiction, and totally independent courts in the country, with another species of jurisdiction, it would be possible to frame a common system of judicature, to be acted upon in all the courts, both at the presidencies and throughout the whole country?—I should think it a matter of no great difficulty; it would imply a revision of the whole of the law, which I conceive would be easy. As for the criminal part, it would be extremely simple, and with respect to the civil, it would be done without embarrassment.

986. Do not you think that an adoption of any change of that kind would be facilitated by having a standing legislative body at the presidency, who might frame laws adapted to the occasions that might arise?—I think that a council formed of the government, and such individuals as compose the supreme court of judicature in Bengal, would be competent to form a code of laws well suited to the administration of justice in all its branches; but I should think that the Governor-general should always have a casting voice in every matter, to prevent the serious consequences which collision among themselves, or delay by reference to this country, might occasion.

987. You have stated that the courts are clogged with business; will you mention what is the description of causes that appears most to impede the discharge of business in those courts?—With reference to the period when I left India, the business of the courts was clogged chiefly by two causes, namely, various petty details that could as well be performed by natives, and summary suits for small amounts, which were first cognizable of necessity in the zillah court, then referred to the collector for report, and again brought before the judge for final decision when that report was received. The decision was after all but a summary one, and a regular suit was at the option of the party dissatisfied afterwards. The number of these suits was often so great and pressing as to induce the judge to devote his time to them;

*Thomas Fortescue,

them; in consequence of which suits of greater interest and amount to other classes of the community were wholly neglected, and breaches of the peace often occurred in consequence; whereas had such suits been in the first instance rendered cognizable by the native commissioners in the interior as regular suits, they would have been decided earlier and more satisfactorily, and without waste of time to the judge. I remember, in a district of which I had assumed charge, and which may be taken as not an unfair sample of others very generally, there were on the file about 350 summary suits, some of four years' standing; these I suggested to the parties to withdraw and institute as regular suits before the native commissioners, where they were decided in a very short period: I found, moreover, that those which remained on my file were the worst, and as such best suited to a hasty superficial inquiry, which is the character of summary suits.

988. Was there at that time a considerable delay in bringing the cases of a more important nature to trial?—There was very great delay, and chiefly owing to the causes I have hinted; other causes also there were, as miscellaneous proceedings, which might have been equally well performed by natives, but the system of the courts and the regulations precluded the judge from relieving himself of most of this tiresome and lengthened detail.

ALEXANDER DUNCAN CAMPBELL, Esq. called in and examined.

989. Will you state in what presidency you have served in India?—Under the Madras presidency. *Alex. D. Campbell,
Esq.*

990. State what judicial situations you have filled?—In 1818 I officiated for several months as Chief Magistrate at Madras, when I had charge of the police. I was also twice appointed a Judge of Circuit and Appeal in the provincial court for the centre division, once on the 9th March 1824, and subsequently on the 17th of June 1828; and when I left Madras, in February 1831, I held the situation of Registrar to the courts of Sudder Dewanny and Foujdarry Adawlut, or Company's supreme court at the presidency, at the period when it was proposed to abolish the Mussulman criminal law, and to raise materially the jurisdiction of the various native judicatures under the Madras government, both in the civil and criminal departments.

991. Are you acquainted with two letters, of which copies are now on the table, from the Madras government, in the judicial department, to the Court of Directors, dated respectively the 27th of April 1827, and the 2d of November 1830?—I am.

992. Will you state the nature of those letters?—The first-mentioned letter refers principally to the proceedings of the Madras government antecedent to the establishment of assistant judges, in the civil and criminal departments, at the Madras presidency. The last-mentioned letter contains the most recent modifications suggested at Madras, in the judicial system, consequent on the report of the finance committee in Bengal, regarding the expediency of reducing the expenses of the judicial department at the Madras presidency: it proposes the total abolition of the Mussulman criminal law, the raising materially the civil jurisdiction of all the native judicatures, the appointment of native judges, with the full powers,

17 April 1832.

Alca. D. Campbell,

powers, both civil and criminal, vested in the zillah and criminal judges of our European courts, and a modified employment of the junior civil servants on their entrance into the judicial department; it also involves the abolition of the whole of the courts of circuit, and the establishment of seven commissioners to conduct not only the circuit duties, but to control both the European and native subordinate judicial tribunals, and also the police department under the magistrates of the provinces; and it is accompanied by a statement of the saving of expense likely to result from the proposed modifications: it also suggests the abolition of the existing mode of remunerating the native judicatures denominated district moonsiffs, at Madras, and a new mode of remunerating them for their services.

993. Do you know how far any of the suggestions contained in the latest of those letters have been or are in the course of being carried into effect?—I have in my possession drafts of the regulations, made by myself before leaving Madras, for carrying into effect the whole of the above-mentioned suggestions in the criminal department, marked from (A.) to (E.) Similar regulations were to have been framed in the civil department; but I left Madras suddenly, from extreme illness, and they had not been prepared at the period of my departure. Three native judges, with the full powers of zillah and criminal judges of the European courts, had been sworn in at the presidency before I left it; but since my arrival in this country, I have understood that the Bengal government revived the order existing during Lord Wellesley's time, for the transmission of all Madras regulations to the supreme government in Bengal before promulgation, and that the above-mentioned drafts were transmitted from Madras to Calcutta. I have not heard the result of that reference, but I believe that, in consequence, the proposed modifications have not yet been carried into full operation.

994. Had any of those three native judges who were appointed, entered on their functions before your departure?—One of the native judges, in the district of Soonda, on the western coast of the Peninsula, had been appointed considerably anterior to the other two, and had entered on and executed his functions for a considerable period before I left Madras.

995. Do you yourself concur generally in the expediency of the alterations suggested in the letter above mentioned?—I concur entirely in the expediency of all the suggestions submitted by the court of sudder adawlut, in their proceedings in question, with the exception of that part of them in which the court state that they do not consider the use of juries to be either safe or practicable; the remark is made by them as applicable to criminal trials before the native judges. My opinion is strongly in favour of the use of something similar to jurors on all occasions in criminal trials, both before the native and European judges, as an assistance to the European, and as a check on the native judge. It is a subject of great regret with me that the enactment made by the Madras government, in Regulation X, 1827, to introduce juries gradually under the Madras presidency, never has been carried into effect; the regulation has remained a dead letter, in consequence of the subsequent government disapproving of it.

996. Had no trial ever been given to it?—None whatever.

997. Has the punchayet system been tried in civil cases?—Yes, but without much success at Madras, in the judicial department.

998. To

17 April 1832.

Alex. D. Campbell,
Esq.

998. To what do you ascribe the want of success with which that experiment has been accompanied?—Most of the suits in India originate with the monied classes of the people who are generally the plaintiffs, against the ryots who are usually the defendants, as borrowers of money from them; and my impression is, that the native bankers find it more to their advantage to institute suits before a distant judicature, in order to induce speedy payment of their debts by their numerous debtors, than before a judicature close to the residence of the debtor. I also think that they consider it more likely that they can influence a single native judicature, than a punchayet. I am inclined to attribute to the above causes the rare resort in the judicial departments to the system of punchayet, which in India has more beneficially exercised its influence in disputes before they come to the length of a lawsuit, than after the parties have become so adverse to agreement as to resort to that extreme measure.

999. What do you mean by resorting to a more distant judicature?—I mean that when a punchayet takes place, it can be held on the spot where the dispute arises; but our native judicatures being fixed at particular stations, when a lawsuit occurs, it is necessary that the party sued should go to the residence of the native exercising judicial authority, which is frequently 30 or 40 or 50 miles from the ryot's home; and natives to whom money is owing find it often to their advantage, by harassing a single debtor with a distant journey, to bring many of their other debtors to a speedy settlement of their debts.

1000. Is the punchayet to which the last question refers a punchayet for the purposes of arbitration rather than for the purposes of deciding a suit which has once been instituted?—Not for arbitration, but for decision. My impression of the enactments of the Madras government, contained in Regulations V, VII, and XII, 1816, respecting punchayets, is, that on an agreement to refer the subject of the suit to decision, by both parties, a village punchayet may decide; or, in particular cases, by one party, a district punchayet may decide; but that the decision takes place by the members of the punchayet in the village or district where the dispute arises, their decree being enclosed in a blank envelope to the native judicature, whose duty it merely is first to assemble them, and then to carry it into execution. In particular cases, either party consenting may constrain the other to refer the matter to a punchayet; but whether it is a district or a village punchayet which is to decide, in these instances, I do not clearly recollect.

1001. Are cases which have been actually brought before the judge ever tried in his presence by the means of punchayet, upon the consent of the parties?—Judges have the power, under Regulation XXI, 1802, to refer disputes before them to arbitration; but when parties consent to refer suits to punchayet they need not travel to a distant European court. The native head of the village, or of district judicature exclusively, has the power to assemble punchayets.

1002. Then, in fact, a punchayet never stands in the shape of our jury for trial of causes?—Never. I have had considerable experience of the use of punchayets, as a revenue officer, in the Bellary division of the Ceded Districts, and found them exceedingly useful there in adjusting matters of dispute both between the inhabitants themselves, and between myself, as the representative of the Government, and the ryots paying land revenue, as well as the merchants, who in that particular province

17 April 1832.

Alex. D. Campbell,
Esq.

province pay a very heavy income tax. I have often found these parties resist all argument on the part of my native servants, as well as of myself, but immediately concede the point with cheerfulness when decided in favour of the Government by a punchayet, deferring to the opinions of their equals, though they opposed that of the government officers. In such cases, as well as in numerous disputes regarding village offices, such as the right to the privileges of the head of the village, or of the watchman or other village officers, punchayets have been most extensively employed by the revenue officers in Bellary; and I have scarcely ever found any difficulty in inducing all such parties to agree to that mode of adjusting these disputes. When native animosity increases to such a degree as to terminate in a suit at law, it becomes more difficult to reconcile the parties to this mode of adjusting the dispute.

1003. Do you conceive that any advantage would accrue by enforcing the trial by punchayet in cases of a certain value or amount, not leaving it optional to the parties?—I think it would tend to degrade that tribunal in the public estimation to make a reference to it compulsory; but in very trifling cases I do not think that it would be attended with other disadvantages. I should prefer, however, something of the nature of a jury, to a punchayet; natives, in such bodies, acting much more satisfactorily under the supervision of a respectable officer, particularly of an European, as in the cases I have mentioned in Bellary, than when left without superintendence. It is not necessary that the European functionary should in the remotest degree influence such decisions. But in a ryotwar settled district, an efficient officer of this kind is rather the organ of public opinion than the representative of the Government; and a knowledge that their decree, if unjust, will expose them to public odium, which will find a vent through him, operates as a great check on such punchayets.

1004. Of what description of persons are the members of the punchayet commonly composed?—In the ryotwar settled districts, such as Bellary, there are constantly in attendance at the office of the collectors and magistrates, many hundreds, sometimes thousands of the ryots, particularly at the period of the annual settlements, when occasionally 10,000 or 12,000 people of that description may be congregated together at the same time. The parties themselves are left to select out of those bodies whom they choose, and the collector generally nominates one of the leading agricultural inhabitants, known to be a person of good sense and discrimination, care being invariably taken to ascertain from both parties that he is one to whom neither have any objection.

1005. Supposing a case between a lender of money and a borrower of it to be decided by punchayet, of what description of persons in that case would the punchayet be composed?—The punchayet would consist, in all probability, of two wealthy, married men, chosen by the native banker; two respectable cultivators, chosen by the ryot; and a fifth person, of the description above mentioned, selected by the collector. A great deal, in a punchayet, depends upon the proper selection of the fifth person; the other parties enter into violent disputes, each as partisans of the person who has chosen them, and the fifth acts as the moderator to bring both to reason. Some of the decrees drawn up by punchayets at Bellary are admirable specimens of native intelligence, seldom equalled by some of our own European decrees.

1006. Are

17 April 1832.

*Alex. D. Campbell,
Esq.*

1006. Are the members of the punchayet paid for their labour?—Never.

1007. Are they sworn?—They are not sworn; and even intricate disputes in the revenue department, such as I have described, are generally settled within a few hours, or at least in the course of a single day. The dispute must be exceedingly intricate indeed if the decision extends beyond that period.

1008. Is there any limitation to the amount of the suit that is subject to this mode of settlement?—I think not; where the parties agree to settle a dispute by punchayet, there is no limitation of amount.

1009. Is the decision of a punchayet final?—Decidedly so; subject to no appeal, except on proof of the partiality or corruption of the members.

1010. Is the decision of causes by punchayet an ancient custom in the provinces under the Madras presidency, or of recent introduction?—An exceedingly ancient custom in those parts of the presidency with which I am best acquainted, namely, the Ceded Districts; and I apprehend that it will be found to have existed all over the Madras territories, though the resort to it may have been more or less encouraged in different provinces, and it may more or less have fallen into disuse.

1011. Are you aware whether the practice of torture by the native officers, for the purpose of extracting confessions or obtaining evidence, has been frequently resorted to?—Under the native governments which preceded us at Madras, the universal object of every police officer was to obtain a confession from the prisoner, with a view to his conviction of any offence; and notwithstanding every endeavour on the part of our European tribunals to put an end to this system, frequent instances have come before all our criminal tribunals of its use. I recollect a very strong instance of this kind noticed in my own report as judge of circuit; it was in the Cuddapah district, where a native was hung by the heels from the beam of a house. I also recollect a brother judge, on the same bench with myself, mentioning to me very extraordinary means of torture complained of by certain prisoners, in which, with the view of eluding all discovery, the native police officers were accused of inserting heated bougies into the penis of the prisoners; and there is an universal anxiety on the part of the European judicial officers of the Madras government to guard strongly against even well-authenticated confessions, unless most fully corroborated by other evidence, on the ground of the great tendency of our native police officers to resort to this means for conviction. Even where ample proof otherwise exists, it is very difficult to counteract the tendency of our native police officers to induce confession on the part of the prisoners; indeed, we have not yet eradicated from the minds of our native agents that such means of proof have no weight with us.

1012. In criminal trials, is it the practice of the judge to examine, before a confession be given in evidence, whether it has been made under circumstances of fear, or under circumstances of intimidation or torture?—With our courts it is the universal practice to lay before the judge of circuit who tries the prisoner, the whole of the depositions anterior to the trial, including of course any alleged confessions; these confessions are, by regulation, required to be attested by two witnesses, and these witnesses are universally examined; even when they swear that such confessions were freely and voluntarily given by the prisoner, the tendency of our EVIDENCE ON EAST-INDIA AFFAIRS.

European tribunals is in general to place little confidence in such evidence, on the ground of the tendency of our native agents of police to extort confessions.

1013. May the agents of police in whose custody the prisoner is taken be the attesting witnesses, or must the witnesses be persons who are unconnected with the police?—Our code originally prescribed that the witnesses who attest confessions should be persons totally unconnected with the police; the consequence was, that the police officers called upon many of the more respectable classes of the community to attend whilst such confessions were given. But those persons were so harassed by long journies, in attending first before the European tribunal which alone is competent to commit the prisoner, and subsequently before the distinct European tribunal which alone is competent to try the prisoner, that they evinced extreme aversion to this odious duty, and many even perjured themselves and declared that they were not present, though it was fully proved that they were so, merely to avoid performing similar duties thereafter. The consequence has been, that the original order was so far abrogated, that all police officers above the rank of a common peon were admitted as witnesses to such confessions, under Regulation V., 1819.

1014. Is not torture also resorted to for the purpose of getting evidence as well as confessions, and for extorting bribes?—I do not think that it is generally resorted to for such purposes, though occasional instances may have occurred of such gross abuse. On reference, however, to my report as judge of circuit, I observe that, in the instance at Cuddapah above mentioned, I recorded my opinion thus: “Aggravated, atrocious and reiterated torture, accompanied by murder, had taken place, in order to induce false evidence, and eventually perjury, against innocent individuals unjustly accused of robbery.”

1015. Is there not some general term by which it is described; kittee, for instance?—Kittee is the hand-torture.

Mercurii, 18^o die Aprilis 1832.

The Right Hon. ROBERT GRANT in the Chair.

ALEXANDER DUNCAN CAMPBELL, Esq. called in and further examined.

18 April 1832.

Alex. D. Campbell,
Esq.

1016. WILL you explain the kittee, or hand torture, mentioned in your last examination?—The kittee consists of a piece of bamboo split at one end, the other remaining shut. The hand is introduced at the open end, which is then closed upon it. I believe it was in partial use under the native governments which preceded us in the Madras territories, both as a means of inducing confession in police matters, and payment of arrears of revenue by defaulters. Applying it to the hand, placing a person in the sun with a stone on his head, and sometimes with the trigger of a matchlock shut upon his ear, were means resorted to by the officers

18 April 1832.

officers of the native governments, for the purposes above mentioned, which, though entirely discouraged by us, may still partially prevail where the European authority is not so efficient as to check such abuses on the part of our native agency. In revenue matters it has been very generally discontinued, in consequence of the enactments in our Regulations of 1802 rendering the native officer subject to prosecution in the courts for any such measure. I only recollect one instance of its use by a native revenue officer subsequent to those enactments, which occurred in the Bellary district during the administration of my predecessor there, who in consequence of the native officer being convicted of that offence, removed him from his situation; my impression is that he considered him, otherwise, a very able native agent.

1017. How far do you think it would be proper to invest the Governor-General and the other governors at the different presidencies with the power of selecting natives, either at the presidencies or in the interior, to act as justices of the peace in all cases for the preservation of the public peace, or for the purpose of committing persons accused of offences for trial?—I think it highly desirable that such a power should be vested in the local governments. But in making any enactment on this point, Parliament should distinguish the powers vested in the district magistrate of the provinces, by the general enactments of the local governments, over the natives only, and the distinct powers vested in the same European officer, as a justice of the peace, by the statute or common law of England, over Europeans alone. The powers of committal and punishment vested in him in the former capacity have, in the Madras territories, been most extensively conferred on the native officers under him. In his latter capacity, he cannot depute his powers. Indeed, in India the powers exercised by justices of the peace are of two descriptions; the one by the justices in the interior over Europeans exclusively under the English law, the other by justices at the presidency over both natives and Europeans partly under the English law, partly under the presidency laws enacted by the local government. I am of opinion, that with regard to the latter description of cases, viz., those at the presidency, there are many natives to be found amongst those there resident who are perhaps more able even than the European justices to decide on the cases of natives, and that it would be expedient to make it imperative on the local governments to select native gentlemen at each presidency to sit with the European justices on the trial of such cases. With regard to the committal or trial of Europeans by natives, I think it involves, in a considerable degree, not only the feelings of Englishmen, but a political question connected with our peculiar government in India; and I doubt whether we should not lower ourselves in the estimation of our subjects, if we rendered cases involving any high offences by Europeans cognizable by the natives exclusively. In such cases the Europeans accused would also insist strongly on the right to trial by jury; and I conceive that the preferable mode would be to throw such cases, as far as possible, into the hands of Europeans, and if vested in the natives at all, that they should act as assessors with the European authorities, not independently of them. A native judge would feel perhaps as averse to try or commit such Europeans for trial, as the European would to submit to his authority, on account of the accused belonging to the caste of the Government. Independently of this, the notions which the natives entertain of the law of evidence are in many respects respects very different from ours; and the natives would, and do now daily, act upon evidence which any European authority would deem quite inadequate to justify the determination to which the native authority, acting without European assistance, would and indeed does come.

18 April 1832.

Alex. D. Campbell,
Esq.

1018. The last question did not contemplate the trial either of Europeans or of natives, but simply that preliminary proceeding which consists in the apprehension of persons accused of offences, in committing them for a more regular trial; the question is rather how far natives would be fit for that preliminary sort of jurisdiction, than how far it would be proper to commit the actual trial of European offenders to their cognizance?—I consider natives perfectly competent to exercise all the powers of investigating criminal offences even by Europeans, previous to commitment; and all the higher native police officers in the Madras provinces do now in fact exercise such authority, in the case of European soldiers committing murder or other grave offences within 120 miles of the presidency, where no justice of the peace is present. The great difficulty with which a native has to contend, in conducting such duty well, consists not in any incompetency on his part, but in the peculiar laws of our own country regarding Europeans. They are at present subject only to the British criminal law, if British born subjects; and the higher courts before whom the case may come might feel greatly at a loss in charging a grand jury regarding the case, or in the event of the jury finding a bill, in the trial of the case itself, if it involved anything of the nature of a confession, or if the proceedings of the native tribunal were defective in that tenderness towards a prisoner, or in any other rules of evidence, which most justices of the peace understand to be essential for correct proceedings on their part, with a view to ulterior proceedings in a higher court.

1019. Supposing either at one of the presidencies, or in the interior of the country, an European to commit a serious offence in the face of day, and no European justice of the peace to be immediately accessible, and such European to be taken before a native committing officer, what power has such native officer of taking cognizance of the case, of inquiring into the facts, and of placing matters in train for the trial of the offender by the supreme court of judicature?—The officers of police at the presidency possess no power whatever, except that of arrest; they cannot take any written depositions whatever; and the European authorities exclusively are competent to commit either natives or Europeans for trial before the King's supreme court there. But in the Madras provinces, the superior native officer of district police has cognizance of cases, in the same manner as a justice of the peace in this country; he punishes petty offences by natives, of his own authority, and for higher offences commits natives for trial before the higher courts. As regards Europeans, however, his duty is confined to holding an inquest on the bodies of any deceased persons, to taking written depositions from all parties who have any knowledge of the matter, and to forwarding the case in this shape to the European justice of the peace, who, according to the English law, as explained in Regulation IV., 1809, of the Madras code, has exclusively the power of committing European British subjects for trial. In all such cases, on the matter coming before the European authority, whether at the presidency or in the provinces, new depositions must be taken ab initio, and the whole matter must

18 April 1832.

Alex. D. Campbell,
Esq.

must be treated as if it had come before the European authority in the first instance.

1020. Do you see any objections to some regulation by which, under whatever restrictions, a power of committal for trial should be given to native officers selected for that purpose?—I see not the smallest objection, if such natives possess a competent knowledge of the English law, or if the law to which the accused is to be made amenable is so altered from the English law, as to be clearly understood by the natives appointed to exercise that authority.

1021. It is understood that justices of the peace have a conclusive jurisdiction in certain criminal cases of a lower kind, is that the fact?—Justices of the peace in the interior, under the Act of Parliament passed previously to the last renewal of the Company's Charter, possess power of deciding petty cases of assault committed by Europeans. At the presidency, justices of the peace possess the same authority over Europeans; but in addition to that, further authority is vested in them, under regulations of the local governments, drawn up for the good government of the metropolis of each presidency, and registered as the law requires in the King's supreme court. Their jurisdiction, in this respect, extends both over Europeans, and the natives at the presidency subject to the criminal jurisdiction of the supreme court.

1022. Are you of opinion that there should be a power in the governments to select natives who should be invested with those functions which you have described, the exercise of such functions extending both to natives and to Europeans?—I think that, at the presidency, it is exceedingly desirable to confer such authority on native gentlemen, both as regards Europeans and natives; such native gentlemen acting, as the Europeans now do, in conjunction with their other brethren of the bench, including Europeans. I myself have presided as superintendent of police over the bench of magistrates at Madras, and the cases coming before that tribunal consist of an exceedingly numerous class of petty offences, respecting which the whole of the evidence is generally that of natives exclusively. That bench also possesses authority to assess the town of Madras for the purpose of lighting the town, and of the police; and I consider the native gentlemen of the place more competent than ourselves to decide on native testimony, and much more interested than we are in the just levy and due application of the funds, to which they themselves largely contribute. It is their exclusion from a seat on the bench of the magistrates at the presidency, which I consider the higher classes of the native community at all our three presidencies to view as a severe grievance.

1023. Supposing natives to be made eligible to the situations in question, should you conceive that such eligibility ought to be confined to natives unconnected with government, such as merchants or landholders, or that it should be extended even to those who are dependant upon our government, or officially employed under it?—I do not think that any class of the natives should be excluded; but I conceive that, practically, the government never would thus employ any of the native officers under themselves; for all natives in public offices have too much to do to attend to this duty. The selection should not be confined to the class of landholders, few of whom exist at some of the presidencies, but ought to be made generally from the resident native gentry of the place, possessing most influence, and of the highest

18 April 1832.

Alex. D. Campbell,
Esq.

highest character in the estimation of their own countrymen. These persons are well known to all the local governments of India.

1024. Would not such a regulation have a tendency to raise the character of the natives at the presidency?—I think it calculated to raise the character of the natives at the presidency, which is also the place of all others, where it is of the greatest importance that their character should be raised.

1025. How far should you think it expedient to extend this privilege to native gentlemen in the provinces?—I doubt the expediency of extending it to them in the provinces, because there the principal native gentry are the resident landholders, against whom principally most complaints are made by the lower classes of the people; and as they seldom see any European, except those in the King's or Company's service, they would shrink from the performance of such a duty, over any except the very lowest classes of Europeans, including the European soldiery. I have already alluded to the questionable policy of such a measure. If a more extended intercourse of Europeans with India were established, and the native gentry in the interior became better acquainted with that class of people than they now are, perhaps the present objections against extending such a measure to the provinces might, so far as Europeans are concerned, gradually disappear.

1026. Then, on the whole, are you of opinion that the experiment of extending the functions in question to the natives should, in the first instance, be tried at the presidencies?—I think that it should be tried, and would there work well.

1027. You have been a good deal examined before the Public or Miscellaneous Committee, on the subject of establishing a legislative council in India; does it occur to you to give any information or opinion upon that subject, which you have not stated before that Committee?—I do not think that I have anything material to add to my former evidence on that subject.

1028. Do you think that the relaxation of the restrictions which a good deal prevent Europeans from entering into the interior of India and forming establishments there, would in fact be attended with the effect of the greatly increased settlement or residence of Europeans in the provinces?—I am inclined to think that it would increase the number of settlers, particularly under the Madras presidency, where the restrictions against the residence of Europeans, not in the service, have been more rigidly enforced than elsewhere, and where I think European capital and skill would find in many cases very useful and beneficial employment; but I do not think they would colonize or settle permanently in India.

1029. Would the introduction of Europeans, as competitors with the natives, in the different branches of trade, agriculture or manufacture, operate upon the whole favourably for the natives in the interior?—Decidedly so; I can contemplate no instance of their operating otherwise. I speak with reference to the few cases in which Europeans have found admission into the Madras territories.

1030. Would the immediate effect of a successful competition be injurious to those who were worsted?—There would be hardly any competition. There could be none with the great mass, viz., the lower agricultural classes of the natives, for no European could, with success, attempt competition with them, nor with the more numerous portion of the other natives employed in actual labour or in the minor branches

18 April 1832.

Alex. D. Campbell,
Esq.

branches of trade, on account of the much cheaper rate at which natives live, compared with that of the expenses of the lowest class of Europeans, whose wants are much greater in India than in their own country. The same cause renders it unlikely that any European artisan could successfully compete with the Indian of a similar rank. The great want at Madras is want of capital, both amongst the agriculturists and the traders of the country. The whole of the country is in this respect very much exhausted; and I think that the successful class of European settlers would be those who might employ a large capital in the improvement of the irrigation, or of the agriculture, of the country, or in extensive trade. This would introduce a new set of men into the Madras provinces, distinct from any considerable class of the natives known there.

1031. Do you mean to say that neither native labour on the one hand, nor European capital on the other, would find any competition to cope with it?—Yes, that is my general impression; I also think that European invention, skill, enterprise and superior ability, would lead many of the few natives who do possess capital to join their capital with that of Europeans, more to the benefit of themselves than it is now employed.

1032-3. What natives do you think would contribute their capital in that manner?—The few native capitalists at the presidency, and gradually those in the interior also.

The Right Hon. ROBERT GRANT in the Chair.

JAMES MILL, Esq. called in and examined.

1034. HAVE you considered the present state of the law in India, and the provisions which have been made for its administration?—In some degree, I have.

29 June 1832.

James Mill, Esq.

1035. What is your opinion as to the practical effect of the system, and in what degree is the administration of the English law by the supreme courts in India necessary or advantageous?—It has always appeared to me, that two systems of law in any country were a thing of itself objectionable. As far as possible, the people should have but one set of rules to govern their conduct, and those rules as simple as possible, in order that they may be more perfectly known. Two systems of law imply, besides complexity, the expense of two judicial establishments; one for each. The inconvenience, I conceive to be exceedingly enhanced, when the two systems are liable to come on the same ground; that is, when a distinct line is not drawn between the classes of individuals subject to each. In India the limits of jurisdiction have been exceedingly ill defined. The jurisdiction of the supreme courts is extended over the natives to a great, and by no means a well defined degree, whence it happens, that the same persons are subject to two different and highly dissimilar systems of law ; and as they are a simple and ignorant people, guided by what they see and hear, and with very little reflection, the confusion thus created in their minds may be easily conceived. The history of the introduction of English law shows that the circumstances which originally called for it have entirely gone by. When it was first introduced, we had no territorial possessions in India, and no subjects : the English were a small number of individuals allowed to establish themselves in the territory of a foreign sovereign : established in a country where the provisions for the administration of justice were most imperfect, the English found themselves exceedingly at a loss : not only questions of property arose among themselves, but a great demand was felt for the suppression and punishment of crimes. It was not considered expedient to have recourse to the tribunals of the country, more especially in criminal cases, both because trust could not be reposed in the equity of the sentence, and because punishments were barbarous ; they therefore obtained from the Government at home a charter for the administration of justice amongst themselves, and in the circumstances of that time, the expediency of administering English law, there being no others than Englishmen to administer it to, cannot be doubted ; but the nature of the case was totally changed when we became the sovereigns of those territories, and established tribunals of our own for the population contained in them. We, however, continued the establishment for the administration of English law to the small number of Englishmen, after the tribunals of the country were ours, in the same manner as we did when the tribunals were the tribunals of a barbarous government, and when we could have no confidence in them. It appears to me, that the purposes which those institutions were intended to serve, not now having any existence, there is no occasion for them. The tribunals of the country are no longer the tribunals of a barbarous sovereign, but our own tribunals ; and therefore to maintain a special set of tribunals for a small number of individuals mixed with the immense population of the country, appears to me in the first place needless, and on account of the inconvenience with which it is necessarily connected, highly impolitic.

29 June 1832.

James Mill, Esq.

1036. Are you not perfectly aware that the supreme courts of judicature, as now constituted, were introduced under circumstances somewhat varied from those which you have described, as the circumstances under which the introduction of the English law took place ; that they were introduced after we acquired territorial dominion, and with the special view of checking abuses, or supposed abuses, committed under the Company's government ; advert to that view of the subject, and consider whether it does, in any and what respect, affect your former answer ? — I am aware that the supreme courts, as now constituted, were introduced subsequently to our obtaining the territory. The courts were established on the present footing, partly with the view of improving the administration of English law, and partly under the supposition now mentioned, that they would afford security against injuries committed by the local government. The courts of English law can interfere with the acts of the Government only when illegal acts have been committed against Englishmen. I am not aware that the history of them affords any great experience of their utility in that respect ; the instances are few, I think, in which the Government have been charged with injuries to Englishmen, for which the supreme courts could afford redress. Besides, it appears to me that an Englishman reading residing in India will always have abundant means of making known his complaints, and urging his claims to redress, if supreme courts were put out of existence.

29 June 1832.

1037. Do you think that any inconvenience would arise from the doing away with the supreme courts, from this circumstance, that these have now been established for some time, and there are considerable communities which have grown up at the different presidencies, who have been habituated to this jurisdiction, and they are generally supposed to be content with it?—It may be that the change of system would be felt as an inconvenience at first, because a change in anything to which people have been accustomed, especially in what touches their interest so strongly as a system of law, disturbs their thoughts a little when it first takes place. But that disturbance, I think, would speedily wear off, and after all, is nothing of an inconvenience compared with that which seems inseparable from the existence of two exceedingly different and conflicting systems of law in the same country.

1038. It has been alleged by several persons that the natives do, in fact, feel a great confidence in the supreme courts, and a confidence derived principally from the notion that it is a sort of check on the Company; how far do you assent to their opinion?—The natives of Calcutta and of the other presidencies have a confidence in the supreme courts on two accounts. In the first place, they are under the superintendence of a jealous and intelligent public; a good ground of confidence always. That, however, would not be excluded under any arrangement by which the present courts would be superseded. I know not any ground of confidence which, in such a case, would be taken away, except the idea that the supreme courts rest upon an authority superior to that of the Government. Now it appears to me, that this last ground, so far from being an advantage, is altogether an evil, and of great magnitude. The existence of a double authority in the same country of two independent authorities, can never lead to good, must always act unfavourably on the willing obedience of the people, which is the strong arm of the government. It never can be reconciled to common sense, that an authority should exist in any country pretending to be superior to that government to which all must pay obedience, and to which all look up for protection. I think, therefore, the existence of courts upon a footing different from the will of the government of the country, is altogether to be avoided; and that, even if it were deemed expedient to maintain courts for the administration of the English law for Englishmen, it would be a most important improvement to make the commission of the judges run in the name of the Government rather than in the name of the King. The same independence might be secured to them in the one case as in the other; they might be equally appointed for life, and responsible for their good behaviour to the same authorities.

1039. Do you think any advantage is obtained by having courts in India which are in sympathy with the judicature of this country, and the judges of which are supplied immediately from the body of English barristers?—With regard to the mass of the people in India, I do not see how that circumstance should have any operation at all. With regard to the Englishmen, they may be supposed to be attached to their own laws, and possibly enough would have objections to be deprived of what they call the protection of English laws. But that is a feeling which, if substantial security were afforded them by other arrangements both for their properties and their persons, I think would speedily give way, and at all events ought not to stand in the way of arrangements that are of importance to the good government of India.
E.I.—IV. X 2 their

29 June 1832.

James Mill, Esq.

1040. The question being in what manner the objects of good government are best to be secured to the natives, is it of no advantage to them that the supreme courts exhibit in their capitals a standard of judicial administration which is asserted by an authority paramount to that of the Company, and to its practice the Company's courts may in some degree conform their own?—I question very much the idea that the operation of the supreme courts has had any influence in ameliorating the proceedings of the native courts, not only because the two systems are so exceedingly different, but because the intercourse and acquaintance with the proceedings of the supreme courts are extended to so minute a portion of the population and their judges. I may add, that in my opinion the English courts afford more examples of what is to be avoided than what is to be followed in tribunals erected in India.

1041. Do you conceive that at the presidencies an assimilation could be easily made of the English law, which prevails there almost entirely, to any system of law which should also be administered to the natives in the provinces?—The change I should contemplate at the presidencies, in the first instance at least, would be a change with respect to the judicial establishment and the form of procedure, rather than in the law itself. In point of fact, what the supreme court now does is to administer English law to Englishmen, and native law to the natives, though both according to the forms of the English courts. Now, the difference in my contemplation would be, that English law would still be administered to Englishmen, and the native law to the natives, but according to the forms that might be adopted as best applicable to the courts of the country generally. The questions which fall for discussion in courts of law generally, and in India with few exceptions, come under the two great heads of inheritance and contract. As far as questions of contract are concerned, the leading principle of law is the same everywhere, the interpretation of the will of the contracting parties. With respect to inheritance, it is the uniform principle of all the tribunals in India to attend to what is the law of the party before the court; to administer the Mahomedan law of inheritance where the party is a Mahomedan, the Hindoo law of inheritance where the party is a Hindoo, and the English law of inheritance where the party is an Englishman; nor do I see what should hinder the same thing from being done with correctness under the change which I contemplate.

1042. State your opinion as to the efficiency of the country courts, as at present established?—I conceive that as at present established, they labour under considerable defects. When courts for the administration of law to the natives were first established by our government in India, they consisted of three grades, the Zillah Courts, the Provincial Courts, and the Sudder Adawlut; all three were courts of original jurisdiction, but rose above one another in the amount on which they could adjudicate. The zillah courts, of which one existed in each considerable district, had jurisdiction of all causes up to a certain amount; the provincial courts, each of which included the local limits of several zillahs, had original jurisdiction from the point at which the zillah courts stopped, up to a considerably higher amount, and and the sudder court, the jurisdiction of which included the whole country, had original jurisdiction in all the higher sums; the provincial courts were, besides, courts of appeal from the zillah courts; and the sudder adawlut was the court of appeal from the original jurisdiction of the provincial courts: such was the provision for civil judicature, both original and appellate. The provincial courts had confided to them, besides, the entire criminal jurisdiction of the country, with the exception of the duties called magisterial, imposed on the zillah judges, including a portion of criminal jurisdiction, analagous to that possessed by the justices of the peace in England, acting singly. Experience discovered, that the establishment, as thus formed, was, in point of extent, unequal to the business which was to be performed. The tribunals of all the grades were unable to get through with that portion of the business which fell to their share. To supply the deficiency of the zillah courts, natives were employed as judges, to decide causes of a small amount. There were then four grades of tribunals of original jurisdiction, native judges, zillah courts, provincial courts, and sudder dewanny adawlut, rising one above another by the amount of the sums for which they could adjudicate, and the one immediately above always acting as an appellate court to the one below. The use of the native judges, the amount for which they could adjudicate, has gone on increasing, till by a recent decision of the government, they are to be intrusted with nearly the whole jurisdiction in the first instance; they are to try all causes up to the amount of 5,000 rupees; and causes in India for sums exceeding this are comparatively few. In the meantime it was also found that the business of the provincial courts, including criminal jurisdiction, with the portion of original and appellate jurisdiction in civil matters assigned to them, was much more than what they were able to accomplish. In 1829 the resolution was adopted of appointing functionaries, called commissioners of revenue and circuit, who among other duties were intended to exercise the whole of the criminal jurisdiction which had belonged to the provincial courts; that scheme proved a failure from the beginning; the commissioners were too few for the duties with which they were charged. A resolution has been recently adopted to relieve those commissioners from the whole of their criminal jurisdiction, that is to say, the judicial duties which had been assigned to them; and in consequence of this, a great change in the whole of the judicial establishment has been resorted to. The jurisdiction in the first instance has been confided to native judges up to 5,000 rupees; and the zillah judges, being thus relieved of almost the whole of their original jurisdiction, are to have the criminal jurisdiction of the country. The system therefore will stand thus: the civil jurisdiction in the first instance, almost wholly in the hands of the native judges; the zillah judges to be judges in appeal from the native judges; the sudder adawlut judges in appeal from the cases decided by the zillah judges; and the zillah judges, besides their original and appellate jurisdiction, to have the criminal jurisdiction entirely; it being part of the plan, that the provincial courts should be abolished.

James Mill, Esq.

1804g. In what respect might that system be considered equal to its objects, and in what respect deficient?—I think it is much to be feared that an amount of duty beyond what they will be able to accomplish, is assigned to the zillah judges. They are to receive appeals from the native judges, who must be very numerous; they are are to have upon their hands the criminal jurisdiction of their districts, and besides all this, a portion of original jurisdiction, viz. in the higher sums reserved to them. One of the most defective parts of our Indian system has always been that of appeal. It appears to me that the correct notion of appeal has not been kept in view: one error, I think, has consisted in giving the business of appeal to courts the principal part of whose time and attention was absorbed by judicature in the first instance. There appears to me one obvious and great advantage in courts for the business of appeal exclusively, and others for original jurisdiction exclusively, and that the two species of jurisdiction should not be joined. A still greater error has been committed in India, by an incorrect notion of the real business of appeal. Courts of appeal acting as such have considered it competent to them to take new evidence, by which in reality their functions ceased to be those of an appellate court, and became a new trial, from which trial of the same cause only by another tribunal, there was in reality no appeal at all. I consider the objection to the taking of fresh evidence in appeal as quite radical: besides its being in fact a decision without appeal, it interferes with other advantages of great importance. If you confine the proceedings on appeal to what is substantially appellate judicature, you may always have your appeals brought before the best tribunals, because nothing being submitted to the court of appeal but the pleadings and evidence, there is no occasion for the attendance either of witnesses or the parties; and the distance of the appellate court from the abode of the parties is therefore a matter of indifference.

James Mill, Esq.

1044. Would you think it advantageous, in cases where fresh evidence arises in the appellate court, to send back the cause for trial to another court?—The complaints which come before the appellate court must at the utmost be of three kinds: the appellant complains either that evidence which ought to have been taken has not been taken, or that the evidence taken has not been duly weighed, or that the law has not been properly applied. Now with regard to two of these questions, namely, whether the evidence has been properly weighed and the proper decisions come to, and whether the law has been properly applied, the appellate court is competent to decide them upon the mere view of the record. If the complaint should be, that evidence which ought to have been taken was not taken, the proper course for the appellate court is to send the cause back to the original court, where justice seems to require it, with an order to take the evidence and pass a fresh decree.

1045. In both these cases, would it not retain its real character of an appellate court?—It would do so, confining its functions expressly to the appellate business.

1046. You were proceeding to state the defects of the system as last established in India in the native courts; have you any further remarks to make upon that head?—Another of the defects of the existing courts has been their system of procedure. With a view to avoid prolixity and complication of the pleadings in English law, it has been attempted to confine them to two instruments, the plaint and the answer, and to confine them to the setting forth of material points only. But the business being left to the management of ignorant parties and their ignorant advisers, it rarely happens that the real point in dispute is elicited or adumbrated; and the case comes on for trial before the judge with little or no preparation, the parties seldom know to what points evidence will be required. The attendance of of numerous witnesses, the great distance they have to come, the uncertainty when their cause will be heard, and the necessity of a long and expensive attendance, constitutes such an obstruction to the business of justice in India as has rendered it almost nugatory with regard to a great proportion of the people. Another objection of mine to the courts in India is, that they have been established upon the principle of one sort of courts for sums of small amount, another sort of courts for sums of higher, the best tribunals for the highest sums, the worst tribunals for the lowest; declaring, in fact, that more care is due to prevent wrongs done to the rich than wrongs done to the poor. The opinion which has obtained but too generally, appears to me most erroneous, that suits for the small sums are suits of the least importance. I think, in point of importance, the reverse is the right order; and I am not sure that the causes for small sums are those which it is the most easy to decide.

29 June 1832.

James Mill, Esq.

1047. Why do you think they are not the most easy to decide?—I do not mean that they are apt to be the most complicated, but that it is most difficult to provide security for the fair and honest decision of them: the rich man can make a noise, and will be heard if he is wronged. The case of a rich man creates attention, that of the smaller sums escapes observation. The great difficulty in India, where there is little aid from publicity, is, I fully believe, in securing honest decision for the smaller sums. Another point on which I think they have erred in India is this, that when they found the number of tribunals too small for the business to be performed, they have so long persisted in forming tribunals with more judges than one. A single judge can at all events get through with a greater amount of business than several judges sitting together, because no time is lost in hearing one another; and there are strong reasons for believing that the securities even for good judicature are greater in the case of a single judge than when the judicatory is more numerous.

1048. Can you suggest any and what improvement in that system, directing your attention first to the judicial establishment?—In India there is a necessity for numerous tribunals, because if justice is not brought near to the poor ryot in India, he is denied access to it altogether; it is therefore not a matter of choice but necessity, to confide judicature in the first instance very extensively to the natives. It has at last become a prevalent idea, that the best arrangement would be to confide judicature in the first instance entirely to the natives, reserving the business of appeal to Europeans. The supreme government in India have now proposed to go very nearly to that extent, confiding the trial of all causes up to 5,000 rupees to native judges. When they had gone so far, I do not see why they should not have gone a step further, and have simplified the system, by confiding jurisdiction in the first instance wholly to the native judges. I confess in the mental state of the natives at present, I should have been afraid to have gone so far; but if they are competent to 5,000 rupees, they are also competent to all the rest. We have however the means, I think, of providing a very considerable security beyond what has been proposed by the Bengal government, against the defects which cannot but be anticipated at first in the judicature of the natives judges. According to my idea of appeal, we should have a temporary resource of a very important kind in the zillah judges, to whom I would give concurrent jurisdiction with the native judges. I think there should be only one appeal from any court; and there being but one appeal it it should always go to the best tribunal. The best tribunal they have in India is the sudder adawlut ; I therefore think the appeals from the native judges, instead of going as now to the zillah judges, should go to the sudder adawlut directly : such alteration would then be necessary in the sudder adawlut as would enable them to discharge the business promptly. I consider it of the essence of appeal, and that upon which a great portion of the benefit of it depends, that it should be decided promptly. If the business of appeal be as simple as I conceive that it is, there would be no objection to appeals going to Calcutta from all parts of the presidency, even the most distant ; because the proceedings before the original court might easily be transmitted by the post. By going to Calcutta they would have two first-rate advantages, that of the best judges, and that of the best public. The judges of the sudder adawlut should sit separately, each judge deciding as many appeals as in his power, the number being sufficiently increased to get expeditiously through the business. As one of the uses to be derived from courts of appeal, a use of peculiar importance where local courts are numerous, the law ill established, and the qualifications of the judges not high, is to secure uniformity in the law, an additional and imperative reason thence arises from the presence of the appellate courts on the same spot.

James Mill, Esq.

1049. Would it not be difficult to transmit the legal documents to so great a distance ?—When papers are to be transmitted by the post, whether the distance is 100 or 500 miles is very immaterial. The proper arrangement, I think, would be that the judges should all sit in one hall of justice, but that each should have his separate apartment open to the public, and that only when a doubtful question on a matter of law arose, they should deliberate and decide in common.

1050. What do you think of the suggestion, that there should be two sudder adawluts, one for the Lower and another for the Upper Provinces ?—I should prefer having the appellate tribunal at Calcutta, because the inconvenience of transmitting documents the additional distance is not material ; and the public at Calcutta is so much superior, as to be an advantage of the greatest importance. For the sake also of a more perfect uniformity in the decisions of the judges, and of course in the law, they ought to be all on the same spot. As I have now described it, we should have a judicial establishment exceedingly simple : tribunals of native judges for original jurisdiction in all parts of the country, and a tribunal of appeal at the Presidency.

1051. Do you conceive native judges could be intrusted with exercising their functions, without the presence of any European judge ?—The native judges are much less fit for the trust to be reposed in them than is to be wished, but there is no remedy ; there are no means of having Europeans with them, and we must look out for other securities, and provide the best we can. One to which I have as yet only alluded, would be the concurrent jurisdiction of the zillah judges. As, according to my plan, they would be relieved of all the jurisdiction, both civil and criminal, now assigned them, their whole time would be at disposal, and I would retain them as judges with original jurisdiction, the same as the native judges, giving the option to the people of going before either ; a test would be thereby immediately afforded of the degree of trust reposed by the people in the native judges, and a greater check would be thereby applied to them, than by anything in addition to the appeal, which I think we have the means of providing. Something might also be done by the appointment of assessors to the judge, who might be chosen something in the way in which we choose a jury, and would act as a sort of public.

29 June 1832.

James Mill, Esq.

1052. You have as yet suggested no observations with regard to the administration of criminal justice; will you state any observations which occur to you upon that subject?—The business of criminal judicature has generally been treated as more difficult, or at least it has been thought that its errors required to be more carefully guarded against than those of civil judicature. But I doubt whether it is an opinion which is well founded; criminal judicature may be considered as more simple than civil, as really requiring less discrimination and acuteness of mind than a large proportion of civil cases. The injury liable to be sustained by bad judicature in civil matters is often more serious than in penal matters; setting aside the cases of the higher punishments, particularly those implying irremediable injury. If then I am right in this my opinion, that the business of penal judicature is to the full as easy as civil judicature and that it is not more difficult to take securities against the evils liable to be incurred by bad judicature in the one case than the other, there is no reason why the judges to whom the whole of the civil jurisdiction is assigned, should not also be the criminal judges. That being my opinion, I would make the native judges, criminal as well as civil judges. So long, however, as the native judges in India are as imperfect as they now are, it would be desirable and necessary to stay execution in all cases not of a very moderate degree of punishment, till the proceedings were reviewed by the sudder adawlut. There would be the inconvenience in that case of taking down in writing the proceedings and evidence; but this, I think, would be amply compensated by the advantages which would attend the arrangement. Some further provisions may be thought necessary with regard to very high punishments, especially those implying irremediable injury, above all, death; but it appears to me that the punishment of death in India might be kept within very narrow bounds, if not altogether abolished: it is known to be part of the character of the natives, to stand more in awe of other punishments than of the loss of life.

1053. What is the punishment more effective on the inhabitants in India than the capital punishment?—They dislike hard labour more, and banishment; and in truth the punishment of death even at present is sparingly inflicted.

1054. Do you apply your system of having native judges in the courts, to criminal cases occurring between a native and an European?—Yes; all questions occurring within the district to be decided in the same manner, whoever the parties may be.

1055. Do you think that it would satisfy an European that his case, either civil or criminal, should be decided in the provinces in those courts where only natives are judges?—The security to the European would be such as I think ought to satisfy him, because he would always have, in the last resort, the benefit of decision by an European judge of the highest grade, and acting under the strongest responsibility. Considerable objection is likely to rise in the mind of an Englishman at the first idea of being subject to punishment upon the award of a native judge. But as all decisions of a native judge awarding punishment beyond a very slight one should be stayed until the cause is reviewed by the superior court, no punishment beyond a very slight one would be inflicted upon an Englishman, except by the authority of the English judge.

James Mill, Esq.

1056. Do you think that Europeans would be satisfied by having their case decided by judges without a jury?—I think that having security for good decision, they ought to be satisfied. But if the prejudices of Englishmen should raise insuperable obstructions, a special provision might be made for them; a recorder's court might exist at the three presidencies to try Englishmen in the more highly penal cases, and then they might have the satisfaction of a jury also.

1057. If an extension of liberty is granted to Europeans to reside in the country, would it not be fair to exact from them, as a condition of such residence, that they should be subject to the same laws as the natives?—I think not only that it would be reasonable, but that it would be indispensable.

1058. Be so good as to offer any suggestions that occur to you with respect to the improvement in the mode of judicial procedure?—I think the mode of judicial investigation which has been common in India, is to a very considerable degree faulty. It has erred, in the first place, by a very unnecessary departure from the practice to which the natives were accustomed; I mean that of parties appearing personally before the judge and stating their own case. I believe that in India few things would be more efficient for the purposes of justice than oral pleading, which, properly managed, I deem an instrument of inestimable value. The judicial investigation divides itself into two parts; the first, what in England we call the pleadings; the second, what we call the trial. The first part consists in the essence and nature of the thing, in the statements and counter-statements of the parties; and the use of those statements and counter-statements is, that the exact point upon which the controversy turns may be ascertained. This is a matter of so much importance to a right decision, that it never ought to be intrusted to any body but the judge. When the parties are asked by the judge what is their demand and what the ground of it; what the defence, and the ground of it, he sees immediately what is relevant and what is not so, he discriminates what is well founded from what is ill founded, and is so far able, by clearing off all that is unsound and superfluous, to get at the merits of the case, to fix upon the exact point at which the controversy turns. This mode of proceeding is found by experience to have this other most important consequence. When the statements and counter-statements of the parties are made before the judge under the best securities for veracity, a very great proportion of causes stop there, and are satisfactorily conducted. The scrutiny of their statements by the judge enables the parties themselves to see whether they have grounds or not; they consent that a judgment should be pronounced at the first hearing, and all is over without delay and without the expense of a trial. When doubt remains, it is either with regard to a matter of fact or a matter of law: when the matter of fact on which the question turns is affirmed on the one side and denied on the other, then comes the trial, the object of which is to ascertain the truth with respect to the particular fact by evidence. But as the judge himself has thus determined the very fact which is to be proved, no witnesses are called but to speak to that fact. The judge may limit the number of witnesses, and the expense attending it still further; he may require require of the parties a list of the witnesses each expected to speak to the point; and by questions eliciting what they are expected to know, and why, the judge would be enabled to discriminate what witnesses there would be any advantage in having, and what there would be no advantage in having, and it might be proper in him in such case, assigning his reasons, to grant his summons for such only as he thought would be useful.

29 June 1832.

James Mill, Esq.

1059. I want to know whether it would be possible to leave the parties to call the witnesses on each side?—The reason why the choice should be left to the judge is, that no witnesses but those who are likely to be really useful, should be subjected to the burden of attendance. The course of proceeding which is now followed in the courts, is attended with very different effects. The pleading, as the first part of the judicial investigation is called, is all in writing, and is reduced to a statement of the demand on the part of the plaintiff, and a statement of the defence on the other part: it is enjoined on them that they should confine themselves to the points which are in dispute. In reality, however, the instruments being prepared by the parties themselves and their advisers, who are incapable of discriminating the point in dispute, are a confused mass of allegations, and are so far from being intended by them to be the real representation of the truth, that they are as wide a departure from it as they can contrive, with any semblance of truth, to make it. There is in reality in this mode of proceeding no issue joined. Two great evils are incurred: one is, that every case, instead of stopping at the first stage, of necessity goes on also to the second, and incurs all the expense of the trial, necessary or not: the second is, that parties, not knowing to what particular facts or points witnesses will be required, are under the necessity of bringing them to every point for which they think it is at all probable they may be needed. With respect to the second part of the judicial investigation, viz. the trial, there is one thing which I should mention, a practice common in Bengal at least, which has been pressed upon them by the amount of business and want of time on the part of the judges; I mean the practice of taking evidence by deputy. A great deal of the evidence is there not taken by the judges themselves, but by the native officers of their courts, and reported to the judges, who decide upon this reported and very untrustworthy evidence.

1060. Have you any suggestions to offer with respect to the law that should be administered in our provinces in India?—The state of the law, the native law in India, is very imperfect; so little is there of what can be called law, that the business of the courts is little less than arbitration. Of law in India, resting on the authority of any legislature, there is none. There are certain books which they call law-books, but they contain only the opinions of certain individuals, and their talk is so general, so exceedingly loose, that it affords little or no direction. The customs of India are in fact the laws of India, that by which almost all rights are created and maintained; and these customs, at least in the great features, have luckily much uniformity. The judges in India have thus a peculiar duty; they have to take evidence not only to the matters of fact which come in dispute before them, but to ascertain the law; that is, to gather from the testimony of witnesses what is the custom of the country and of the place. Here the great practical question is, what can be done to classify and record those customs in a book, under such well defined heads and such accurate expressions as would give them in any degree the instructive operation of laws? It appears to me that a great deal might be accomplished. The leading customs which constitute the great directing principles in India, are not so many but that they might be comprehended in general propositions or maxims, which might receive by the Legislature the authority of laws, and thence by degrees a code of laws not interfering with, or disturbing existing rights, but in reality confirming and establishing them, might be obtained. The Regulations of the Government have to a great degree superseded the Mahomedan penal law, which was general in India when we established our dominion there. Our penal law, however, has not much accuracy, and all offences are classed under a few very general heads, so that a very large discretion remains with the judge: but there would be no great difficulty in breaking down those large classifications into subordinate ones, in such a manner as to render the penal law sufficiently precise. It is by no means impracticable to obtain in writing such general maxims both in the civil and penal branches of substantive law, as would afford a tolerable rule for the judges in India.

1061. You have spoken of the courts that have administered one system of law to Englishmen in India, and another system to the different classes of natives. On the supposition that Englishmen were allowed to hold land in India, would you introduce the English law of inheritance?—Not by preference. Uniformity is an important advantage, and the law of inheritance with respect to land should be the same as with respect to chattels, which is the law of the natives: but if it was considered by Englishmen a matter of importance that the law of primogeniture should be preserved, it does not occur to me that more than an inconvenience would be sustained by indulging them.

1063. Would you have the issue settled entirely by the judges?—Yes.

1064. Have you considered the subject of appeals from India to England?—I have thought of it certainly as a part of the general system.

1065. Do you consider the present system on that head as proper and efficient?—The mode of appeal against decisions in India, to the Privy Council in England, is undoubtedly very defective as hitherto managed. Appeals have been instituted, but no provision having been made for prosecuting them here, the misery of unfinished suits has been the consequence. Steps towards a remedy have been recently taken: it has been under the consideration both of the Court of Directors and the Privy Council, how this evil might be removed. If appeals are to come from India, provision ought undoubtedly to be made in some way or other for their being speedily brought to a hearing and conclusion; but it has never appeared to me, that for attaining the ends of justice substantially, an appeal to England is in reality needed. If you take, as you ought to do, the best precautions for obtaining correct decisions in India, it is unnecessary to go any further. It would be too much to assume, that injustice, after all we can do, would never be committed by the courts in India, because we never can have all perfect securities against injustice; but there is great advantage in having an end of litigation; and I am not apprehensive of so many instances of failure of substantial justice in India, that that the remedy for them would be a compensation for the inconvenience incurred by sending them to England. One advantage which is frequently insisted upon, as derived from appeals to England is, that the attention of Englishmen is thereby called to Indian subjects, more fully and more closely than it would otherwise be: first of all, I think the attention of Englishmen is but little turned to the litigations before the Council; I hope that better means will be found of drawing attention in England to the government of India; and at all events, discussions in England must rather operate as a check upon the general proceedings of government, than as a security against mis-decision in the courts of law.

29 June 1832.

James Mill, Esq.

1066. Then is it your impression, that no appeal should be allowed from India to this country?—I think none should be allowed: I think if you make the courts there as good as you can make them, appeals to England will be attended with more evil than good.

1067. Have you attended to the subject, whether Europeans whom we employ to administer justice in India, should be educated for that purpose, or whether Government should trust to their being sufficiently qualified; whether or not provision should be made for their education?—I think an appropriate education for that portion of the servants of the Company, who are destined for the business of judicature in India, has not been sufficiently provided for. Anything that approaches to the nature of education for judges, as the subject is contemplated by me, has not, if I am rightly informed, had place at all. The College at Haileybury has chiefly had in view, as it ought, the business of general education; that the young men sent out might be well educated gentlemen; the object undoubtedly of primary importance. But what has been provided for legal instruction appears to me not to have been very well devised. What I mean is, that it is not directed to what should be the main object of it. The original design of the law-class at Haileybury was that of a class of English law, to which character, I believe, it pretty closely adhered till the time of Sir James Mackintosh, who took a wider range, but gave his instruction an historical rather than a legal cast, dwelling more upon the history of the English constitution than the history of English law, though even that would not have been to the purpose. The present professor, if I may judge by a list I have seen of questions propounded to his pupils, though he has not followed the course of his predecessors, is not much less wide of what I, perhaps erroneously, regard as the proper mark. His questions, for the most part, if what I have seen may be considered a fair specimen, bear on abstract points of moral philosophy and law, and however instructive in themselves, are not so appropriate for young men going to India to settle, pretty much in the way of arbitration, the disputes of the natives, as it would be to show them how the dictates of right reason are to be applied in so peculiar and so important a scene of action.

1068. Considering that the law-class of Haileybury is but one out of many to which all young men are obliged to pay attention, would it be possible in the course of two years, which comprises the whole time of their education, to instruct them to any great extent in the judicial duties which they may have to perform?—I should think not, attending as they do to the other parts of their education at the same time. After all, as the business of judges in India partakes so much of the nature nature of arbitration, with little guidance from law or established practice, at present, good sense is the best conductor, and the best preparation in the way of education is probably that which is best calculated to give a clear and discriminating mind. If a man has that he soon finds for himself the practical rules applicable to his situation.

James Mill, Esq.

1069. Would it be possible or advisable to have any system in India for preparing those who are to exercise the judicial functions; adverting to the circumstance, that if you establish a formal course of education in England, the rule must be, that the writers should choose the particular line of employment in India before they leave this country?—There is undoubtedly a difficulty in this, that those whom you educate carefully for the judicial line should be appointed to it; but the exigencies of the service and the distribution to be made of the existing agents, can be well understood only in India. But there is also a difficulty on the other side. It is only in England that the best teachers are to be had; and it would not be easy to obtain teachers with high qualifications in India. There would be one advantage in having the information bearing on the duties of judges communicated in India; that it would be given at a more advanced period of life, when it is more likely to be well understood and profited by than at the early age at which it would be given in England, where on the greater number it would not make a very deep impression.

1070. Upon the supposition that the writers, or such of them as showed a turn for that, were in this country to receive a course of instruction in the general principles and practice of law, without supposing them to enter minutely into political or local law, would they not be better fitted for most of the employments that would fall to them in India by reason of their having received legal instruction?—Undoubtedly; the instruction which would be useful, peculiar to those who are to exercise the judicial functions in India, would be useful in regard to every other function they would be called upon to discharge; a great deal indeed of what is done by the collectors of revenue is hardly less a judicial function than trying causes.

1071. Should you think the qualifications in this country would be equally attained by providing a system of instruction which the persons in question would be obliged to go through, or by establishing a test which they should be obliged to answer?—My opinion is, that the best mode of securing the qualifications we desire, would be to leave the young men to acquire them where it best suited them, and to establish a test: but I am inclined to make an exception with respect to legal education, because there is no opportunity in England of obtaining it, at least in that form which is appropriate to India. If, therefore, I trusted to the test in all other respects, I should be disposed, if it could be done, to make appropriate provision for instruction on the subject of law and its administration generally; as well as the peculiarities of both in India.

1072. Would it not be consistent with your last answer that a test should be established and should be rigidly enforced, and that an appropriate system of education should be approved of, which would be always resorted to if it was found to be the best means of qualifying for the test?—I think that none but good effects could be expected to flow from such an arrangement.

Lunæ, 2^a die Julii, 1832.

The Right Hon. ROBERT GRANT in the Chair.

WILLIAM EMPSON, Esq. called in and examined.

IV.
JUDICIAL.

2 July 1832

*William Empson,
Esq.*

1073. WHAT situation do you hold?—I am Professor of Law at Haileybury College.

1074. How long have you held your present situation?—I succeeded Sir James Mackintosh, I think in 1824.

1075. What number of lectures do you give?—The College consists of students classed in four successive terms of half a year each. During his first term the student was not expected to attend law lectures; but in consequence of our diminished numbers, I at present lecture the students of the first term together with those of the second. They attend only one hour a week every Wednesday; the students of the third and fourth terms attend two hours a week; that is, one hour on Wednesday and one hour on Thursday. As the general examinations, &c. leave about seven months in the year for lectures, a student who remains the entire two years at the College receives, in three terms, from 70 to 80 hours of law instruction; during the four terms, about 90 hours, according to my present arrangement.

1076. Is it in the nature of your lectures to prescribe any reading to the students who attend them, or from time to time to examine them as to the progress they have made in the subject on which you have been lecturing?—Observing the extreme state of ignorance on the part of young men of 16 or 17 upon these subjects, I have found it expedient to introduce them gradually to what might be called strict law. The same cause has rendered it desirable to take certain text-books, which, as containing the body or raw material of the lectures, they may afterwards go over by themselves. The advantage of collateral private reading is limited by the shortness of the time, and by the difficulty of putting into the hands of the students any great variety of books of reference. I have varied my courses occasionally, for obvious reasons; but my object has been to give every student an opportunity of obtaining just principles, and elemental knowledge on the limits between morals and law in the case of the chief political and civil rights; on the criminal law, English and Mahomedan; and on the law of evidence. With this view my usual text-book for the first and second terms has been the principal chapters of Paley's Moral Philosophy, with the corresponding chapters in Blackstone. By this means I have constituted a parallel line of observation between the nature and extent of moral duties and legal duties: as, for instance, the moral obligation of government and the legal obligation of government; the moral obligation of property, promises, &c., and the legal obligation of property; of different sorts of contract, &c.; the moral obligation arising from the different public and private relations, and the legal obligation arising from the same, pointing out the difference and the reason of the difference. For the third term my principal text-books have been Lord Kames' Essay on Criminal

2 July 1832.

William Empson,
Esq.

Criminal Law, Dumont on Rewards and Punishments, the last volume of Blackstone, Russel and Archbold, and so much of Harrington's Analysis of the Bengal Regulations as relates to the Mahomedan criminal law and the Regulations of the Governor and Council. For the fourth or last term my text-books have been Dumont's Book upon Evidence, Stephen upon Pleading, and the first volume of Phillips's Treatise of English Law upon Evidence, with the chapters upon testimony in the Mahomedan and the Hindoo law. The above I consider my usual course. In order to vary the subjects, I have lectured occasionally on the English forms of action, with Selwyn's Nisi Prius as a text-book, on Sir Thomas Strange's Hindoo law; and, for the first time, gave the two senior classes, this last half year, lectures on Pothier upon Obligations, and the two junior classes lectures in Domat's Civil Law, relating to succession and inheritance. Respecting the most useful course of lectures, I have inquired frequently of the civilians returned from India what was the best method which they thought I could pursue. I have usually, on their leaving College, requested of the students, who have paid most attention to law, that if, on their arrival in India, they could suggest to me any improvement in my lectures, I should be extremely obliged to them for any communications which they should make to me. It is next to impossible to make lectures upon law popular with the great body of young men. I have from time to time conversed with some of the students themselves upon the subject, in order to ascertain whether any and what alteration in my subjects or mode of lecturing might obtain a greater degree of successful attention throughout my classes.

1077. In consequence of the intimation you have stated yourself to have given to the students that were leaving college, that you would be glad to receive from them any suggestions as to your lectures, have you, in fact, received suggestions from any of them afterwards?—One letter only occurs to me at present, in which not so much suggestion of alteration was made as strong expressions on the importance of the law lectures, and the advantage which had been derived from them, and the daily regret on the part of the writer, that although he was second in my law class, he had not given a greater, and indeed, his principal attention to it. In answer to the latter part of the last question, I ought to mention, that at the end of every month I sometimes ask a few questions, sometimes here and there, upon the subject of the month's lectures. The feeling that the time given for instruction is so short, and my desire to get over more ground, have induced me not to do so as regularly as, upon the whole, would, I believe, have been desirable. At the end of each month I report the progress (according to the rules of the college) which I conceive to have been made in law. My monthly report is more conjectural than positive; a guess given from the incidental answers, from the apparent attention, the regularity of attendance, &c. The real examination is at the end of every term. That consists of a vivâ voce examination upon the body of the lectures, and of written answers to a paper of printed questions; the one enabling me to check the other. At the end of every lecture I give out a set of questions, the answers to which will be contained either in the lectures themselves, or in the books referred to. The examination at the end of the term is made up principally of a selection of some of the principal points in the previous papers of weekly questions, modified and enlarged.

1078. When

2 July 1832.

William Empson,
Esq.

1078. When you state the number of hours given, you mean the number of hours occupied by attendance in the lecture room; but in order to obtain a proficiency, is it not necessary for that student to take a great deal of time privately upon the subject of them?—The test of mere proficiency, as rated at the point, somewhere about which I understood, it was the intention that it should be left, is sadly low. I should think that a young man of ordinary abilities paying ordinary attention during the lectures, would afterwards soon get up his own note-book, or that of others, sufficiently to attain that test. Considerable more is required for what we call good proficiency, and a great deal more for great.

1079. Is the time, upon the whole, occupied by the subject of law at Haileybury as great as you believe to be possible, consistent with the attention to other subjects required by the system established at the College?—The students have, within certain limits, an option left them. There are four European departments. A student is allowed to keep his term, unless he fails in more than two of these, whilst the Oriental languages are considered indispensable. The consequence is, that except a student goes out of his way to give law a preference or partiality, against which the other professors are to a certain degree upon their guard, each endeavouring to protect his own department, it is, after all, a very limited amount of law, first principles, and the general bearings, which alone even a good student can possibly acquire.

1080. Consistently with the general system established there, could that portion, on an average, allotted to them be much increased?—Certainly not; the clever and industrious have their hands full, and more than full. Upon a voluntary system like ours, the idle and the stupid will never be brought to give law a preference over the other subjects; it can only hope to get its share.

1081. Are there lectures most days of the week at the College?—Every day in the week except Sunday.

1082. Upon what principle do you frame the questions put to the students at the regular examinations?—The questions, of course, depend on the lectures. The first object in lectures must be, to create in those who attend them some interest in the subject. I consider the lectures, therefore, of the first and second term as introductory and comparatively popular; the subsequent lectures on criminal law and on evidence go more into detail. Lectures may have made a considerable and a useful impression, and the questions upon them may be judiciously prepared, yet after all, it will be but a very small part of what has been learnt which the regular examination can bring out. It is more difficult to give really efficient lectures on law to young men of 17, who have no previous knowledge or interest in the subject, than those who have not attempted it are perhaps aware of. A lecturer is driven to a compromise, and the time of compromise is one of great nicety. If he is minute and technical, young men just come from school cannot follow him; on the other hand, generalities soon become vague and lose the strictness which constitutes law. The questions at the examination fairly represent the heads of instruction which has been put within the reach of the students during the time. Those who have worked hard can show the respective degrees of progress which they have made, and room is left for nobody to complain that he has not had an opportunity afforded him of answering whatever fraction of the lectures he supposes himself to have have got up. Criminal law and the law of evidence have been represented to me to be the great practical courses of instruction for actual service; I consequently have passed the two senior terms through them in succession, drawing the attention of the students in the lectures upon the latter subject to the necessity of the method of bringing out clearly in the pleadings the point in issue, and of strictly watching the evidence so as to confine it to the point in issue, with observations upon the credibility of the witnesses, and on the different questions arising out of documentary evidence, with the object of enabling them to apply the principles to cases that may arise. The knowledge and the habit of mind calculated to form a magisterial judgment on these matters is more within the scope of the required and indeed of possible instruction than the talent of conducting a cross-examination. In criminal law I have occasionally explained several of the trials in Phillips's Abridgment of the State Trials, and in the adjudged cases of the Nizamut Adawlut, in order to show the course and the points in which criminal questions practically arise. Considering the extreme technicality of the English law, and also the extreme difficulty of finding what the Hindoo law really is anywhere, and especially in different parts of India; considering, further, the declared impossibility, according to the testimony of the most eminent men in India, that the oldest civilian can sift and adjudicate upon the credibility of native testimony; the more that I have thought of it, the less practicable has the attempt appeared to me to be of usefully labouring in that direction.

1083. Do you think without allowing much more time to the study of law at the College, it would be possible to adapt the instruction given to the young men more closely for the functions which, in case they adopt the judicial line, they will have to exercise in India?—Certainly not; I am quite positive there is not a chance of it. The nature of the case must be kept in view; what it is which has to be taught; the probable qualifications of any attainable teacher; the probable description of person to be taught under a system of patronage, we must remember, and make a proper allowance for the average abilities and industry which a young writer will bring to a lecture room. Under these circumstances, and in so very limited a period as that which is now assigned to law, nothing is left but a choice of the portion of law which can be received. You must give what the student is capable of receiving, and what he is likely to remember. Some time will elapse before he is called upon to apply the instruction; it is, therefore, in choosing the portion, prudent to select principles, both of civil and criminal law, and of evidence of universal application rather than matters of detail.

1084. Have you had any means of knowing how far the legal instruction given at Haileybury has been of benefit in the administration of justice in India?—Not further than a letter or two, and hearing incidental expressions of satisfaction at the attention which some particular student may have given to the law department. If I may add to this question, I would observe, that with respect to the species of instruction to be given by a law professor in England, the state in which the Mahomedan and Hindoo law are left, as far as they are accessible to an English reader, makes it, I think, impossible for a discreet teacher to introduce more Mahomedan and Hindoo law than I have endeavoured to introduce. If legal instruction is to commence with the general principles out of which the different branches

2 July 1832.

William Empson,
Esq.

branches of the civil and criminal law are derived, this description of teacher will probably be less readily found in India than in England.

1085. Have you considered whether it would, on the whole, be expedient, supposing the system of sending writers from this country to India, that the writers should previously to their departure select the line in which they are to be employed in India?—I should think certainly.

1086. Or is it better that they should go out with a measure of general qualification, but without any determined department, without having pitched upon the very department in which they are to be attached?—For all other appointments except judicial ones I should conceive that the same general education might apply, and that no necessity for choice would arise. It is quite otherwise in the judicial. It seems to me impossible that a person who has thought seriously what are the duties of a magistrate can have a doubt but that a degree of preliminary information, the habit of considering such subjects, and at least an acquired preference for them, should be formed, before the person is called upon to act, or is put in circumstances where it is impossible for him afterwards to form the character and acquire the knowledge but at the most serious risks. The law is not prima facie an attractive study. Some little pains must be taken to lead a person forward, to give him a turn for it, and put him in the way of ascertaining what the difficulties are, and where they lie. Great difficulties must accompany the administration of every thing which can be called law. This is especially true of a system like the Hindoo, where it is often most embarrassing to distinguish between what is merely moral advice, and what is really meant to be positive and binding law.

1087. Your answer would rather lead to the inference that, in your opinion, the existing system does not make adequate provision for the legal qualifications which are required for the Company's service in India?—I cannot express myself on that point too strongly. I can say truly that I have trembled whenever I have sent out a class, and considered that they were to administer law in India.

1088. On the supposition, then, that there was a greater facility afforded to Europeans to go out to India, and to the Europeans there to attain situations in the Indian service, should you conceive that it still might be expedient to provide legal instruction in this country?—I should think it a scandal in a government which, knowing the difficulties that attend the forming a judicial mind, and acquiring legal knowledge under favourable circumstances, should nevertheless venture to leave its judicial offices to the hazard of finding such men growing on the spot. Whether the instruction should be given here or in India, is one question; that instruction should be given somewhere, is another. Of the necessity of this, in the present state of the Europeans in India, and until a change has taken place in this respect much beyond what I can conceive the free admission of Europeans into India could for a long time possibly produce, I should have thought that there could be no difference of opinion. If Hindoo justice is to be administered arbitrio boni viri, it is true that no particular instruction in law will be then wanted; but if it is to be law, as a science and a rule, there are all the difficulties which exist in England, and many more. Unless some provision is made for forming lawyers and judges to expect that they will go there, and be found by accident as they are wanted,

2 July 1832.

*William Empson,

wanted, seems to me to be one of the very remote contingencies to which no government ought to trust on so important a subject.

1089. You would of course make exceptions?—Of course there may be exceptions now; more exceptions may arise. I speak with reference to the present state, or nearly the present state, of the service, and to the nature and qualifications of the class of Europeans in India. It will be time enough to enter into the question which a change of circumstances, it is true, may occasion, when it has in fact arisen. As soon as there are men competently qualified to choose out of on the spot, it will be absurd to go to the charge of manufacturing and importing them from England expressly for the purpose.

1090. Can you suggest any improvements in the legal education?—If instruction is to be given, and given in England, of course no comparison can be made between the progress which would be made by students taken on an average, and a student chosen upon a principle of selection. Even with that advantage, and still more in the want of it, it is most desirable that they should be a year or two older, and that a considerably greater portion of time should be allotted to instruction in law. Oriental law has to be put into solid and accessible shape as law. There is nothing in the Hindoo law, and not much in the Mahomedan, which a professor can teach with any comfort, at least as far as I am acquainted with it. If I am asked, on the supposition that the qualities and the age of the student, and that the time given to law remain the same, whether law might not be better learnt elsewhere than it is learnt on the system of the College at Haileybury, I should say that the students in law partake of the advantages and disadvantages of that system. I have always thought that for students of ability and industry it is impossible to improve upon the Haileybury system. For the average, it is itself an average establishment, gaining over some characters what it loses in others. For the idle and profligate, our system appeals to no motive to which they are sensible. The only advantage which Haileybury offers in the instance of a young man of that caste is, the chance that in an extreme case he may be stopped, and lose his appointment altogether. Looking, however, at the course of the same description of persons in our public schools and universities, I apprehend that what is most obnoxious at Haileybury is not so characteristic of Haileybury, either in kind or in degree, as might be expected under our voluntary system. At no place whatever, and under no possible system would it be possible to form legal knowledge or a judicial frame of mind in such individuals.

1091. Are you aware of any seminary in which there is now any course of legal instructions which would qualify young writers for judicial situations in India?—The only law lectures with which I am acquainted that could at all answer the purpose required, according to my view of that purpose, are those given by Mr. Amos at the London University. At Oxford and Cambridge there is nothing of the sort. But Mr. Amos's lectures are principally directed for young men in pleader's offices, or who are destined for attorney's. The specific objects consequently of those lectures, and the appropriate object of instruction in the case of young men about to fill judicial situations in India are so distinct, that it seems to be impossible to at all satisfactorily combine them.

2 July 1832.

William Empson,
Esq.

1092. Would it not be possible by the establishment of a test of legal qualification for persons going out to India, with a view to the judicial line, to secure a competent measure of qualification?—I see no difficulty whatever, except that the person who is to give the test must be supported by public opinion in the exercise of it in a very different manner from that of which the professors at Haileybury unfortunately found that they had the protection. For instance, I would draw out a syllabus on the subjects in which the young men were expected to qualify themselves; I would point out the source from which the knowledge was to be obtained. Suppose them to come at the end of 12 months or of two years in order to be examined in the different subjects, with full authority to the examiner or examiners to stop them in case they had not obtained a requisite amount of knowledge, I certainly see no difficulty whatever in the case. The terror of the loss of their appointment acting upon them would be a sufficient stimulus to make the great proportion acquire the knowledge, although they were not living under the instruction of a particular teacher.

1093. If an opening were made by which the ascertained qualifications of young men should be itself the passport to India, would or not that security be a better qualification than the system where the young men are first elected?—Certainly; for this is at once a principle of selection. At the same time the deficiency which I have felt at Haileybury has not been that the best students have not paid as much attention and made as much progress as almost a principle of selection could have secured to their respective departments, law amongst the rest. I have been surprised often at their merit. Our misfortune has been that we have had no inducement to bring to bear on the inferior order of students. It is a notion which I early took up, and which I have once or twice suggested, that the only way to meet this difficulty is to give the professors a liberal power of distinguishing in minor cases of demerit. What is wanted is some form of secondary punishment. After all, the evil to be apprehended is, not that they would exercise the powers too hastily, but too slowly. My notion was, that a certain proportion of the students who were at the bottom of their term should not keep their civilian appointment, but that they should drop down as of course to some inferior situation in the service. This would give us a hold on the inferior portion of a term, over which at present we have no hold whatever. They drive as near as they can. Such a power would enable us to whip up the lagging portion of a term. Suppose that sort of power to be withheld us, the advantage of a general certificate over our actual system would tell, in case it were high enough, by securing the exclusion of that portion which we have been obliged to allow to pass. None would be sent out so bad as some which we send out at present. Unless, however, the law students are older, and have more time than at present, I do not expect the improvement will be so great in the qualifications of the most distinguished, as, before my experience, I should have assumed as certain. I conceive that no certificate could reasonably be put higher than the point which the best students at Haileybury have attained in the law department.

1094. Is there anything in the present system which makes it obligatory on the professors to send out young men who, in their opinion, are not qualified to go?—I should say, certainly there has been felt to be in the College a moral obligation of that

*William Empson,

that description. I have unfortunately, much to my suffering, acted upon it. When I came to the College it would have been very misplaced in me to act on crude notions of my own; I talked with the professors of long standing, to get, as it were, a map of the country. Their account to me was, "We have been for 20 years raising the standard in the College, both in respect of conduct and attainment. We have now got it to a point which, if not answering entirely to our wishes, is nevertheless, on comparing it with what it was in the beginning, highly satisfactory. You must not expect too much; you must consider the difficulties of the case, and recollect what is expected from the young men in other departments as well as your own. The system is one of qualified patronage. The unfitness which is to disqualify must not be tried by a severe scale. The College is not understood to have been founded for the purpose of exclusion but in extreme cases. In all our exercises of this authority, when a discussion has arisen between us and the parties concerned, the public has taken this view of it, and sided with the individual whose appointment was endangered. Your predecessor observed, that the College on these occasions had every thing against it except justice." Consequently, I adopted and maintained as a minimum, as near as I could, the common standard. The dilemma in which the College is placed is one of great hardship. If we exercise the power which we ought to exercise on the part of the public, a storm of indignation is let loose upon the College, such as no other place of education ever was exposed to, and which must have a mischievous effect. Out of doors every body takes up the cry. Our only support is in the individual directors who happen to know the merits of the case. In case we do not exercise the power, and young men imperfectly qualified go out, remonstrances come home from India, that the College does not answer its purpose. It would certainly limit the patronage considerably. But I have always thought that our standard was as a minimum much too low. I know of no remedy of the present system except that the professors should be entrusted with a very considerable discretion in raising it; without such an understanding, I certainly do not expect that any professor (myself for instance) can calculate upon very much improving his own department.

1095. Do you mean to say that the general opinion and feeling of persons connected with the present Indian system are such that the professors cannot effectually exercise that power of selection which by theory you possess?—I certainly say so. Their experience unfortunately convinces them of it.

1096. In what way?—By finding the extreme unpopularity, the extreme odium to which they were subject; the cry that was set up over London, and the apparently worse than indifference of the public; every body joining in the observation, it is extremely hard that young men should lose their appointments for indiscretion, for idleness of a certain description; very hard that parents should be put to the necessity of the expense of an additional year's education, and so forth. One of the practical advantages in the management of the discipline, for instance, of the College which arose from the creation of the London Board, has been, that it enabled us more freely to send away young men who were just keeping within the verge of a positive statute or the like. In my own department I have constantly let young men pass who I think ought not to have passed, because I understood that the average had been raised, and raised much above what it had been formerly

2 July 1832.

William Empson,

formerly, and that we had got it as high as the parties to the contract at the establishment of the College, both the Company and the public, either meant or would consent that it should stand. I therefore have all along felt that I had no business to put my department higher, and exact for the law class terms which my colleagues did not exact; I was to take my place with the rest. The public cannot complain that the College has deceived them, by affecting to be a higher security than it has known itself to be. When cases of misconduct were stated and brought before them, the College was almost overturned by the tumult and irritation which was raised (this was before my connection with it), because the professors had done their duty. There is a letter of Sir Thomas Munro's, printed in his works, in which he observes, that he agrees with his correspondent on the extreme hardship of young men losing their appointments for the idleness and errors of youth, since they may afterwards turn out very valuable public servants. I remember observing upon the letter that it was a greater hardship upon the young men and their preceptors, that parents and governors of presidencies should join in a moral destructive to all education and discipline whatever. I do not see how the managers of a place of education are to support it against the observations of a man of Sir Thomas Munro's qualifications. If we are to be of any use, it is as a check; if we do at last take issue with young men on a certain degree, either of stupidity or idleness or vice, and give them notice that that appointment must be the forfeit, and governors of presidencies interpose with the plea of hardship, the possibility of latent qualities and final reformation, no establishment can answer the objects of moral and intellectual instruction which such establishments, whether at Haileybury or elsewhere, are ordinarily expected to answer.

1097. In point of fact, are you able conscientiously to say, that the standard of qualification (I put this as a general question), are you able conscientiously to say, that the standard of qualification at Haileybury has been raised as high as, considering the difficulties with which you have stated the institution to have contended, was practicable?—It is my decided impression and understanding that this is the fact. In making these observations, I ought to add, that my connection with the College is somewhat looser than that of my colleagues, as being a non-resident professor. During the greater part of the year I only go down to give my lectures. It is my rule, therefore, in questions connected with the system, to a very considerable extent to put myself in the hands of persons of great experience and character, who have been in the institution from its foundation, and upon whose judgment and upon whose integrity I can most confidently rely.

1098. Should you not conceive, that the complete loss of an appointment might in some degree be obviated by the plan to which you refer, by letting it fall to something inferior, but not a complete loss in the service?—The loss might be partial instead of total. Many a young man might make a very good soldier who would make a very bad lawyer, a very bad judge.

1099. Do you know whether the Board of Examiners has been as successful in qualifying young men for different situations in India as Haileybury?—I should think decidedly not. From what I have heard upon that point incidentally, I believe that the Examiners of the Board would give a very decided opinion to the same effect. There is no law standard, none in political economy; and the standard in classics,

2 July 1832.

William Empson,
Esq.

classics, &c. for passing I have understood to be about the same as our standard for admission. We may have passed at Haileybury young men who, on the whole, are likely to make as indifferent civil servants as any who have been passed at the Board. But I cannot think it possible that the effect of successful education should so far go for nothing, that, after the usual allowance has been made for extraordinary exceptions, the Board has with its lower test, and the other circumstances of the case, sent out, on the average, young men as good as our average, or has had anything like proportion corresponding to our best.

1100. If an examination for legal qualification were established, and there were perfectly free admissions of candidates to contend under that examination for the appointment of a writer, do you think that any great improvement would take place in the qualification of those going out to India?—Of course that must depend upon the amount of legal knowledge required in the certificate, and the freedom with which the examiners are encouraged, or at least supported, in the exercise of it. Compared with the present result, I think (other things remaining the same) that it would probably act much more by raising the standard of the lower three-fifths, than of raising the standard of the two-fifths at the top. You would probably have no such bad men pass as pass at present; but you must not expect more, unless the age is altered, or unless the legal department is put on an entirely different footing from what it is at present, and disconnected from the certain amount of Oriental knowledge with which it is now bound up. As long as the Oriental knowledge is a condition to an appointment, and must be verified before the appointment is secure, persons who look to it must first take themselves out of the European market, and devote themselves at once to the East without reprieve; you would not find a great number of persons to do that as it were blindfold; there must be something more than a conjecture or probability of future appointment as an inducement.

1101. Do you mean to say that under the supposed system the best candidates would not be better than they are now unless they were older than they are now, but that the general qualifications would be much improved?—Certainly; the general qualifications might be expected to be much improved.

1102. Would it be possible to open the College at Haileybury so as to make it a general seminary of instruction?—That depends very much upon how far the education which is meant to be given for the Indian service is to be a special education, with reference to special objects. In an attempt to combine the two, the problem would be not to leave out of the preparation for the Indian service any thing which it ought to include of those things which can be taught to greater advantage in this country than in India, and yet preserve such a general system of education as a young man not going out to India would be likely to consider was better for general purposes than he could elsewhere acquire. I am afraid there would be a difficulty.

1103. Is there any special subject of instruction except the study of the Oriental languages?—No, none except the Oriental languages, and a sprinkling in my own department. The references to Oriental law take up less than a fourth of a term in the two senior classes, and little in the junior.

1104. But if it were a general seminary, and with more choice to the students to select departments for which they had a particular taste, or for which they were supposed

2 July 1832.

William Empson,

supposed by their friends to be particularly qualified, to the exclusion of other departments, would it not be possible to have a system of legal instruction, the greater part of which might be beneficial for persons not destined for India?—Certainly. My only fear would be this, that it would be in vain to expect that law, or the other branches of more common pursuits should be carried on to a sufficient extent and with sufficient rapidity. A deduction must be made for the Oriental departments. The Oriental professors calculate on two entire days out of the six; part of the other days are also given to Oriental learning; consequently the European professors have to draw up and wait as it were during that time; consequently students not following the Oriental department would rest on their oars those days, and it would be difficult to go on with them, and arrange for the Indian students to overtake them, or fall in.

1105. Would not that be a mere matter of arrangement?—There would be great difficulty in the arrangement. Besides, observe the age at which the students are required to come with whom the other young men would have to mix, and to whose capability, &c. of instruction, they must accommodate themselves. It is beyond their public school age; it is the age at which they are going to or would be at the University. We can expect few, unless those who came in order to give their whole time to law. Considering the great success of Mr. Amos, and the greater aptitude of his course for English practical purposes, few persons would come to Haileybury for law only.

1106. Do you conceive it essential to the education of civilians in this country that they should be taught the Oriental languages?—I can only answer from the conversation which I have had with Oriental professors and civilians: I should say, certainly not indispensable; at the same time it is desirable that they should have beforehand some grammar, and the elements of the Oriental languages, that they might not be detained so much longer at the Presidencies before they are fit to enter on the service.

1107. Is the Oriental language carried further at Haileybury than the point which you deem essential?—From the ability and zeal of the Oriental professors, I have no doubt that it is so. I am quite sure that they endeavour to make the most of their department.

1108. Do you think that the civilians should be older before they go out?—Certainly.

1109. Whereabouts would you fix the age?—I know of no reason why the judicial servants should go out younger than the medical servants of the Company. I have felt that one year additional was extremely important at that age. I have begged hard for it. It was considered, however, that a great deal had been conceded by averaging 16 as the minimum age, in point of law; and by throwing in generally one year more, in point of fact, the average age is 17. It is a great disadvantage, particularly in such a subject as law, to be obliged to lower the pace and keep down the quality of instruction under the point at which the kind of instruction which a lecture can give must be given most satisfactorily to all parties. Besides, the ordinary objections of the Haileybury system tell so much the more in proportion to the youth of the student.

1110. In what way do you conceive that an open system might best be made to secure the maximum of qualification, the greatest possible measure of qualification in a young man going out to India?—The qualifications you want are both moral and intellectual. Let an option (according to the vacancies) be given to the young men who have distinguished themselves at our public schools or universities, of those who have made the option, let a certain amount of knowledge in law, and, if you please, in political economy and the Oriental languages, be required, there can be no doubt but that, if the terms of the option are properly watched, a much higher degree of moral and intellectual education on the whole will be obtained than any system of patronage can secure.

Veneris, 6^o die Julii, 1832.

The Right Hon. ROBERT GRANT in the Chair.

Sir ALEXANDER JOHNSTON called in and examined.

6 July 1832.

Sir Alex. Johnston.

1111. How long were you in India, and what offices did you fill there?—I was sixteen years in office on Ceylon: during that time I held different situations of trust and responsibility under the Crown; for ten years I was Chief Justice, First Member of the High Court of Appeal, and President of His Majesty's Council.

1112. Were you ever on the continent of India; in what part, and for what time?—During the whole of the period I was in Ceylon I directed my attention very much to a consideration of the nature of the government, of the laws, and of the administration of justice in the peninsula of India; and with a view of becoming locally acquainted with the circumstances of the country and the character of the people, I made two journies by land from Cape Camorin to Madras and back again, the one in 1808 and the other in 1817.

1113. Had you any and what opportunities of personally observing or inquiring into the administration of justice in the peninsula of India?—I attended the proceedings of the different courts of justice, and I conversed upon the subject with several of the judges.

1114. Judges of the Company's courts?—Yes; and with the best informed of the natives of the country.

1115. It is understood that you were mainly instrumental in introducing into the administration of justice on Ceylon considerable alterations, especially as affecting the natives of that country?—As soon as I became Chief Justice, and First Member of His Majesty's Council, in 1806, I felt it to be my duty to state it officially as my opinion, that the surest way of retaining Ceylon and the rest of our Indian possessions was to admit the natives of the country to a share in the government of the country, and to allow them to administer justice to their countrymen. I also felt it to be my duty to state it officially as my opinion, that all laws by which they were to

6 July 1832.

Sir Alex. Johnston.

to be governed ought, before they were passed, to be discussed and assented to by assemblies or councils in which all the interests of the different classes of natives were adequately represented. With this view of the subject, I advised the government of Ceylon to adopt various measures, and at the request of the Governor and Council I came to England in 1809, for the purpose of inducing the then Colonial Secretary of State to authorize those measures to be carried into effect. The late Marquis of Londonderry, who was then Colonial Secretary of State, entered fully into my views, and determined that all the measures I had advised should be carried into effect. However, his Lordship, in consequence of his sudden resignation of office in 1809, was only able to carry into effect before his resignation such of the measures as were necessary to introduce trial by jury amongst the natives of the country, to take off the restrictions which prevailed against Europeans holding lands and settling on Ceylon, to emancipate the Catholics in the island from the disabilities under which they had laboured for 150 years, and to encourage the gradual abolition of domestic slavery throughout the country; these four measures had formed part of a general plan which I had previously proposed to the late Mr. Fox for the improvement of the condition of the people of India. In the year 1802, when I was about to leave England the first time for Ceylon, I had various conversations on the subject of India with that gentleman, and in consequence of the request that he made to me at that time, I sent home to him in 1806 a paper containing some observations which I had drawn up on the alterations which I thought advisable in the administration of justice and in the government of the East-India Company's possessions on the continent of India. This paper was given to him by a relative of his and mine in the year 1806, when he was at the head of the administration, and I received an intimation from him through the same relative, that he approved of all the measures which I had proposed. If the Committee wish, I will produce a copy of this paper. Twenty-six years' experience, and a constant attention to the affairs of India, convince me that the measures which I then suggested are the most efficient which can now be taken for securing permanently the British authority in India.

1116. Are there any and what accessible documents, showing the measures which in fact have been introduced into Ceylon by your means, and the results of them upon the interests of that island?—Yes, there is a paper which was drawn up by a friend of mine in 1826, which contains a very full statement of all the different circumstances connected with the introduction of trial by jury into Ceylon, and a copy of the letter which I wrote to Mr. Wynn in 1825, when he was President of the Board of Control, giving him an account of the reasons for which I had extended the right of sitting upon juries to the natives of that island, and of the effects which that measure had produced. It was upon this letter that Mr. Wynn, in 1826, introduced the Act for extending the right of sitting upon juries to the natives living within the local jurisdiction of the Supreme courts of Bombay, Madras, and Calcutta.

1117. Speaking both from the personal observation and inquiries which you have made respecting the administration of justice in the peninsula of India, and also from the attention you have subsequently bestowed upon the subject, have you any remarks or opinions to offer as to the judicial system there established, either with reference to its constitution or its practical effects?—The late Marquis of Londonderry having, after my last return from India, requested me to draw up for his use a statement of what I conceived might be an improvement in the system of administering justice in the peninsula of India, I gave him such a statement in 1822, and beg leave to refer to it. In it I confined my observations to the British territories under the presidency of Madras, having at that time been more acquainted with them than I was with those under the presidencies of Calcutta and Bombay. I, however, beg leave to add, that subsequent information leads me now to think that what I then proposed for the territories under the presidency of Madras is also, with certain local modifications, applicable to the territories under the presidencies of Bengal and Bombay.

6 July 1832.

Sir Alex. Johnston.

1118. Have you any suggestions or improvements to offer which are not contained in that paper?—The paper which I sent to the late Mr. Fox in 1806, that which I gave to the late Marquis of Londonderry in 1822, and that which was drawn up by a friend of mine in 1826, contain a general view of the several measures which I think necessary for the improvement of British India. As the Committee have requested me to give them in evidence, I beg leave to refer to them, and to add, that my original plan was to try all the measures advised by me in the first instance on Ceylon, and if they succeeded in that island, then to introduce them into the continent of India. The principal objects of these measures, in as far as they relate to the administration of justice, is to frame a special code of laws for British India; to abolish the distinction which now prevails between King's and Company's courts; to introduce one uniform system for the administration of justice throughout British India; and to establish a supreme court at each of the three presidencies in India, and a high court of appeal in England for the purpose, under the vigilant superintendence of both Houses of Parliament, of constantly securing the efficiency of every part of that system.

1119. Do you advise that the half-castes should have the privileges of British born Europeans?—Yes.

1120. Do you mean that they should be admissible to the places now held by the Company's covenanted servants?—Yes.

1121. How would that interfere with the regulations of the Company's service, by which writers are appointed in this country to go out to India for the purpose of occupying situations there?—I mean that half-castes should be deemed eligible to writerships in this country in the same way in which European born British subjects are now eligible.

1122. On the supposition that Europeans were more extensively admitted to reside in India, would it or would it not be desirable that situations which are now held by the Company's civil servants should be opened promiscuously to European or half-caste residents in India?—I certainly think it highly advisable that Europeans who are established in India, though not in the civil service, should, if they be properly qualified, be eligible to any of those situations.

1123. Will you explain more fully the plan which you have suggested for uniting in one system the King's and Company's courts in India, and subjecting them all to the superintendence of the three King's courts at the presidencies?—As my plan of

6 July 1832.

Sir Alex. Johnston.

of the subject is explained in the papers to which I have already alluded, I beg leave, by way of saving the time of the Committee, to refer to them.

1124. Have you considered the comparative merits of the present system of judicature in India, and that of which you recommend the substitution in the article of expense?—I have considered it generally; I think the system I propose will not be so expensive as the present system.

1125. Are you able to state why it would be cheaper?—Yes; because, independent of other circumstances, a great part of the system proposed by me for the administration of justice will be carried on by native judges, who require smaller salaries than European judges.

1126. Would you recommend any systematic provision for the purpose of qualifying those who are to fill judicial situations under your plan?—I should recommend that all Europeans who are destined for judicial situations in India should receive in this country, previous to their going to India, a regular education adapted to the judicial situations which they are to fill.

1127. If a test of qualification were rigidly enforced, would that answer the purpose?—I think it would, provided the persons who are to apply that test are men who themselves have had judicial experience in India.

1129. Might not some use be made of the institution at Haileybury for the purpose in view, even supposing it to be discontinued in other respects?—Certainly.

1130. Will you state what is your opinion as to the merits of the proposition recently made from Bengal for the establishment of legislative councils in India?—I think that the formation of such councils in British India is highly advisable. I, however, think that a certain number of the most distinguished natives of the country ought to be admitted as members. I am convinced that the admission into them of native members is the surest way of rendering those councils efficient, popular, and beneficial to the natives of the country.

1131. Have you considered in what way such natives should be selected or appointed for the purpose in view?—At first, considering the novelty of the institution, it may be necessary for Government to select the native members. Measures should, however, I think be immediately taken by Government for forming an enlightened body of constituents amongst the natives of each province, and for calling upon them in future to elect the native members of council from their own body. In the eastern province of Ceylon the experiment of having a native council was first tried in the year 1783, by the then Dutch government. The great advantages which had been derived by that province from having such a council led me, in 1806, not only to propose its revival in that province under the British Government, but also to recommend that similar councils of natives should be formed in every one of the British provinces on Ceylon. I conceive that the natives of Bengal, Madras, and Bombay are not only not less competent, but are, generally speaking, more competent for becoming members of such councils than the natives of Ceylon. The whole of India had been governed, for upwards of 2,000 years before the arrival amongst them of Europeans, by natives of the country, and had attained very great perfection in arts, literature, agriculture, manufacture, and commerce; it is therefore to be inferred that the natives are just as competent as Europeans can be to legislate for their own wants and their own country.

1132. Considering that the form of the British Government now established in India is in so great a degree despotic, do you conceive that the natives are yet ripe for so great a change as should introduce them to the highest places of Government?—The native population of British India consists, amongst others, of natives of high caste, high rank, great wealth, great talents, and great local influence, most of whom would, if a native instead of an European government prevailed in India, hold the highest offices in the state. I conceive that it is a great political object to attach such a class of natives to the British Government, and that the most certain way of doing so, is to declare them, even under the present system of government, to be eligible to some of the higher offices of state.

1133. How would their exercise of such authority comport with the maintenance of the British supremacy?—If they knew that the offices and the honours which they held depended upon the continuance of the British supremacy in India, they are more likely to support that supremacy with all their influence in the country, than if they felt, as they do at present, that they have no such offices and honours to lose by the overthrow of that supremacy.

1134. Would you then render natives eligible to the situations, or any of them, now held by the Company's covenanted servants?—I would render them eligible to all judicial, revenue, and civil offices. Even now, by a recent regulation, they are appointed to fill very high judicial situations.

1135. By the regulation to which you refer, the natives being eligible to judicial situations for the decision of suits of the value of 5,000 rupees, do you see any reason why they should be limited to that value?—None whatever.

1136. Would not, however, the general admissibility of natives to the situations of the Company's service wholly break up the system of patronage by which those situations are now filled?—If it should be thought necessary to keep up this system of patronage, the situations to which natives are declared to be eligible may be limited, both as to their amount and as to their nature.

1137. Are you of opinion that the judges at the presidencies should be members of the legislative councils?—The judges of the Supreme court in Ceylon are members of the King's Council on that island. The object in placing them in council is, that they may, from their knowledge of law, advise the Governor and Council upon all points of law connected with the different questions that come before the Council. In the same way the judges at Calcutta, Madras, and Bombay may be extremely useful as members of the councils at those presidencies. As the King's judges are independent of the local governments, they are likely to give those governments more independent advice upon subjects, in which the feelings of Government are concerned, than persons who are dependant upon those governments for their promotion.

1138. You have spoken of "numbers" of the natives being members of the legislative councils; what in your opinion should be the number of counsellors?

Such

6 July 1832.

Sir Alex. Johnston.

Such a number of them as may induce the natives of the country to believe, that the interests of all the different classes of natives are fairly and adequately represented in those councils.

1139. Would you have the majority of the Council natives?—That I think must depend upon the nature of the powers with which these legislative councils may be ultimately vested.

[The Witness was requested by the Committee to furnish the Committee with Copies of the Papers which he had tendered in the course of his examination.]

Jovis, 9^o die Julii, 1832.

The Right Hon. ROBERT GRANT in the Chair.

Sir ALEXANDER JOHNSTON called in and further examined.

1140. You have brought with you a Paper which you promised to the Committee last time?—Yes.

9 July 1832.

Sir Alex. Johnston.

1141. And which you stated that you had communicated in the year 1806 to Mr. Charles Fox?—Yes; (A.) is a copy of the Paper which I sent to Mr. Fox from Ceylon in 1806; (B.) a copy of that which contains a detailed statement of all the different circumstances connected with the introduction of trial by jury and the abolition of domestic slavery on Ceylon; (C.) a copy of that which I gave to the late Marquis of Londonderry in 1822, and (D.) a copy of that which I gave to Mr. Wynn, then President of the Board of Control, and to some of the other members of the Privy Council in 1826, upon the subject of the appellate jurisdiction of the King in Council, in cases of appeal from the Supreme and Sudder Adawlut courts in India.

1142. On your former examination, you suggested that a general code of laws should be framed for India, which should be adapted to the different religions that prevail in that community; have you at all considered what means should practically be taken for framing and adopting such a code?—I should propose that the plan explained by me in (A.) should be adopted for that purpose. I followed with success a similar plan (vide E.) while in Ceylon, for collecting materials for framing a Hindoo and Mahomedan code for the use of the Hindoo and Mahomedan natives of that island; and I am of opinion that such a code as I have proposed for the use of British India in (A.) may be completed in the time I have mentioned in that Paper.

See Paper (E.)

1143. That is three years?—Yes.

1144. Have you any suggestions to add to those contained in your Paper, respecting appeals to the King in Council from India?—I have only to add, that measures ought immediately to be adopted for relieving all the parties to the appeals, which have been so long pending before the Privy Council, from the great expense expense and inconvenience to which they have been subjected by that delay. In order that the Committee may know what measures it may be advisable for them to adopt, I shall beg leave to explain to them the nature of those which have already been taken upon the subject. In 1809, the late Marquis of Londonderry, then Secretary of State for the Colonies, when he appointed the Chief Justice, First Member of the High Court of Appeal, and President of His Majesty's Council on Ceylon, being fully aware of the defects of the constitution of the Privy Council, considered as a court of appeal from the courts in India, and knowing that the offices which I held would enable me to become thoroughly acquainted with the subject, expressed a wish that I would give it, while on Ceylon, the most mature consideration, and when I returned from that island, report my opinion to him as to the best mode of rendering the Privy Council an efficient and expeditious court of appeal for hearing cases in appeal from India. In order to enable myself to acquire all the necessary information, I, previous to my departure from England in 1811, with the assistance of the late Mr. Chalmers, then one of the clerks of the Council, examined the nature of all the proceedings which had taken place from the earliest period before the Privy Council, in cases of appeal, from all the British colonies, and made copies of the opinions which all the Crown lawyers and judges had at different periods given upon the question; and during my stay on Ceylon examined most attentively all the proceedings which took place in India in cases which were appealed from the three courts of sudder adawlut in that country, to the King in Council in England. In 1822, I, after my return from Ceylon, at the request of the late Marquis of Londonderry, gave his Lordship, as I have already mentioned, the Paper of which (C.) is a copy. As the Marquis died soon after, no steps were then taken for carrying into effect any of the measures which I had proposed in that Paper: one of them was the measure for calling in aid of the Privy Council, whilst sitting as a court of appeal in Indian cases, a certain number of the retired King's and Company's Indian judges. In 1825, on my attention being again directed to the subject, I found that in consequence of a variety of different circumstances, particularly of the ignorance of the natives of India as to the mode of prosecuting their appeals before the Privy Council, scarcely any appeals whatever from the courts of Sudder Adawlut, in which natives of India only were concerned, had been heard and decided by the Privy Council since the year 1799, and that nearly 50 cases, some of which were of great private and public importance, were in arrear, and had become a cause of great expense, great inconvenience and great dissatisfaction to all the natives of India who were in any way connected with them. In 1826, knowing, as I did, that it was the Marquis of Londonderry's intention, had he lived, to have advised His Majesty's Government to adopt the measure I had proposed relative to Indian appeals, I felt it to be my duty to call the attention of the Board of Control, and some of the members of the Privy Council, to the subject, and with that view drew up the Paper of which (D.) contains a copy, explaining to them the nature and extent of the appellate jurisdiction of the King in Council in cases connected with British India, and pointing out to them a mode by which the Privy Council itself might be rendered, without any additional expense to the public, a most efficient court of appeal for all Indian cases. In order to facilitate the proceedings of such a court, and to enable the

See Paper (D.)

Privy Council to decide without any further delay upon the cases which had been so long in arrear, I, in pursuance of the plan contained in the Paper (D.) suggested to the then President of the Board of Control the utility of employing Mr. Richard Clarke, a retired civil servant of the East-India Company, well acquainted with the proceedings of the Company's courts in India, as a registrar for Indian appeals in this country, an office which will afford the Privy Council the means of acquiring without delay a thorough knowledge of the nature of all the different cases which may be appealed from India, and of deciding upon each case, if the parties require it, without putting the parties to the expense and delay of being heard by counsel. Mr. Clarke having, in consequence of my suggestion, been employed by the Board of Control in communication with the Court of Directors, and having completed an analysis of the several cases of appeal now in arrear, the present President of the Board of Control, with the most laudable anxiety to relieve the natives of India from the grievance which they have so long suffered, and to prevent for the future all unnecessary delay in the hearing of Indian appeals in this country, in March last, requested Sir E. Hyde East, the late Sir James Mackintosh and myself, to assist him with our advice upon the subject. The Paper (F.) contains copies of the letter which Mr. Grant wrote to me upon the occasion, of my answer, of the joint opinion of Sir E. Hyde East, Sir James Mackintosh, and myself, of a letter which I subsequently wrote to Mr. Grant, and of a paper which I enclosed in that letter, explaining to him in detail all the different measures which I, after consulting with Mr. Clarke upon the subject, thought necessary to be adopted in India and in this country. These papers have, I understand, been forwarded by the President of the Board of Control to the Privy Council, and are now under their consideration.

See Paper (F.)

1145. It has been suggested to the Committee, that instead of allowing an appeal to the King in Council from India, there ought to be constituted in India a final court of appeal from all the different judicatures there established; what is your opinion of that suggestion, comparing it with the plan which you have recommended?—I think that the court of appeal, if established in England according to the plan I have proposed, will be a more competent, a more independent, a more popular, and a less expensive court of appeal than any which can be established in India. A more competent one, because it will be composed, which it could not if it were established in India, of the most efficient of the King's and Company's judges who have retired from the service, after having held for many years the highest King's and Company's judicial situations in India, and who must possess more judicial and local information than can be procured from any other persons relative to every part of India. A more independent one, because it will be composed, which it could not if it were established in India, of men who have retired from the service, and are independent in their circumstances, and who therefore can have nothing to fear or to hope either from the local government or from persons high in authority in India. A more popular one, because it will, from being connected with the Privy Council, and from being supported by an enlightened British public, be able, which it would not be if it were established in India, effectually to shield against every unjust and party attack those Indian judges who may feel it to be their duty, however detrimental to their local interest and to their comfort in society, to protect the natives of India against any description whatever of arbitrary exaction or oppression. A less expensive one, because it will be composed, which it could not be if it were established in India, of judges of talent and experience, who are to receive no pecuniary remuneration whatever as judges of the court of appeal. To avoid all unnecessary delay and all unnecessary expense, I should propose, if such a court be established in England, that a person thoroughly acquainted with the nature and proceedings of the King's and Company's courts in India be appointed registrar of the court in this country for Indian appeals. That all the appeals and all the papers connected with them be sent direct from the courts in India to this office. That it be the duty of this officer, as soon as he receives the papers in each case, to arrange them and make a report upon them to the court. That it be the duty of the court, after perusing the papers, to decide upon them without delay, hearing counsel or not in each case, as the parties interested in the case may require. If these rules be adopted, the result of every appeal to England may be known in India in ten or twelve months from the date at which the appeal papers were originally forwarded from India to England, and the only objection, that of delay, which is urged with any weight against the court of appeal being established in England, will be effectually answered, and all grounds removed for depriving eighty millions of His Majesty's subjects in India of the right of appealing to the King in Council in England, which every British colony in every quarter of the globe has already possessed, which they themselves have enjoyed for the last sixty years, and which is of peculiar importance to them in the present times, when in consequence of the great progress which they are making in knowledge, and of the enlightened views which they are beginning to entertain upon all questions of law and government, they are more in want than ever of the protection of an independent court in England, whose proceedings will always be subject to the observations of an active press and both Houses of Parliament.

9 July 1832.

Sir Alex. Johnston.

1146. Your answer seems to imply the continuance of the present system; in other respects how far would you modify your opinion, on the supposition that such a change was to take place as to introduce into India an extra number of European residents, to create a local public of greater influence and efficacy than now subsists in that country, and in other ways to supply both more materials for an appellate court and a more efficient control, by means of a public supervision over the proceedings of such court?—My opinion is certainly formed upon a consideration of the present state of society in India: many years must pass before it will be advisable for the natives of India to relinquish the right which they now enjoy of protecting themselves against injustice, by an appeal to the King in Council in England.

1147. Supposing a general code to be framed, what means would you recommend to secure a due application of it among the natives of India?—I should advise that it be translated into the most common languages of India, and that its nature be publicly explained to all the people of the country by public officers appointed for the purpose.

1148. Would it be necessary, in framing such a code, to consider very particularly the state of the different communities now in India; not being Europeans?—It will be necessary, in framing such a code, to consider most carefully the laws, customs, and

9 July 1832.

Sir Alex. Johnston.

See Paper (G.)

and feelings of the natives of all the different castes and of all the different religious persuasions which prevail in India.

1149. How far are the Catholics in India recognized by the local government, or in connection with it?—As I have been recently engaged, as Chairman of the Committee of Correspondence of the Royal Asiatic Society of Literature, in collecting information relative to the state of all the Catholics in India, I have in the course of my inquiries received a very interesting letter upon the subject from the Abbé Dubois, a priest of the Catholic religion, who has been 31 years in India, and is thoroughly acquainted with the state of the Catholics in India: I beg leave, in answer to this question, to refer to the Paper (G.), which is a copy of that letter.

1150. Would it be expedient that any control should be used by Government over the ecclesiastical appointments among the Catholics in our dominions?—I think that, considering the number of the Catholics who are now in the British territories in India, some arrangement ought immediately to be made upon the subject, by the British Government and the Pope. I think it my duty to add, that the conduct of all the native Catholics who were within my jurisdiction while I was Chief Justice and President of His Majesty's Council in Ceylon, was such as to convince me, that whenever the Catholic natives in India are properly superintended, as they are in Ceylon by their priests, they will always form a most loyal and a most respectable class of His Majesty's subjects in that country. The number of native Catholics in Ceylon is upwards of 100,000, and in the course of the whole of my judicial career in that island I observed that fewer offences were committed by natives of that religious persuasion, than by natives of any other religious persuasion whatever on the island.

1151. Have you any suggestion to offer as to the expediency of having a maritime code for the use of the natives or Europeans navigating the Indian seas?—I beg leave, in answer to this question, to refer to the Paper (H.), which is a copy of the plan which I some years ago gave to the Admiralty, for framing a maritime code for the use of all the different natives of Asia who navigate the Indian seas, and who trade with the several British possessions in India. This plan was formed by me, upon the information which I had previously collected while I was Judge of the Vice-Admiralty Court on Ceylon, relative to all the maritime laws and usages which had prevailed at different times amongst the Chinese, Hindoos, Persians, Arabians, Malays and Maldivan navigators and traders. I shall soon be able to obtain further information upon this subject, as I am engaged at present, as Chairman of the Committee of Correspondence of the Asiatic Society, in collecting from every part of Asia all the documents which can be procured relative to this description of law, for the use of Monsieur Pardessus, the celebrated French lawyer, who is about to publish a history of the maritime laws and usages of every quarter of the globe.

1152. Have you turned your thoughts to the subject of domestic slavery in India, and would you offer any suggestions on that subject?—I felt it to be my duty, from the time of my arrival on Ceylon, to adopt such a line of policy in my official capacity as would, I thought, inevitably in a short time put an end to the state of slavery in that island. Having, on my return from England in 1811, as Chief Justice and President of His Majesty's Council, brought out with me the Act of 1811, declaring declaring the trading in slaves to be felony, and a commission authorizing myself and certain other commissioners to try all offences against that Act with a grand and petty jury, I caused the Act to be publicly promulgated upon the island, and a case of importance having occurred in 1813, all the prisoners, one of them a man well known throughout Arabia and Asia, were tried and convicted before me, which called the attention of the people to the nature of the offence, and prevented the commission of any more offences of that description. In consequence of the proceedings at this trial, and the remarks which I made upon the subject of slavery at all the criminal sessions, to the persons who were on the roll of jurymen, much interest was excited, and all the proprietors of domestic slaves, to the number of 763 natives as well as Europeans, came to a resolution in July 1816, declaring that all children born of their slaves after the 12th of August 1810, should be considered as born free, and thereby put an end to the state of domestic slavery which had prevailed in Ceylon for 300 years. The Paper, of which (I.) is a copy, contains the details of what took place on the occasion. I have, since my return to England, been engaged, as Chairman of the Committee of Correspondence of the Royal Asiatic Society, with the assistance of Mr. Baber, the late Judge on the Malabar coast, in collecting such information relative to the state of slavery in the peninsula of India as may enable the British Government to adopt on the continent of India the same policy relative to the state of slavery, as that which has been successful in Ceylon. The Committee of Correspondence of the Asiatic Society have already collected some very useful information upon the subject, from various quarters, particularly from the papers published by order of the House of Commons in 1826, and they soon expect to obtain much more from different parts of India.

9 July 1832.

Alex. Johnston.

See Paper (I.)

1153. Have you any means of knowing the proportion of slaves to freemen in Ceylon?—At the time all the proprietors of slaves on the island of Ceylon came to the resolution which I have just mentioned, there were 763 proprietors, and, as I understood, between 9,000 and 10,000 slaves: the population of the then British territories on the island was about 600,000 people.

1154. Can you state whether any and what steps were taken in Ceylon during your residence there, for facilitating the holding of lands by Europeans?—Restrictions similar to those which prevail in the East-India Company's possessions on the continent of India, were in force in the King's possessions in Ceylon up to 1810, against Europeans holding lands in perpetuity on the island. Believing that the best way of improving the island, and securing the affections of the natives, would be for His Majesty's Government to encourage, by all means in their power, the settlement of Europeans in every part of the country, and the introduction of European capital, European industry, and European arts and sciences, amongst the people, I advised the late Lord Londonderry, as soon as I arrived in England in 1809, to repeal all these restrictions, and to authorize the local government to grant lands, under the most favourable conditions, to any British Europeans who might be willing to settle upon the island. The restrictions were accordingly repealed in 1810. It was the intention of Lord Londonderry, on my advice, had he remained in office, to have followed up this measure by giving the island of Ceylon such a free constitution of government as would have suited the habits and feelings of British settlers. This intention, however, was, in consequence of his resignation, not

Sir Alex. Johnston.

See Paper (K.)

not carried into effect, and few or no Europeans have hitherto availed themselves of the offer of the government of Ceylon to give them grants of land. The Paper (K.) is the copy of a Paper which contains an account of all the circumstances connected with this subject.

1155. Have you considered how far facilities may be afforded in India to the possession of land by Europeans, beyond those now afforded, and generally the settlement of Europeans in the interior of the country?—From all I have heard and read upon the subject, I think that the British Government ought to encourage British Europeans to settle in India, for the purpose of improving the country and increasing the influence and the authority of the government amongst all classes of the people.

1156. If the number of lower Europeans in the interior were much increased, then, supposing them admissible to offices and privileges which are not open to the native Indians, is there no danger that a jealousy would be created which might lead to injurious effects?—The Europeans who will be anxious to settle in the interior of India will, I should think, in general be persons of some capital, or some particular skill and talent; such persons, independent of any other motive, will endeavour, with a view to their own interest, to conduct themselves well, and to make themselves popular with the natives of the country. I do not conceive that their admission into such offices as their acquirements may qualify them to fill, can excite any peculiar degree of jealousy amongst the natives, or be productive of any injurious effects in the country.

1157. The supposition of the last question was, that such a number of Europeans residing in the country as to create a sort of caste or class distinct from the natives; supposing that class to be admissible to places under government, or to have privileges of any kind which are not open to the natives in common with them; the question then is, whether a sort of jealousy would not be produced in the mind of the natives at their own exclusion from the same advantages?—I conceive that all the natives of the country ought to be eligible to all judicial, revenue, and civil situations whatever, and that if this were the case, no jealousy would be excited in the minds of the natives by the circumstance of an European, though not in the Company's service, being deemed eligible, if his conduct be good, to similar situations.

1158. Even supposing an intelligent European was not possessed of capital himself, would his superior skill not be useful in turning to account the capital of the natives?—I have no doubt whatever that it would often be of great advantage to the natives to have an European of skill and talent, though without capital, settle among them, because it is probable that by his skill and talent he would enable such of them as are engaged in agriculture or in manufactures to make many improvements, which may be of the greatest advantage to them in the pursuits in which they are engaged.

1159. In opening appointments to natives and Europeans generally, would you admit at the same time half-castes?—I should certainly advise the half-castes to be declared to be eligible to the same situations as Europeans and natives. While I was on Ceylon, I considered every half-caste, if properly qualified, to be eligible to every magisterial and other office under the supreme court. Some of the most respectable respectable and the most efficient magistrates and officers of the supreme court were half-castes. My opinion as to the policy which ought to be pursued with respect to the half-castes in British India, is given at length in my answer to a letter which I received in May 1830 from Mr. Ricketts, the then agent of the half-castes in this country, of which (L.) is a copy.

Sir Alex. Johnston.

See Paper (L.)

1160. Are you acquainted with the Jury Bill which has just passed the House of Commons?—Yes, I am; I think that it will be attended with the best effects in India. The conciliatory manner in which the present President of the Board of Control has received the petition of the natives of India, and the readiness with which he has brought in a Bill to relieve them from some of the grievances of which they complain, will show them the attention which the present Board pays to their feelings, the respect which it entertains for their character, and the confidence with which it intrusts the lives, the liberty, and the property of their fellow-countrymen to their discretion and to their protection.

1161. Has experience shown that the introduction of jury trials in Ceylon has succeeded?—Yes; my own experience, that of my successors in office, and that of the King's Commissioner, Mr. Cameron, prove that it has completely succeeded. For an account of the result of my experience, I beg leave to refer to the Paper (B.); for that of my successors, to the following extract from Sir Harding Gifford's Charge; and for that of Mr. Cameron, to the following extract from that gentleman's Report :

See Paper (B.)

EXTRACT from the Charge delivered by Sir Harding Gifford, the Chief Justice and First Member of H. M. Council in Ceylon in 1820, on his taking possession of his office, after the resignation of Sir Alexander Johnston.

" BUT there is one feature of the history of offences for the last two years so remarkable, that it cannot without injustice to the people be overlooked.

" It has been my duty to examine the criminal calendars of that period, with a view to inform myself of the state of offences generally; and I have been both surprised and gratified to observe, that during this interval, an interval marked by violence and convulsion in the interior, that there does not appear to have occurred in our maritime provinces a single instance of even a charge of turbulence, sedition, or treason, or of any offence bearing the slightest tinge of a political character. It is too well recorded, and is within the personal knowledge of some of yourselves, that during the Kandian War of 1803, the revolt of some of our maritime districts added in no slight degree to the difficulties of that melancholy period. To what are we to attribute so remarkable a change? Certainly not to the superior character of the government. In mildness and benevolence, Mr. North's administration was assuredly not exceeded by that of any of his successors. But, Gentlemen, let us ascribe it to the true causes; to the long and steady experience of the blessings of a government administered on British principles, and, above all, to the introduction of trial by jury.

" To this happy system, now (I may venture to say) deeply cherished in the affections of the people, and revered as much as any of their own oldest and dearest institutions, I do confidently ascribe this pleasing alteration; and it may be boldly asserted, that while it continues to be administered with firmness and integrity, the British Government will hold an interest in the hearts of its Cingalese subjects which the Portuguese and Dutch possessors of this island were never able to establish.

" It may appear, and with justice, that I indulge some degree of personal gratification in referring to this subject, when I tell you, that in a report made to the government of Ceylon in June 1817, by the Advocate Fiscal of that period, there is contained an observation which shows shows that this feeling is not new, and we know how fully it has been justified by subsequent events. In that document it is said, that 'amongst the inhabitants of the maritime provinces, I know the jury system to be already (this was in the seventh year of its operation) a favourite. The wisdom of the Supreme Court has most happily adapted it even to their prejudices, so that they had actually begun to feel attachment to it on that account, even before they were aware of all its advantages.'

"And the report adds, 'Armies may waste away from climate or disease, and seasons and circumstances may baffle the utmost exercise of human foresight; but, fixed on the attachment of the people to our jurisprudence, I look upon the security of the British interests in (the maritime provinces of) Ceylon to be impregnable.'

"And can we, Gentlemen, with these pleasing results before us, omit to render our tribute of recollection to the learned Judges by whose zeal and ability this system has been put so happily into operation?

"Of one of them, holding, as he still does, that station in society so well merited by his talents and services, it would be difficult in me, without indelicacy, to offer more than that tribute which it would be injustice to withhold. To his perfect knowledge of the native habits and character, and his extensive acquaintance with their institutes, it was owing that the jury system was thus so skilfully adapted even to their prejudices, and so deeply rooted in their affections as to have had the consequence in which we now rejoice."*

EXTRACT from a Report of C. H. Cameron, Esq., one of His Majesty's Commissioners of Inquiry, to Lord Viscount Goderich, dated 31 January 1832.

"THE trial by jury, as your Lordship is aware, was introduced at the suggestion of Sir Alexander Johnston, by the charter of 1810. I attended nearly all the trials by jury which took place while I was in the island, and the impression on my mind is, that an institution in the nature of a jury is the best school in which the minds of the natives can be disciplined for the discharge of public duties. The juror performs his functions under the eye of an European judge, and of the European and Indian public, and in circumstances which almost exclude the possibility of bribery or intimidation. In such a situation he has very little motive to do wrong, and he yet feels and learns to appreciate the consciousness of rectitude. The importance which he justly attaches to the office renders it agreeable to him, and he not only pays great attention to the proceedings, but for the most part takes an active part in them."

1162. Are you aware of any reason why the system of jury trial which succeeded in Ceylon should not be equally successful in India?—I have for the last 20 years had frequent communications with persons from Madras, Bombay, and Bengal upon this question. I have also read several documents containing the opinions of those who are competent to form a correct judgment upon the subject. These communications and documents leave no doubt in my mind of the applicability of jury trial to every part of the British possessions in India, provided it be so modified as to suit it to the customs and feelings of the people amongst whom it is introduced.

* "The Honourable Sir Alexander Johnston, the late Chief Justice and First Member of His Majesty's Council, at whose recommendation, and according to whose plan, the trial by jury was introduced into Ceylon, in November 1811, and the right of sitting upon juries, instead of being confined, as it is in other parts of India, to Europeans, was extended, under some modifications, to every native upon the island, the effect of which are to make the natives themselves participate in the administration of justice amongst their own countrymen."

duced. The documents to which I allude, in as far as they relate to Madras, are the minutes of the late Sir Thomas Munro, and his letter to Lord Hastings upon the subject; the minutes of Mr. Graham, his successor in the government of Madras; the printed regulation passed by the Governor and Council of Madras for carrying into effect, after Sir Thomas Munro's death, his plan for the introduction of jury trials throughout the presidency of Madras; the evidence before the House of Lords of Mr. Baber, one of the most able and enlightened of the East-India Company's judges. The documents to which I allude, in as far as they relate to Bombay, are the addresses presented by the principal natives of Bombay, upon the death of the late Chief Justice of that settlement, Sir Edward West, to the two surviving Judges of the Supreme Court at Bombay, and the petition signed by 4,000 of the most distinguished inhabitants of all castes and religious denominations at Bombay, and sent by them to the House of Commons about two years ago, in which, though I am not personally acquainted with any one of them, they do me the honour of alluding to me in the most flattering terms, merely from the circumstance of their conceiving me to be the first person who had ever extended by a charter of justice the right of sitting upon juries to the natives of India. The documents to which, independent of many others, I specifically allude, in as far as they relate to Bengal, are different parts of the evidence of Rajah Ramohun Roy before the Committee of the House of Commons. In corroboration of these documents, I can speak from personal knowledge as to the decided opinion which the late Sir Thomas Munro entertained in favour of the introduction of trial by jury amongst the natives of India, for I met him in 1817 on the peninsula of India, at his particular request, six years after I had introduced jury trial into Ceylon, for the express purpose of explaining to him the manner in which I had adapted that mode of trial to the customs and religious feelings of all the natives of all the different castes and religious persuasions on that island, and the conclusions which I drew as to the moral and political effect which it was calculated to produce upon their character and conduct.

1163. Can you conceive anything better adapted than the system of jury trial, to give the people of India that confidence in themselves, and prepare them for those free political institutions, which it must be the ultimate object of this country gradually to introduce?—I cannot conceive any system to be better adapted for that purpose in India than the system of trial by jury, provided it be so modified as to suit it to the feelings of the natives and the circumstances of the country: it gives the natives an additional value for education, for character, for public opinion; it makes them acquainted with the nature of their laws, and with the moral and political effect of their institutions; it exercises their minds in sifting and weighing the evidence of persons of every caste and of every religious persuasion; it accustoms them to decide, and declare their opinion in public; it gives them a confidence in their own talents, and in their own judgment; it makes them feel themselves to be the guardians of the lives, the liberties, and the property of their countrymen; it convinces them that they are treated with confidence and respect by their rulers; it excites in them an additional interest in every thing which relates to the administration of justice, and to the government of the country; it affords them a public opportunity of displaying their knowledge, their patriotism, and their talents talents upon subjects of the greatest interest, and must ultimately lead them, as it did all the jurymen on Ceylon who were proprietors of slaves, and who declared free all children born of their slaves after the 12th of August 1816, to show themselves worthy of the rights and privileges of freemen, by showing themselves ready, if necessary, to sacrifice their private interests to their respect for the cause of humanity and freedom.

1164. Does not the simple circumstance, that the facts in a criminal case must be brought before twelve individuals in the same situation as the prisoner, form a very great security for individual liberty, and so prepare the country in which it is introduced, for the exercise of political freedom also?—Yes; it places the liberty of every native of British India under the safeguard of his countrymen; it creates a native public to protect him against oppression; it encourages him to form and declare his opinions without fear or disguise, and it thus renders him capable of exercising political freedom with credit to himself and with benefit to his country.

PAPERS presented by Sir Alexander Johnston, and referred to in his Evidence of 6 and 9 July 1832.

THE Paper sent by Sir Alexander Johnston, in 1806, from the Island of Ceylon to the late Mr. Charles Fox, then at the head of the Administration of Affairs in England, in consequence of Mr. Fox having requested Sir Alexander, when he left England in 1802, to send him, after his arrival on the Island, his opinion upon the different subjects to which the Paper alludes.

THE best policy which Great Britain can pursue in order to retain her possessions in India, is to raise the moral and political character of the natives, to give them a share in every department of the state, to introduce amongst them the arts, sciences, and literature of Europe, and to secure to them, by a legislative act, a free constitution of government, adapted to the situation of the country and the manners of the people. With this view I propose,—

1st. That a general system of education founded upon this policy be established for the benefit of the natives in every part of the British territories in India.

2d. That the natives be declared eligible to all judicial, revenue, and civil offices whatever.

3d. That all laws by which the natives are to be governed be, before they are adopted as law, publicly discussed and sanctioned by local assemblies or councils, in which the interests of every class of natives shall be adequately represented by natives of their own class.

4th. That the local governors be deprived of the power which they are now authorized to exercise of their own discretion of sending Europeans without trial out of the British territories in India, and that no European shall for the future be sent out of any of those territories on any charge, unless under a regular sentence of banishment passed against him by a regular court of justice, after a fair and public trial, and a conviction by a jury of some offence to which the law has attached the punishment of banishment, from the British territories in India.

5th. That

9 July 1832.

Sir Alex. Johnston.

5th. That a law be passed affording the same protection against illegal imprisonment to every native and every European in the British territories in India as the Act called the Habeas Corpus Act affords to every person in England.

6th. That measures be immediately taken by all the governments in India for the gradual abolition of domestic and every other description of slavery which now prevails in different parts of British India.

7th. That it be declared illegal for any British government in India, or for any individual acting by its authority, to force a native, under any pretence whatsoever, to labour without pay or against his will.

8th. That it be declared illegal for any British Government in India to exclude any native from holding any office under the British Government in India on account of the nature of any religious creed which he may profess.

9th. That measures be immediately taken, by giving to each description of them an efficient and respectable ecclesiastical establishment, by enforcing a system of strict moral discipline amongst them, and by removing all motives of religious jealousy between them, for making every description of Christian, whether Catholic, Syrian, or Protestant, within the British territories in India, respectable in the eyes of the natives of the country.

10th. That measures be immediately taken for putting all the descendants of Europeans in British India, known at present by the very invidious denomination of half-castes, upon the same footing as European born British subjects in every respect as to education, laws, and eligibility to office, and thereby rendering every person descended from a European, whatever his complexion may be, provided his character be good, respectable in the eyes of the natives of the country.

11th. That all the restrictions which at present prevail against Europeans settling in any of the British territories in India be taken off; and that all British Europeans be not only permitted, but encouraged by the British Government in India to acquire and hold lands in perpetuity, and to settle in every part of the country, as the surest way of introducing the arts, the science, and the improvements of Europe amongst the natives, of increasing their wealth, their comforts, and their prosperity, of extending the influence of Europeans in the country, and of strengthening the British authority in India.

12th. That the press be considered and used as a powerful engine for forming an enlightened public amongst the natives of the country, for enabling the British Government to know the real sentiments of the people respecting all its measures, for preventing all public functionaries from abusing their power, and for protecting the Legislature in any improvements it may introduce against the prejudices of the ignorant and the intrigues of the disaffected.

13th. That the distinction which now prevails in British India between King's and Company's courts of justice be abolished, and that there be but one system of administering justice throughout British India.

14th. That there be a special code of law for British India, drawn up in the simplest language, divested of all technicalities, and adapted to the feelings and to the manners of the different descriptions of people, European as well as natives, who compose the population of the country.

15th. That this code consist of four parts,

1st. To contain the civil law applicable to Europeans.

2d. The civil law applicable to the native Hindoos.

3d. The civil law applicable to the native Mahomedans.

4th. The criminal law, applicable both to Europeans and natives, Hindoos as well as Mahomedans.

16th. That civil and criminal justice be administered to all the inhabitants of British India according to this code, by judges and assessors educated for the purpose, and by juries adapted, as to number, qualification, and every other circumstance, to the feelings of the people, and the local situation of the country.

17th. That

9 July 1832.

Sir Alex. Johnston.

17th. That there be both European and native judges in British India: that all Europeans who intend to be judges in India, be educated for the specific purpose in England, and be publicly examined, and declared to be properly qualified for the situation by the High Court of Appeal in England, before they can be eligible to the situation of a European judge in British India; and that all natives of India be educated for the specific purpose in India, and be examined and declared to be properly qualified for the situation by the Supreme Court of the Presidency to which they may belong, before they can be eligible to the situation of a native judge in British India.

18th. That the criminal and civil jurisdiction of the European and native judges respectively, be carefully regulated with a view to the situation of the country, and the feelings of each class of the inhabitants.

19th. That in civil cases (subject always to the above consideration) the European judges do exercise only an appellate jurisdiction, and the native judges only an original jurisdiction.

20th. That every criminal prisoner, European and native, shall have a right to be tried by a jury for any criminal offence, not declared by law to be a minor offence, with which he may be charged.

21st. That to save the inhabitants of the country from all unnecessary inconvenience, every jurisdiction exercised by any judge, whether criminal or civil, original or appellate, be exercised in such a manner, either by circuits or otherwise, as may put the parties who are concerned, prisoners, suitors, and witnesses, to as little expense and delay as possible, by bringing justice as near as possible to their respective homes.

22d. That to save suitors in civil cases from all unnecessary delay and expense, the number and the nature of the pleadings, copies of papers, &c. allowed by the courts, be as few as possible consistent with the attainment of justice; the parties to a suit have the option of proceeding in court either by themselves, or by an attorney or counsel, as they may think proper; and all tables of fees be framed by the local assemblies or councils, with a strict consideration of the circumstances of the people who are likely to have suits before the court.

23d. That to prevent the officers of the several courts from having an interest, or from appearing to have an interest, in the delay of justice, or in the accumulation of papers in a suit, all officers of court be paid by fixed salaries, be strictly prohibited from receiving any fees, or deriving any emolument whatever from the use of monies deposited in court; and be compelled to pay all fees of court, and all monies deposited in court, without the smallest delay, into the public treasury.

24th. That in order to prepare the natives of the country to exercise the duties of judges and jurymen, they be employed as frequently as possible as assessors to the European and native judges in the administration of civil and criminal justice.

25th. That in order to increase the respect of the natives for the office of a jurymen, a list be made out of all the persons in each province who are qualified, according to a plan which shall be hereafter arranged, to act as jurymen; that this list be constantly exhibited in the most public places in the province; that it be revised every half year; that at each revision, the names of all those who have been improperly omitted be added to the lists, and the names of all those whose conduct since they were put upon the list has disqualified them from the honour of being upon the list, be erased from it; the question in either case, as to whether the name of a person ought to be added or erased from the list, to be tried and decided by a jury.

26th. That in order to form an enlightened and independent public amongst the natives, a native reporter be attached to each court, who shall report all the cases which occur before the court; and that a native newspaper be established in each province for the purpose of publishing all the circumstances which are connected with these cases, and encouraging the natives of the country to discuss without fear the nature of the decisions which have been given by the judges of the respective courts.

9 July 1832.

Sir Alex. Johnston.

27th. That all the different maritime customs and maritime usages of all the different natives of various parts of Asia who navigate the Indian seas, and who trade with the different ports belonging to the British territories in India, be carefully collected, and a maritime code prepared from them for the use of all the native mariners who trade with the British territories in India; and that courts, the proceedings of which shall be regulated by this code, be established at all the most convenient ports in British India.

28th. That there be a Supreme Court of Justice at each of the three Presidencies in British India; that it be a court of appellate jurisdiction only; that it shall, in communication with the local Government, have the complete superintendence and control over, and be held responsible for the efficiency of whatever system may be established for the administration of justice and for the regulation of police throughout the Presidency to which it belongs.

29th. That there be a high Court of Appeal in England, consisting of the President of the King's Council, an English lawyer of eminence, some of the King's retired Indian judges, and some of the Company's retired judicial servants; that it shall exercise an appellate jurisdiction over the three courts at the three Presidencies in India in cases of a large amount or of a particular description; shall try and decide all complaints brought against Indian judges for acts done by them while acting as judges in India; shall exercise, in communication with the Government in England, the complete superintendence and control over the whole system for the administration of justice and regulation of police throughout every part of British India; shall make a detailed report to both Houses of Parliament, at fixed periods, of its own proceedings, and of the state of the administration of justice and the police throughout British India, explaining in such report, for the information of Parliament, the nature of any defects which it may have observed, and of any improvements which it may have to propose; and, finally, that it be considered by Parliament as publicly responsible for the efficiency of the whole system of administering justice in India.

30th. That a commission consisting of three persons be sent by Parliament to India, for the purpose of collecting, with the assistance of the most intelligent Europeans and natives in the country, materials for framing such a code as has already been mentioned for the use of the inhabitants of British India; and that the duration of this commission be limited to three years, from the date of the arrival of the commissioners in India.

31st. That in order to enable the commissioners to obtain the official assistance of the natives of the country in framing that part of the code which relates to the civil law of the Hindoos and Mahomedans, the following plan be pursued:

That all the native inhabitants qualified to sit on juries in each province do elect a certain number of the best informed and most respectable natives of the province into a committee, for the purpose of submitting to the commissioners a report, which shall contain an authentic account (arranged under such heads as shall be sent to them by the commissioners, of all the laws and usages which prevail in their province, together with their opinion as to the moral and political effect of each of those laws and usages, and as to the alterations which they may think necessary to be made in any of them.

That the commissioners do send to the committee so elected in each province a paper containing the different heads under which they require information respecting the laws and usages of the province; intimating to the committee at the same time, that it is their intention, as soon as the committee make their report, to exhibit it publicly, with the names of the persons who have framed it, to all the people of the province, for their consideration and observation.

That such report, when drawn up by the committee in the style and language best understood in the province, be publicly exhibited for six months, in the most frequented part of every village in the province, with a public invitation to the people of the village to offer such objections or observations upon the report as may occur to them, for the information of the commissioners, and with a public notice that should no such objections or observations observations be offered by them within six months, the commissioners will conclude that the report has received their approbation.

6 July 1832.

Sir Alex. Johnston.

That the commissioners do, at the expiration of the above period of six months, collect the several reports, and do arrange from them, and from such other information as they may possess, a code of Mahomedan and Hindoo law for the approbation of Parliament.

That translations of the above code be made in every language and idiom which is spoken in any province of the British territories, and that a certain number of printed copies of it, be deposited for the use of the inhabitants, in the most frequented parts of each village in every province.

That the translation which is prepared for the use of any particular province be made under the immediate superintendence of the committee which framed the report upon the laws and usages of that province, and be read and explained by the respective servants of Government in each village of the province to every person belonging to the village.

Note.

The information upon which such a code is framed must be authentic, because it is derived from the best informed men in the country, chosen, for their local knowledge, by their own countrymen, under circumstances when they have no apparent motive to deceive the commissioners; but, on the contrary, every motive arising from a desire to establish a character for talents, integrity, knowledge, and patriotism amongst their countrymen, to afford the commissioners the most accurate information upon a subject which is intimately connected with the happiness, the prosperity, and the religious and moral institutions of themselves and their countrymen.

Such a code must be easily understood by the commonest person in the country, because it is drawn up in the language of the country, under the superintendence of those who are the best acquainted with that language, and because it has been explained to, and received the approval of, every person in the country.

It must be generally useful to the people of the country, because, from its being intelligible, and from its having been explained to them, it makes them know what the law is upon any particular subject, without the expense or inconvenience of consulting a lawyer; and because, in case of a law-suit, it enables the courts of justice to decide upon questions of law without difficulty or delay. It must be popular amongst the people of the country, because it is framed upon local information received by the commissioners from persons pointed out to the commissioners for the purpose by the people of the country, and confirmed as to its accuracy by the people themselves, to whom it was submitted for their consideration before it was received by the commissioners. It will relieve the people of the country from the expense, the delay, the inconvenience, and the oppression to which they are at present subject, from the incessant and endless law-suits which arise out of the obscurity and uncertainty of the laws by which their lives, their liberty, and their property are regulated, and enable each person really to do what, by a fiction of law he is in all countries presumed to do, understand the laws by which he is governed. It must always have weight amongst the people of the country, because it will always have the support of the persons of the greatest influence in the country, upon whose information it was framed, and of all the people of the country who publicly sanctioned that information. It will be instructive to the local government of the country, and to the Parliament of Great Britain, because it will afford them an authentic account of all the local laws, usages, and institutions which prevail in the country, of all the good or bad moral and political effects which they produce, and of the different alterations and improvements, which, in the opinion of the best informed men of the country, may be introduced by Government into the habits and manners of the people.

IV.
JUDICIAL.

9 July 1832.

Sir Alex. Johnston.

(B.)

CONTAINS an Account of the measures adopted by Sir Alexander Johnston for the introduction of Trial by Jury, and the Abolition of Domestic Slavery on the Island of Ceylon, of the moral and political effects produced by those measures upon the natives of that Island, and of the circumstances connected with the Act of 1826, which, in consequence of the success of the similar measure on Ceylon, extended the right of sitting upon Juries to all natives of India living within the local limits of the Supreme Courts of Bombay, Madras, and Calcutta.

AS our Indian administration, especially the judicial branch of it, is becoming, from peculiar circumstances, a subject of increasing interest, a statement, from authentic sources, of the important experiments which have been successfully made at Ceylon, accompanied by an exposition of the principles upon which they were adopted, and the advantages which they have already been attended with, cannot but be gratifying.

Sir Alexander Johnston, the then Chief Justice and first member of His Majesty's Council in Ceylon, after a very long residence on that island, a very attentive examination of all the different religious and moral codes of the various descriptions of people who inhabit Asia, a constant intercourse for many years, as well literary as official, with natives of all the different castes and religious persuasions which prevail in India, and a most careful consideration of every thing which related to the subject, recorded it as his official opinion, in 1808, that the most certain and the most safe method of improving the British Government in India, of raising the intellectual and moral character of the natives, of giving them a real interest in the British Government, and of insuring the continuance of their attachment to the British empire, was to render the system of administering justice amongst them really independent, efficient, and popular; and that the wisest method of gradually attaining these objects, was by granting to the natives of the country themselves, under the superintendence of European judges, a direct and a considerable share in the administration of that system.

As a very general opinion prevailed, both in India and in England, that the natives of India, from their division into castes, from their want of intellect, from their want of education, and from their want of veracity and integrity, were incapable of exercising any political or any judicial authority, either with credit to themselves or with advantage to their countrymen, it was, for many reasons, deemed prudent by Sir Alexander Johnston that the experiment of allowing natives of India to exercise the same rights and privileges in the administration of justice in India as are exercised by Englishmen in Great Britain should be first tried on the island of Ceylon.

The intellectual and moral character of the inhabitants of Asia is formed, in a great degree, if not altogether, by the different systems of religion, and the different codes of morals which prevail amongst them, and which may be ranked (viewing them not according to the purity and truth of their doctrines, but according to the number of persons who are subject to their influence,) in the following order:—

- 1st. The Hindoo religion and code.
- 2d. The Buddhist religion and code.
- 3d. The Mahomedan religion and code. And
- 4th. The Christian religion and its system of morals.

Considering them, therefore, with a view to the peculiarities of their intellectual and moral character, the inhabitants of Asia may be divided into the four following great divisions, each division practically exhibiting, in the character and conduct of the different classes of people who belong to it, the intellectual and moral effect of their respective religious and moral codes:

- 1st. Those who profess the pure Hindoo religion, or some of its modifications.
- 2d. Those

9 July 1832.

Sir Alex. Johnston.

- 2d. Those who profess the Buddhist religion, or some of its modifications.
 3d. Those who profess the Mahomedan religion, or some of its modifications. And
 4th. Those who profess the Christian religion, whether according to the doctrines of the reformed or of the Catholic Church.

The population of Ceylon consists of a considerable number of inhabitants of each of the four following descriptions of people; viz. 1st, of about half a million who derive their descent from the inhabitants of the opposite peninsula of India, who profess the same modification of the Hindoo religion, who speak the same language, have the same customs and laws, and the same division of castes, as those inhabitants; 2dly, of about half a million other inhabitants who claim their descent from the people of Ava and Siam, who have the same religious and moral code, and who profess the same modification and the same customs of the Buddho religion as the inhabitants of those two countries; 3dly, between 50,000 and 60,000 Mahomedan inhabitants, who are partly of Arab and partly of Mogul descent, who have the same customs and laws, and who profess the same modifications of the Mahomedan religion as prevail amongst the different classes of Mahomedans who inhabit the peninsula of India; and, 4thly, of a very considerable number of what in the rest of India are called half-castes, descended partly from Portuguese, partly from Dutch, and partly from English Europeans, some of them professing the Catholic, some the reformed religion, and all of them resembling in character and disposition the half-castes in the rest of India. As it was therefore obvious that the population of Ceylon was composed of a great number of each of the four great divisions of people of which the population of the rest of India was composed, Sir Alexander Johnston conceived that, should the experiment of extending the rights and privileges of Englishmen, in as far as they relate to the administration of justice, to all the different descriptions of half-castes and other natives on the island of Ceylon, be attended with success, it might therefore be acted upon with great moral and political advantage in legislating for the different descriptions of half-castes and other natives on the continent of India.

From the year 1802, the date of the first royal charter of justice, to the year 1811, justice had been administered in the courts on that island according to what is called, in Holland, the Dutch-Roman law, both in civil and in criminal cases, without a jury of any description whatever, by two European judges, who were judges both of law and fact, as well in civil as in criminal cases. In 1809, it was determined by His Majesty's Ministers, on the suggestion of Sir Alexander Johnston, that the two European judges of the Supreme Court on Ceylon should for the future, in criminal cases, be judges only of law, and that juries, composed of the natives of the island themselves, should be judges of the fact in all cases in which native prisoners were concerned; and, in November 1811, a new charter of justice under the Great Seal of England was published on Ceylon, by which, amongst other things, it was in substance enacted, that every native of the island who was tried for a criminal offence before the Supreme Court should be tried by a jury of his own countrymen, and that the right of sitting upon juries in all such cases should be extended, subject to certain qualifications, to every half-caste, and to every other native of the island, whatever his caste or religious persuasion.

This experiment of extending the rights and privileges of Englishmen having, after 16 years' experience, been found to be productive of the greatest security to Government, and of the greatest benefit to the people of the country, it has become a subject of serious consideration both in India and in England whether the same rights and the same privileges as, since the year 1811, have been exercised with the most beneficial effects by the natives of the island of Ceylon, may not also be exercised with the same good effect by all the natives of the East India Company's dominions in India; and Sir Alexander Johnston, at the request of the President of the Board of Control, wrote to him, in the year 1825, the letter, of which the following is a copy, explaining to him the reasons which originally induced Sir Alexander to propose the introduction of trial by jury amongst the natives of Ceylon, the mode in which his plan was carried into effect, and the consequences with which its adoption has been attended.

9 July 1832.

Sir Alex. Johnston.

" Dear Sir,

" 26th May 1825.

" I HAVE the pleasure, at your request, to give you an account of the plan I adopted while Chief Justice and first member of his Majesty's Council on Ceylon, for introducing trial by jury into that island, and for extending the right of sitting upon juries to every half-caste native, as well as to every other native of the country, to whatever caste or religious persuasion he might belong. I shall explain to you the reasons which induced me to propose this plan, the mode in which it was carried into effect, and the consequences with which its adoption has been attended. The complaints against the former system for administering justice on Ceylon were, that it was dilatory, expensive, and unpopular. The defects of that system arose from the little value which the natives of the country attached to a character for veracity, from the total want of interest which they manifested for a system, in the administration of which they themselves had no share, from the difficulty which European judges, who were not only judges of law, but also judges of fact, experienced in ascertaining the degree of credit which they ought to give to native testimony, and finally from the delay in the proceedings of the court, which were productive of great inconvenience to the witnesses who attended the sessions, and great expense to the government which defrayed their costs. The obvious way of remedying these evils in the system of administering justice was, first, to give the natives a direct interest in that system, by imparting to them a considerable share in its administration; secondly, to give them a proper value for a character for veracity, by making such a character the condition upon which they were to look for respect from their countrymen, and that from which they were to hope for promotion in the service of their government; thirdly, to make the natives themselves, who, from their knowledge of their countrymen, can decide at once upon the degree of credit which ought to be given to native testimony, judges of fact, and thereby shorten the duration of trials, relieve witnesses from a protracted attendance on the courts, and materially diminish the expense of the government. The introduction of trial by jury into Ceylon, and the extension of the right of sitting upon juries to every native of the island, under certain modifications, seemed to me the most advisable method of attaining these objects. Having consulted the chief priests of the Budhoo religion, in as far as the Cingalese in the southern part of the island, and the Brahmins of Remissuram, Madura, and Jafna, in as far as the Hindoos of the northern part of the island were concerned, I submitted my plan for the introduction of trial by jury into Ceylon to the Governor and Council of that island. Sir T. Maitland, the then Governor of Ceylon, and the other members of the Council, thinking the object of my plan an object of great importance to the prosperity of the island, and fearing lest objections might be urged against it in England, from the novelty of the measure, (no such rights as those which I proposed to grant to the natives of Ceylon ever having been granted to any native of India), sent me officially, as first member of Council, to England, with full authority to urge, in the strongest manner, the adoption of the measure, under such modifications as his Majesty's Ministers might, on my representations, deem expedient. After the question had been maturely considered in England, a charter passed the Great Seal, extending the right of sitting upon juries, in criminal cases, to every native of Ceylon, in the manner in which I had proposed, and on my return to Ceylon with this charter in November 1811, its provisions were immediately carried into effect by me.

" In order to enable you to form some idea of the manner in which the jury trial is introduced amongst the natives and half-castes of Ceylon, I shall explain to you; 1st, what qualifies a native of Ceylon to be a jurymen; 2dly, how the jurymen are summoned at each session; 3dly, how they are chosen at each trial; and, 4thly, how they receive the evidence and deliver their verdict. Every native of Ceylon, provided he be a freeman, has attained the age of 21, and is a permanent resident in the island, is qualified to sit on juries. The fiscal, or sheriff of the province, as soon as a criminal session is fixed for his province, summons a considerable number of jurymen of each caste, taking particular care that no jurymen is summoned out of his turn, or so as to interfere with any agricultural or manufacturing pursuits in which he may be occupied, or with any religious ceremony at which his caste may require his attendance. On the first day of the session the names of all the jurymen who are summoned are called over, and the jurymen, as well as all the magistrates and police officers, attend in court, and hear the charge delivered by the judge. The prisoners are then arraigned; every prisoner has a right to be tried by thirteen jurymen of his own caste, unless some reason why the prisoner should not be tried by jurymen of his own caste can be urged to the satisfaction of the court by the Advocate Fiscal, who on Ceylon holds an office very nearly similar to that held in Scotland by the Lord Advocate, or unless the prisoner himself, from believing people of his own caste to be prejudiced against him, should apply to be tried either by thirteen jurymen of another caste, or by a jury composed of half-castes, or Europeans. As soon as it is decided of what caste the jury is to be composed, the registrar of the court puts into an urn, which stands in a conspicuous part of the court, a very considerable number of the names of jurymen of that caste out of which the jury is to be formed; he continues to draw the names out of the urn (the prisoner having a right to object to five peremptorily, and to any number, for cause), until he has drawn the names of thirteen jurymen who have not been objected to: these thirteen jurymen are then sworn, according to the form of their respective religions, to decide upon the case according to the evidence, and without partiality. The Advocate Fiscal then opens the case for the prosecution (through an interpreter if necessary) to the judge, and proceeds to call all the witnesses for the prosecution, whose evidence is taken down (through an interpreter if necessary), in the hearing of the jury, by the judge; the jury having a right to examine, and the prisoner to cross-examine any of the above witnesses. When the case for the prosecution is closed, the prisoner states what he has to urge in his defence, and calls his witnesses, the jury having a right to examine, and the prosecutor to cross-examine them, their evidence being taken down by the judge: the prosecutor is seldom or never, except in very particular cases, allowed to reply or call any witnesses in reply. The case for the prosecution and for the prisoner being closed, the judge (through an interpreter when necessary) recapitulates the evidence to the jury from his notes, adding such observations from himself as may occur to him on the occasion; the jury, after deliberating upon the case, either in the jury box, or, if they wish to retire, in a room close to the court, deliver their verdict through their foreman in open court, that verdict being the opinion of the majority of them; the most scrupulous care being taken that the jury never separate, nor communicate with any person whatever, from the moment they are sworn, till their verdict, having been delivered as aforesaid, has been publicly recorded by the registrar. The number of native jurymen of every caste on Ceylon is so great, and a knowledge before-hand what persons are to compose a jury in any particular case is so uncertain, that it is almost impossible for any person, whatever may be his influence in the country, either to bias or to corrupt a jury. The number of jurymen that are returned by the fiscal or sheriff to serve at each session, the impartial manner in which the names of the jurymen are drawn, the right which the prisoner and prosecutor may exercise of objecting to each jurymen as his name is drawn, the strictness which is observed by the court in preventing all communication between the jurymen when they are once sworn, and every other person, till they have delivered their verdict, give great weight to their decision. The native jurymen being now judges of fact, and the European judges only judges of law, one European judge only is now necessary, where formerly, when they were judges both of law and fact, two, or sometimes three were necessary. The native jurymen, from knowing the different degrees of weight which may safely be given to the testimony of their countrymen, decide upon questions of fact with so much more promptitude than Europeans could do, that since the introduction of trial by jury, no trials last above a day, and no session above a week or ten days at furthest; whereas before the introduction of trial by jury, a single trial used sometimes to last six weeks or two months, and a single session not unfrequently for three months. All the natives who attend the courts as jurymen obtain so much information during their attendance, relative to the modes of proceeding and the rules of evidence, that since the establishment of jury trial Government have been enabled to find amongst the half-castes and native jurymen some of the most efficient and respectable native magistrates in the country, who, under the control of the Supreme Court, at little or no expense to Government, administer justice in inferior offences to the native inhabitants. The introduction of the trial by native juries, at the same time that it has increased the efficiency and despatch of the courts, and has relieved both prisoners and witnesses from the hardships which they incurred from the protracted delay of the criminal sessions, has, independent of the savings it enabled the Ceylon government to make immediately on its introduction, since afforded that government an opportunity of carrying into effect, in the judicial department of the island, a plan for a permanent saving of 10,000 £. a year, as appears by my Report, quoted in page 8 of the printed collection of papers herewith sent. No man whose character for honesty or veracity is impeached can be enrolled on the list of jurymen; the circumstance of a man's name being upon the jury roll is a proof of his being a man of unexceptionable character, and is that to which he appeals in case his character be attacked in a court of justice, or in case he solicits his government for promotion in their service. As the rolls of jurymen are revised by the Supreme Court at every session, they operate as a most powerful engine in making the people of the country more attentive than they used to be in their adherence to truth: the right of sitting upon juries has given the natives of Ceylon a value for character, which they never felt before, and has raised in a very remarkable manner the standard of their moral feelings. All the natives of Ceylon who are enrolled as jurymen conceive themselves to be as much a part, as the European judges themselves are of the government of their country, and therefore feel, since they have possessed the right of sitting upon juries, an interest which they never felt before in upholding the British Government of Ceylon. The beneficial consequence of this feeling is strongly exemplified in the difference between the conduct which the native inhabitants of the British settlements on Ceylon observed in the Kandian war of 1803, and that which they observed in the Kandian war of 1816. In the war between the British and Kandian Government in 1803, which was before the introduction of trial by jury, the native inhabitants of the British settlements were, for the most part, in a state of rebellion; in the war between the same governments in 1816, which was five years after the introduction of trial by jury, the inhabitants of the British settlements, so far from showing the smallest symptom of dissatisfaction, took, during the very heat of the war, the opportunity of my return to England, to express their gratitude through me to the British Government for the valuable right of sitting upon juries, which had been conferred upon them by his present Majesty, as appears by the addresses contained from page 16 to page 50*, in the printed papers herewith sent. The charge delivered by my successor, the present Chief Justice of the island, in 1820, contains the strongest additional testimony which could be afforded of the beneficial effects which were experienced by the British Government from the introduction of trial by jury amongst the natives of the island. (See that charge in pages 289 and 290 of vol. X. of the Asiatic Journal.) As every native jurymen, whatever his caste or religion may be, or in whatever part of the country he may reside, appears before the Supreme Court once at least every two years, and as the judge who presides delivers a charge at the opening of each session to all the jurymen who are in attendance on the court, a useful opportunity is afforded to the natives of the country, by the introduction of trial by jury, not only of participating themselves in the administration of justice, but also of hearing any observations which the judges, in delivering their charge, may think proper to make to them with respect to any subject which is connected either with the administration of justice, or with the state of society or morals in any part of the country. The difference between the conduct which was observed by all the proprietors of slaves on Ceylon

Sir Alex. Johnston.

Ceylon in 1806, which was before the introduction of trial by jury, and that which was observed by them in 1816, which was five years after the introduction of trial by jury, is a strong proof of the change which may be brought about in public opinion, by the judges availing themselves of the opportunity which their charging the jury on the first day of session affords them, of circulating amongst the natives of the country such opinions as may promote the welfare of any particular class of society. As the right of every proprietor of slaves to continue to hold slaves on Ceylon was guaranteed to him by the capitulation under which the Dutch possessions had been surrendered to the British arms in 1795, the British Government of Ceylon conceived that, however desirable the measure might be, they had not a right to abolish slavery on Ceylon by any legislative act. A proposition was however made on the part of Government by me to the proprietors of slaves in 1806, before trial by jury was introduced, urging them to adopt some plan of their own accord for the gradual abolition of slavery; this proposition they at that time unanimously rejected. The right of sitting upon juries was granted to the inhabitants of Ceylon in 1811. From that period I availed myself of the opportunities which were afforded to me, when I delivered my charge at the commencement of each session to the jurymen, most of whom were considerable proprietors of slaves, of informing them of what was doing in England upon the subject of the abolition of slavery, and of pointing out to them the difficulties which they themselves must frequently experience, in executing with impartiality their duties as jurymen, in all cases in which slaves were concerned; a change of opinion upon the subject of slavery was gradually perceptible amongst them, and in the year 1816, the proprietors of slaves of all castes and religious persuasions in Ceylon sent me their unanimous resolutions, to be publicly recorded in court, declaring free all children born of their slaves after the 12th of August 1816, which in the course of a very few years must put an end to the state of slavery which had subsisted on Ceylon for more than three centuries.”*

Sir Alexander Johnston was fully aware, when he first introduced trial by jury into Ceylon, that the degree of confidence which the people of the country might be expected to repose in that institution would be proportionate to the conviction which they entertained, that they themselves would be always consulted as to the character and qualifications of those persons whose names were to be enrolled in the list of men qualified to act as jurors, and that neither the local government nor the Supreme Court would ever attempt to exert any undue influence, either in the original formation of that list, or in the subsequent selection from it, of such jurors as might from time to time be required to serve at any criminal session which might be held by the Supreme Court in any part of the island. The great object, therefore, which Sir Alexander Johnston had in view in all the regulations which he made upon this subject, was not only to render it extremely difficult, but to convince the people of the country themselves that it was extremely difficult, if not impossible, either for the local government or the court to exert any undue influence as to the jurors, without their attempt to do so becoming directly a matter of public notoriety and public animadversion.

It appeared to Sir A. Johnston that the surest method of attaining this object was to limit, as far as he could by public regulations, the power of the court and that of its officers; and to place them in every point which was in any way connected with the jury under the constant inspection and control of the people of the country. He accordingly, after much consultation with some of the most enlightened natives of the island, published a regulation, declaring that every man on the island, whatever might be his caste or religious persuasion, had a positive right to act as a jurymen, provided he was a man of unexceptionable character, a free man, a permanent resident on the island, and had attained the age

age of twenty-one. Also declaring that the people of the country themselves should be the judges whether a man had or had not those qualifications which by this regulation gave him that positive right. Sir A. Johnston at the same time published another regulation, directing the fiscal or sheriff of each province on the island publicly to make and return to the Supreme Court a correct list of all persons in his province who were qualified as required by the former regulation to act as jurymen. To prevent the possibility of abuse on the part of the fiscal of any province, the following mode of proceeding was observed by the court: As soon as the fiscal of a province had made out and returned to the court a list of all the persons in his province who were duly qualified to serve as jurymen, this list was, by order of the court, published and circulated through every part of the province, for the specific purpose of enabling every inhabitant of the province to make such remarks on it as might occur to him, and to prefer, when necessary, an immediate and public complaint to the court against the fiscal, if it should appear that the fiscal either had omitted out of the list the name of any person whose name he ought to have inserted in it, or had inserted in the list the name of any person whose name he ought to have omitted. After the list had undergone this public scrutiny, it was publicly ordered by the court to be considered by the fiscal as the list of all persons who were duly qualified to act as jurors in his province, and that out of which he was bound to return by rotation all persons who were required to serve as jurors at the criminal sessions held by the Supreme Court in his province. Independent of these precautions against any abuse on the part of the fiscal, every person in a province in which the court was about to hold a criminal session had public notice given him, long before the session was held, that the list in question was always liable to be publicly revised by the court at the commencement of the session, upon any complaint which might be publicly made to the court by an inhabitant of the province, either against the fiscal for any impropriety of conduct in making out the list, or against any individual on the list for any impropriety of conduct in getting his name inserted in that list. Although, therefore, the Supreme Court and its officers, the fiscals, are allowed, for convenience sake, to be the instruments through which the list of persons on the island qualified to act as jurymen is obtained, it is hardly possible, considering the manner in which all their proceedings in this point are watched and controlled by the people of the country, that either the court itself or its officers can exert any undue influence in the selection of jurors without such conduct being immediately known, and becoming a subject of public and general animadversion.

One of the most important of the effects which the introduction of trial by jury produced on Ceylon was to place the European judges and the native jurymen in constant communication in court upon various subjects connected with the administration of justice, and thereby remove from the minds of all classes of the natives the suspicion and jealousy with which they had previously viewed all inquiries made by Europeans into the state of their religion, of their usages, their morals, and their education. As an illustration of this, we insert the following copy of the answer given by Sir A. Johnston to the address presented to him on his departure from Ceylon in 1818, by the chiefs and all the subordinate priests of Buddhho, on behalf of themselves and of all the natives of Ceylon professing the Buddhho religion. This address was one of the addresses to which Sir Alexander alludes in his letter to Mr. Wynn.

“ I feel highly gratified by the respect and esteem which you have shown for me, in coming, notwithstanding the very advanced period of your lives, from so great a distance as you have done, to take leave of me and my family, and to present to me, in your own name, and in that of all the priests of your order, and all the Buddhists within your jurisdiction, an address that cannot be otherwise than gratifying to my feelings.

“ The number of the priests of Buddhho, and the influence which they exercise over the minds of their followers, from being the ministers of their religion and instructors of their youth, have, for many years, made their religion, their books, their laws, and their institutions, a subject of my serious inquiry. In arranging the code of laws which, in obedience to to His Majesty's commands, I have compiled for the use of the native inhabitants of Ceylon, it became my duty to compare such of the codes as are the most approved in Europe and Asia, with such of the usages and customs as are the best authenticated on this island; and to adopt such parts only of those codes as are clearly applicable to the state of the country, and as may, therefore, be expected to attain the ends of justice, without militating against the habits and prejudices of the people.

" In performing this duty, I have had frequent communications with you and with the other learned men of your order, and it is with pleasure I take the present opportunity to return to you and them my public thanks for the alacrity with which you have at all times afforded me the information required, and for the unlimited freedom with which you have permitted me to consult the books in your temples, to which I have had occasion to refer; the translations into English which you have enabled me to procure of the three most celebrated histories of your country and your religion, the Mahawanscie, Ragawalle, and the Rajaratnakarre, and the numerous extracts which you have made for me from all your other Sanscrit, Pallee, and Cingalese books, together with the different works I have since obtained from the Brahmins of Jaffna, and those of the southern peninsula of India, form a most valuable collection of materials for any person who may have the desire and the leisure to write a general history of your country, and to explain at length the origin and peculiarities of the several castes, customs, and usages which prevail amongst you, and which are so intimately connected with your prosperity and comfort, as to render an accurate knowledge of them not only desirable as a matter of literary curiosity, but absolutely necessary as a matter of duty to every one who may be intrusted with the administration of justice among you, or with the superintendence of the government of your country.

" The rules which the intended code contains are so short and so clear, that the inhabitants will have little or no difficulty either in understanding or applying them. I have, as you know, spared neither pains nor expense for the last sixteen years of my life, in acquiring the most intimate knowledge of the wants and interests of every class of people in Ceylon; it was solely with a view of ascertaining, in a way more satisfactory than I otherwise could have done, the degree of caution and impartiality with which the natives of the island, if admitted to the right of sitting upon juries, would discharge the duties of jurymen, in cases in which their own countrymen are concerned, that I advised the Colonial Government in 1806 to refer a certain description of cases for trial to that committee of priests at Madura, of which you were the principal members. The very judicious manner in which that committee investigated those cases, and the soundness of the principles on which the members of it relied in framing their decisions, satisfied me not only as to the policy but as to the perfect safety of intrusting the natives of Ceylon with the right of sitting upon juries. After this experiment had been tried with success, but not before, I felt myself authorized to proceed to England, and to propose to His Majesty's Government the unlimited introduction of trial by jury into Ceylon, and the formation of a simple code of laws for the use of its inhabitants. The care and attention with which all the worshippers of Buddho, as well as all the natives of other religious persuasions have discharged the duties of jurymen, show that they not only understand the nature of that mode of trial, but also that they are fully competent to enjoy the privileges which it gives them, with credit to themselves and with advantage to their countrymen. The experience which you have had for seven years of the practical effects of that establishment, and the information you have derived from the Supreme Court, as well as from the book upon trial by jury, which I have caused to be translated into Cingalese and Tamul, have naturally impressed you with the highest respect for that simple and much admired mode of trial. My observations, aided by that of some persons who are the best qualified to form an opinion upon the subject, have suggested to my mind several improvements in the present system of administering justice amongst the natives of Ceylon. Should His Majesty's Government, while I am in England, be pleased to command me to submit to them my opinion upon the subject, I shall be happy to point out for their consideration such alterations as I am aware, from my communications with you, are desired by the inhabitants and will be highly beneficial to the interest of the island.

"The ultimate effect which any system of laws is calculated to produce in a country depends, in a great degree, upon the state of society, and upon the system of religion and morals which prevail in that country. As it has always been my wish to see the same effect produced in this country as is produced invariably in England by an independent and well administered system of justice, it has been my endeavour always to approximate, as much as circumstances would permit, the state of society and the systems of religion and morals which prevail in Ceylon to those which prevail in England. With a view to the state of society in Ceylon, I have, since 1806, left no means untried to encourage the proprietors of domestic slaves to adopt such a resolution as they, at my suggestion, unanimously adopted in July 1816; and it is a subject of sincere congratulation to all the friends of humanity in Ceylon, whether they profess the faith of Buddho, or that of Mahomet or Brahma, that the unanimity with which that resolution was passed was so great as to leave no doubt of its being the sense of the people on this island, that the system of domestic slavery is equally destructive to the morals of the slave, as it is to those of the master and his children. With a view to the different systems of religion and morals in Ceylon, I, twelve years ago, after much consultation upon the subject with some of the most enlightened of the Buddhists, caused the summary of the evidences of Christianity, which was drawn up by one of the ablest of our divines, the late Bishop of London, to be translated into Cingalese, in order that you yourself might have a fair opportunity of comparing the evidence upon which we form our belief in Christianity with that upon which you form your belief in Buddhism. The conversation which many of you have frequently had with me upon those points, as well as upon the beneficial effects which may finally be expected from the general extension of Christianity, both upon the present and the rising generation of the people, have afforded me an ample opportunity of becoming acquainted with the liberal sentiments which you entertain, when properly treated, upon all questions of religion; and I reflect with satisfaction on the ready assistance which I received from many of the most rigid of the worshippers of Buddho in the translation to which I have alluded. The zeal with which the two priests of Dodanduwa have insisted upon accompanying me to England, under circumstances which to most men would have been discouraging, is at once a mark of the confidence which your body repose in me, and of the spirit of inquiry and of the desire of information which has arisen amongst them. These young men will, no doubt, from the knowledge which they possess of your literature and religion, and the variety of their other acquisitions, be of considerable use to me in translating into Cingalese the code which I am about to submit to His Majesty's Government in England, and will have the best opportunity that could have occurred to them of becoming acquainted with the real effect which the principles of our religion unquestionably have had in enlightening the understanding, and improving the morals of the inhabitants of that most celebrated country.

"I have the honour to be, &c.

"Alexander Johnston."

COPY of a MEMORANDUM drawn up by Sir Alexander Johnston for the late Marquis of Londonderry, of some alterations which he thought advisable in the System for administering Justice in India. The plan, in as far as it related to the Supreme Courts to be tried in the first instance, in the Territories under the Madras Government.

THE Supreme Court at Madras to consist of six judges, to have a criminal jurisdiction over all the territories and persons, natives as well as Europeans, under the Madras government.

The

9 July 1832.

Sir Alex. Johnston.

The judges to make frequent criminal circuits throughout those territories, having native grand and petty juries for the trial of native offenders at each place where they hold their criminal sessions.

The Sudder Adawlut (the Supreme Civil Court) at Madras to consist of the judges of the Supreme Court, and a certain number, as at present, of the Company's senior civil servants.

A person, either from the Scotch, the English, or the Irish bar, to be attached as legal adviser to each of the four provincial courts under the Madras government.

An Act to be passed, specifying what part of the English law shall apply to the British and other Europeans in India.

That a Hindoo code, for the use of all the Hindoos under the Madras government, be forthwith drawn up in communication with the best informed Hindoos in each of the provinces under the Madras government.

That a Mahomedan code, for the use of all the Mahomedans under the Madras government, be drawn up in communication with the best informed Mahomedans, in each of the provinces under that government.

That a regulation be framed, specifying the nature of the different Acts, which are to be deemed criminal offences, and the nature of the punishment which is to be attached to each of those acts.

That the Hindoo and Mahomedan code, and this last-mentioned regulation, be translated into all the different languages which prevail throughout all the British territories under the Madras government, and that they be published throughout those territories.

That all the respectable natives of the country be admitted to act as frequently as possible as grand and petty jurymen, as judges, and as magistrates, under the superintendence and control of the Supreme and Company's courts.

That the proceedings in the Company's courts be carried on in the most usual language of the people of the country in which they are established; that writing be dispensed with as much as possible in those proceedings; and that all suits be decided as near as possible to the homes of the parties and witnesses who are concerned in them.

That a code be made of all the different maritime customs and laws, of all the different classes of natives of India who trade with any part of the coasts of the Company's territories in India, and that it be translated into all the different languages which are in general use amongst those people, and that it be made as public as possible amongst them.

That native as well as European judges be appointed at the most convenient ports, to decide, with the least possible delay and expense, all such maritime cases as may be brought before them.

That a right of appeal be allowed from all the superior courts in India to the court in England for hearing India appeals in all cases of a certain amount, and a certain description.

That the court in England for hearing India appeals be composed of the judges who retire upon pensions from the Supreme Courts in India, Ceylon, the Isle of France, and the Cape of Good Hope, and of some of the Company's retired civil servants, who have been judges of the Courts of Sudder Adawluts in India; and that it be perfectly understood, that the judges are to receive no other remuneration than their pensions for belonging to this court.

That the President and one other of the members of His Majesty's Privy Council, being a lawyer of professional eminence and high rank, be appointed by His Majesty to preside in this court.

That a certain number of the judges of this court be in regular attendance for the purpose of trying all such cases of appeal as may come before them.

That they deliver into both Houses of Parliament, at the commencement of each session, a statement of the number of cases which have come before them, the number which they have decided, and the number, if any, that are in arrear.

That

9 July 1832.

Sir Alex. Johnston.

That they also deliver into both Houses of Parliament, once every year, a report of the state of the system for administering justice in India, specifying what defects they have observed in that system, and what improvements they propose.

That the judges of all the different Supreme Courts in India be appointed as the judges in England are appointed; not during pleasure, but during good conduct, and that they be removable from their offices only by addresses from both Houses of Parliament to the King.

THIS Paper was drawn up by Sir Alexander Johnston, at the request of the present Master of the Rolls, who agreed with Sir Alexander in thinking it would be an improvement in the present system of Indian judicature, even were no further alteration introduced, to unite the Chief Justices of the Supreme Courts in British India with the Judges of the Sudder Adawluts. As this Paper is founded upon a shorter one, which was delivered to Lord Londonderry in 1822, it is added to the foregoing Paper, for the purpose of showing the utility of uniting the King's and Company's Judges in India in the manner proposed in the third clause of that Paper.

THE measure of making the Chief Justice of the respective King's Supreme Courts at Bombay, Madras, and Calcutta, members of the respective Company's Sudder and Nizamut Adawlut Courts, at each of these Presidencies, will be attended with very great advantages—

- 1st. To the King's judges of the Supreme Courts.
- 2d. To the Company's judges of the Sudder and Nizamut Adawlut Courts.
- 3d. To the native inhabitants of the country.
- 4th. To the East-India Company's government at Bombay, Madras, and Calcutta.
- 5th. To the King in Council, as a court of appeal from the Courts of Sudder and Nizamut Adawlut at those Presidencies.

- 1st. To the King's judges of the Supreme Courts, for the following reasons :

It will afford them the most efficient means of obtaining authentic information upon all local questions ; make them thoroughly acquainted with the religious and moral feelings of the natives of the country ; with their prejudices ; with all the peculiarity of castes which prevail amongst them ; with the manners and customs of the different inhabitants, to whatever caste or religious persuasion they may belong ; with the various revenue and police regulations of the local government ; with all the modifications of the Hindoo law, as it prevails in civil cases, and those of the Mahomedan law, as it prevails both in civil and in criminal cases, throughout the whole of the territories which are under the respective Presidencies, and thereby enable them to exercise the different judicial powers with which the King's Supreme Courts are invested at Bombay, Madras, and Calcutta ; in such a manner as to attain the real and substantial ends of justice, without militating against the feelings and prejudices of the people.

- 2d. To the Company's judges of the Sudder and Nizamut Adawlut Courts, for the following reasons :

It will afford those judges who have not had a legal education, by personal and habitual communication upon the subject with the King's judges, the most efficient means of becoming thoroughly acquainted with the general and fundamental principles of law, and with the high feelings of judicial independence which so peculiarly characterises the British judges ; and will thereby give them additional confidence in their own judgments, and a higher opinion of their own independence, as judges ; and inspire the natives of the country with implicit confidence in the wisdom and impartiality of their decisions.

3d. To

9 July 1832.

Sir Alex. Johnston.

3d. To the native inhabitants of the country, for the following reasons:—

It will not only make them acquire, but make them believe that they have acquired, an additional security for their lives, their liberty, their property, their religion, and their ancient customs; to such of them as live within the local jurisdiction of the respective King's courts, by making them believe that the judges of those courts possess not only what they now allow them to possess,—well-informed judicial understandings, and a high sense of judicial independence, but also that which they at present do not conceive them to possess,—a thorough knowledge of the native manners, local customs, native laws, religion, and caste. To such of them as live without the jurisdiction of the King's, and are solely under that of the Company's courts, by making them believe that by appeal at least to the Sudder and Nizamut Adawlut's, of which the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court is a member, they will receive the same protection from the judges of those courts as they would do from the judges of the Supreme Courts, an advantage of immense importance, when it is recollected that every native of the country, not residing within the local jurisdiction of one of the Supreme Courts, is subject to be tried for every criminal offence, capital or not, with which he may be charged, according to the very obscure and very uncertain rules of the Mahomedan law; without a jury, and by judges, who, however able and respectable they may be, are sent out to India at a very early period of their life, as mere civil servants of the East-India Company, and without having had any previous legal education or practice to prepare them for the judicial offices to which they are afterwards appointed in India.

4th. To the East-India Company's governments at Bombay, Madras, and Calcutta, for the following reasons:—

1st. It will, by making the Chief Justices of the King's Supreme Courts members of the Company's Courts of Appeal, the Sudder and Nizamut Adawlut's, both in criminal and in civil cases, unite in spirit and feeling, though not in name, the King's system with the Company's system of administering justice in India. In criminal cases, by putting an end, in some degree, to the strange and anomalous distinction which at present prevails between the situation of those native subjects of the East-India Company who live within, and those who live without, the local jurisdiction of the Supreme Courts; the former, at present, if they be charged with the commission of a criminal offence, having the advantage of being tried for that offence according to the clear and precise rules of the English criminal law, by King's judges, who have had a regular legal education, and by a jury of Englishmen; the latter, at present, if they be charged with the commission of the very same kind of offence, being deprived of all those advantages, and being liable to be tried according to the obscure and uncertain rules of the Mahomedan criminal law, by civil servants of the East India Company, who never have had any legal education, and without a jury of any description whatever. In civil, by extending in all cases of an appealable amount, to those native subjects of the East-India Company who live without the jurisdiction of the Supreme Courts, the advantage which at present is enjoyed by those only who live within the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court, of having their civil suits decided in appeal by a King's judge, who has had a regular legal education.

2d. It will also, by affording the additional security to the natives which has just been described, in all cases, as well in those which relate to the questions of land, agriculture, and manufacture, as in those which relate to revenue, improve the state of the agriculturists, manufacturers, and traders, and relieve the people of the country from many of the oppressive measures which are adopted towards them by the native subordinate agents of Government, who at present are so apt to identify, in the opinion of the European collectors, the necessity of oppressive acts with the prompt and certain collection of the revenues, as in some degree to make the collectors themselves connive at their misconduct, for fear of diminishing the amount of the revenue collected in their respective districts.

3d. It will also, by thus rendering more secure the lives, the liberty, and the property of all the native subjects of the East-India Company, whether they live within or without the local local jurisdiction of the King's Supreme Courts of Bombay, Madras, and Calcutta, increase the interest which those native subjects feel in the permanent continuance of those governments; at the same time that it will, in consequence of the union of the two systems of administering justice, diminish the probability and the frequency of those collisions between the King's courts and the Company's local governments, which, as long as the present state of the judicial establishments in India remain, it is very difficult, if not impossible, to prevent, and which must always inevitably diminish the authority both of the respective courts and of the respective governments in the eyes not only of the native subjects of the East-India Company themselves, but also in the opinion of those native governments which are established in different parts of Asia.

5th. To the King in Council, as a court of appeal from the Courts of Sudder and Nizamut Adawlut, at Bombay, Madras, and Calcutta, for the following reasons :—

From the Chief Justice of the Supreme Courts, who is a member of the Sudder and Nizamut Adawlut, being thoroughly acquainted with the nature of the proceedings which take place before the King in Council in England, the Courts of Sudder and Nizamut Adawlut will become aware, not only of the information which ought to be sent home by them to the King in Council, in order to enable them to form their opinion without delay upon the cases appealed to them, but also of such steps as it is their duty to instruct the natives who are concerned in these appeals to adopt, in order to bring the appeals to a speedy decision and hearing in England, and thereby prevent the recurrence in future of such delay and inconvenience as has hitherto been incurred, both by the parties interested and by the government of the country, in those cases between natives of India which have come by appeal before the King in Council from the three Courts of Sudder and Nizamut Adawluts of Bombay, Madras, and Calcutta. It was for these reasons that the late Marquess Cornwallis and the late Lord Melville were of opinion that the addition of the King's judges of the respective Supreme Courts to the Company's judges of the respective Sudder and Nizamut Courts would be a great improvement in the system for the administration of justice in the Company's territories in India. It was for the same reasons that the late Lord Melville, when, as Secretary of State for the War and Colonies, he framed in 1801 a system for the administration of justice in the King's possessions on the Island of Ceylon, made the chief and puisne justices of the Supreme Courts on that island members of the High Court of Appeal, which had formerly been composed of civil servants in the King's service, in the same way as the Courts of Sudder and Nizamut Adawluts in the Company's territories are now composed of civil servants in the Company's service, and which High Court of Appeal has the same sort of appellate jurisdiction over the inferior courts composed of King's civil servants in different parts of the Island of Ceylon as the Courts of Sudder and Nizamut Adawlut exercise over the different inferior courts composed of Company's civil servants in different parts of the Company's territories in India. It was for the same reasons that the late Marquess of Londonderry, in 1810, informed Sir Alexander Johnston that he was perfectly convinced, from his long experience in Indian affairs, that the manner in which the High Court of Appeal was constituted in the King's possessions in Ceylon, partly of the King's judges and partly of civil servants, was preferable in every respect to that in which the Courts of Sudder and Nizamut Adawlut in the Company's territories were constituted, viz. solely of the Company's civil servants. It was for the same reason that Sir Alexander Johnston, (while, as Chief Justice and President of His Majesty's Council in Ceylon, he was employed in revising the judicial establishments of that island in 1810, after twelve years' experience of the advantageous effects which had been produced on Ceylon by the union of the judges of the Supreme Court with the civil servants in the High Court of Appeal in Ceylon,) advised His Majesty's Government to continue this method of constituting the Court of Appeal on Ceylon, as one which was of the greatest advantage, not only to the King's judges and the civil servants themselves, but to the natives of the country and the government of the island.

Sir Alex. Johnston.

(D.)

THIS Paper was written in 1831. It contains a Copy of the Paper which, in 1826, Sir Alexander Johnston gave to Mr. Wynn, then President of the Board of Control, and to some of the other Members of the Privy Council; and also a Copy of some Suggestions relative to the Appellate Jurisdiction of the King in Council in Indian Appeals, which Sir Alexander, at the request of the Lord Chancellor, Lord Brougham, gave to his Lordship in November 1830.

THE number of appeals to the Privy Council from the three courts of sudder adawlut, in India, which have remained for so many years unheard and undecided, have been productive of the greatest expense and inconvenience to the parties who are interested in them, and are likely to diminish, in the opinions of the natives of India, the respect which they would otherwise entertain for the administration of justice by British judges in British courts of judicature; we therefore conceive it will be interesting to those who are connected with India to know the different steps which have been taken by Sir Alexander Johnston, the late President of His Majesty's Council in Ceylon, since his return to England, with a view of remedying the inconveniences which have been felt by the natives of India, in consequence of the great delay which has hitherto occurred in deciding those cases which have been appealed from the several courts of sudder adawlut in India to the King in Council in this country; we therefore publish the paper upon the subject, which was written and given to Government by Sir Alexander Johnston, in 1826, as appears in his evidence before the Committee of the House of Lords.

The real object of the British constitution in considering the King in Council as a court of appeal from the different courts established in all the British colonies is, to secure, through those courts, and their respective judges, for all the inhabitants of those colonies, whether Europeans or natives, by placing them directly under the protection and superintendence of His Majesty in Council, the strict observance of those different systems of law which the legislature has deemed wise to establish amongst them.

As it is, therefore, the duty of the King in Council, as a court of appeal, to afford that protection to the inhabitants of those colonies, by affirming all such decisions of the colonial courts as may be in conformity with those systems of law, and by reversing all such decisions as may be in opposition to the same systems of law, it is obvious that the King in Council, in order that they may discharge their duty as a court of appeal with the least possible delay, expense, and inconvenience to the parties who are concerned in appeals, and also, in order that they may, at the same time, by the soundness and promptitude of their decisions, encourage those who really believe themselves to be aggrieved, discourage those who put in an appeal merely for the purpose of gaining time or oppressing their adversary, should themselves not only possess a thorough knowledge of all the different systems of colonial law, but should always have sufficient leisure to attend to each case of appeal as soon as it is brought before them.

The King in Council, in addition to the appellate jurisdiction which they exercised over the British colonies in the West-Indies, and in North America, previous to the year 1773, have, since the year 1773, been, from time to time, vested, by different Acts of Parliament, royal charters, and royal institutions, with an immense appellate jurisdiction over all the colonies which have, since that period, been acquired by the British arms, at the Cape of Good Hope, on the Isle of France, on the island of Ceylon, and in the East-India Company's territories in the East-Indies.

The appellate jurisdiction with which the King in Council has been vested since the year 1773, in as far as it relates to the colonies which have just been mentioned, extends over eleven supreme courts; viz. eight King's and three Company's courts, which have been established in the King's possessions at the Cape of Good Hope, in the Isle of France, and in the island of Ceylon, and in the East-India Company's possessions at Calcutta, Madras, Madras, Bombay, and the Prince of Wales's Island. In order to understand thoroughly the nature of these different courts, as well as the nature of the different systems of law according to which they are bound to proceed, it may be necessary to consider them in detail.

The following are the different courts in those colonies over which the King in Council exercises an appellate jurisdiction.

The following four are established in King's settlements, viz.—

The King's Court at the Cape of Good Hope.
The King's Court at the Isle of France.
The King's Supreme Court of Justice, } In Ceylon.
The King's High Court of Appeal, }

The following seven are established in the East-India Company's settlements:

The King's Supreme Court at Calcutta.
The King's Supreme Court at Madras.
The King's Supreme Court at Bombay.
The King's Recorder's Court in Prince of Wales's Island.

The Company's Courts, called,
The Sudder Dewanee Adawlut, at Calcutta.
The Ditto, at Madras.
The Ditto, at Bombay.

These three last courts are established by the East-India Company, under the authority of different Acts of Parliament; these are the three high courts of appeal established at Calcutta, Madras, and Bombay, to which an appeal lies in certain cases from every inferior court established by the Company in every part of the three presidencies of Calcutta, Madras, and Bombay, consisting in all of upwards of 80 separate courts, composed of upwards of 120 judges, and from which three Company's high courts of appeal an appeal lies, in cases of a certain amount, to the King in Council.

The jurisdiction of the court at the Cape of Good Hope extends over all cases, all civil persons, and all lands in that colony.

The jurisdiction of the court at the Isle of France extends over all cases, all persons, and all lands in that colony.

The jurisdiction of the supreme court, and that of the high court of appeal in Ceylon, taken together, include every case whatever, of a certain amount, which can occur on that island.

The jurisdiction of the three King's supreme courts at Calcutta, Madras, and Bombay, and that of the three Company's high courts of appeal, called Sudder Adawluts, taken together, include every case, of a certain amount, that can occur within the three presidencies of Calcutta, Madras, and Bombay.

The jurisdiction of the King's Recorder's Court, on the Prince of Wales's Island, and that of the subordinate courts in the settlements of Malacca and Singapore, include all cases that can occur, of a certain amount, within those three settlements.

The system of law which prevails in each of the above colonies is as follows:

At the Cape of Good Hope:—The law in force in this colony is what is called the Dutch Roman law, modified in some instances by the colonial regulations made by the Dutch, and the English colonial governments respectively.

Isle of France:—The law in force in the Isle of France is the Roman law, as modified during the French revolution in France, and as still further modified by the colonial regulations made by the French and the English colonial governments respectively.

Island of Ceylon:—1st. The law in force in the island of Ceylon, in as far as it relates to the Dutch, English and Cingalese inhabitants of the maritime parts of that island, is the Dutch Roman law, modified by the colonial regulations of the Dutch and English Governments.

9 July 1832.

Sir Alex. Johnston.

ad. In as far as it relates to all the Mahomedan inhabitants on the island, the Mahomedan law, as observed amongst the Mahomedans of Arab descent, who inhabit the coasts of Malabar and Coromandel.

3d. In as far as it relates to the Cingalese inhabitants of the Kandian country, or interior of the island, the Buddhist law (with some local modifications), as observed amongst the Buddhist inhabitants of the Birman empire and Siam.

4th. In as far as it relates to the Hindoo inhabitants of the north-west, north and north-east parts of the island, the Hindoo law (with some local modifications), as observed amongst the Hindoo inhabitants of the Peninsula of India.

5th. In as far as it relates to the people called Morquas, who inhabit two considerable provinces in Ceylon, the one on the south-east, and the other on the north-west side of the island, the Hindoo law, as observed amongst the Hindoo inhabitants on the coast of Malabar.

6th. In as far as it relates to maritime causes between the natives of India, the Mallealun and Malay maritime law.

The East-India Company's three presidencies of Calcutta, Madras, and Bombay, and the Settlements of the Prince of Wales's Island:—

The law in force in the whole of the above territories of the East-India Company, in as far as it relates to the European inhabitants, is the English law, as introduced into those territories, and modified by the several charters of justice, by which the several King's courts have been established in them. In as far as it relates to the immense population of the Hindoo inhabitants, the Hindoo law; and in as far as it relates to the Mahomedan inhabitants, the Mahomedan law; both these laws subject, however, to the modifications which have been introduced into both of them by the East-India Company's local regulations.

From the above considerations it appears, First, that the King in Council, as a court of appeal from the eleven supreme courts which have just been mentioned, exercises an appellate jurisdiction which, directly and indirectly, in as far as it relates to persons, includes a population of upwards of 80 millions of people; in as far as it relates to territory, includes countries, which, independent of the Cape of Good Hope, and the Isle of France, extend to upwards of 1,400 miles in length, and nearly as many in breadth, and which comprises the chief part of that vast region which is bounded by the Indus in the north-west, the great range of the Thibetean Mountains in the north-east, and by the Ocean on the south-east and south-west; and in as far as it relates to the nature of the cases which may be brought before the King in Council by appeal, includes every question of contract, inheritance, land and revenue, of a certain amount, in which, besides all the great interests of the Crown, and of the nation, not only the immense revenue of the East-India Company, upwards of 15,000,000*l.* sterling a year, and the tenure of every foot of land in their dominion, but also every religious and moral feeling, as well as every prejudice of the people of every religion in the country, are most deeply concerned.

Secondly, That the King in Council may, as a court of appeal from those courts, be called upon to decide questions of the utmost importance to the prosperity and tranquillity, not only of the Cape of Good Hope, the Isle of France and Ceylon, but of every part of India; to consider questions, not only of English, French and Dutch colonial laws, but some of the most intricate questions of Hindoo, Mahomedan, and Buddhist law. That their construction of such laws must form the rule of decision as to those laws, not only for every court superior, as well as inferior, established at the Cape of Good Hope, Isle of France and Ceylon; but also for every court superior, as well as inferior, established in every part of India; and finally, that they are called upon for the due protection of upwards of 80,000,000 of inhabitants to exercise a vigilant superintendence, and a prompt control over upwards of 150 judges, situated between 14,000 and 16,000 miles off from the mother country.

Considering

9 July 1832.

Sir Alex. Johnston.

Considering the variety of the different jurisdictions, and of the different systems of law which have been described, it seems obvious, that the persons who from their local knowledge and their leisure are the best qualified for deciding cases in appeal, from the Isle of France, Cape of Good Hope, Ceylon, and the Company's possessions in the East-Indies, are those King's judges who, after having held in the King's and Company's colonies, for many years, some of the highest and most responsible judicial situations in the gift of the Crown, are allowed to retire upon pensions granted to them for life by the Crown, not only as a reward for their services, but as a mark of public approbation. Their having been appointed to those offices is a proof that they originally were men of known character in their profession. Their having been allowed to retire from office upon pensions is equally a proof that their conduct, while in office, was such as deserved the approbation of their Government. Their legal education makes them aware of the sort of local information which it is necessary for them to acquire. Their long residence in the colonies, and the influence they derive from their judicial situations, afford them the very best opportunity of acquiring the most authentic information; and the age at which most of them are appointed to those situations enables them to avail themselves of that opportunity while in the full vigour of their understanding.

As it is, therefore, highly advisable that the King in Council be enabled to avail themselves, as a court of appeal, of the assistance of these judges; and as objections may possibly occur to the King's appointing them members of the Privy Council, it is proposed that His Majesty in Council be empowered by a legislative act, from time to time, to call upon such of these judges as he may think proper to act as legal assessors to the King in Council whenever they sit as a court to hear appeals from the colonies.

A court of appeal so constructed must always be efficient, and must always be popular in the colonies; it must be efficient, because it must always have in it at least some members who are thoroughly acquainted with the peculiar system of colonial law, according to which the court is bound to decide, and with the local circumstances of the people amongst whom that law prevails; who, from long residence in colonies, feel an interest in colonial questions; who, from having retired from office on pensions, have leisure to attend the court whenever their presence may be necessary; and who, from not having the excuse which other members may have, of official avocations, want of time, and want of local knowledge, must feel themselves to be acting under a much higher degree of responsibility to the public, both as to the soundness and to the promptitude of their decisions.

It must always be popular in the colonies, because it is composed of men, who, as the inhabitants of the colonies themselves know, were originally appointed judges in the colonies by the Crown, with great salaries, and with high rank, for the express purpose of securing for the inhabitants a strict observance of their laws, and for affording to the inhabitants the most ready protection and redress against any oppression which might be offered to their persons or their property; of men, to whom the inhabitants themselves have always, for this reason, been accustomed to look up as to the most faithful of their protectors; of men, whom the inhabitants themselves believe to feel an interest in their welfare; whom they know to be thoroughly informed with respect to their laws and customs; and who, they therefore conceive, will be always ready and able to decide upon such cases as are brought before them in appeal from the colonies, with the least possible delay, expense, and inconvenience to the parties who are concerned.

The measure of associating the colonial judges who retire upon pensions from their office as legal assessors, with the members of the Privy Council, will be gradually attended with the most beneficial effects, as well to the colonies themselves as to His Majesty's Government. To the colonies, because it will afford to the colonies, from time to time, as the judges respectively return to England, and retire upon their pensions, an opportunity of having the state of their laws, and that of the administration of justice amongst them, brought before His Majesty in Council in the most authentic shape, by persons in whose knowledge, integrity, and judgment, they have the fullest confidence.

To

9 July 1832.

Sir Alex. Johnston.

To His Majesty's Government, first, because it will enable the King in Council to make a perfect collection of all the different colonial systems of law which prevail in the British colonies, and to ascertain, from the most authentic sources, what effect each of those systems has in its respective colonies, what alteration is required in those systems, and how such alterations may be introduced with advantage to the people.

Secondly, because it will enable His Majesty in Council to derive their information from men whose legal education in England, and whose local experience in the colonies, qualify them to give their opinion upon the subject, both as English lawyers, conversant with the principles of the British constitution, and as colonial lawyers, conversant with the real state of the British colonies; and therefore qualify them to apply the general principles of the law, and the general principles of the British constitution, to the local peculiarities and to the state of society in the British colonies.

Thirdly, because it will accustom the colonies to consider the King in Council as a tribunal in which their respective interests are thoroughly understood; in which every question relative to them will not only excite a proper degree of interest, but will receive the earliest consideration, and in which they may, therefore, be certain of receiving immediate redress on any occasion in which they may feel themselves aggrieved.

As many cases in which both appellants and appellees are natives of India have been for many years in appeal before the King in Council, from the courts of sudder adawlut of Bombay, Madras and Calcutta, and as they have not been prosecuted before the King in Council owing to the parties concerned not having appointed any agents to act on their behalf in England, it is proposed, in order to get rid of all the cases of this description which are now in appeal, and in order to prevent, for the future, the very great inconvenience which has occurred from the natives of India not having appointed agents in England, and from their ignorance of the steps which they ought to take in England when they appeal to the King in Council, that the East-India Company should appoint in England one of the civil servants, who is thoroughly acquainted with the proceedings of the zillah, provincial, and sudder adawlut courts, under the three presidencies of Bombay, Madras, and Calcutta, whose duty it shall be, acting under instructions, to take care that all cases of appeal from the three above courts to the King in Council, in which natives of India are appellants and appellees, shall, provided the parties themselves shall not have appointed agents to act for them in England, be immediately brought forward before the King in Council, and be dealt with by them as the circumstances of the case may require.

Although what has been said applies more immediately to the Cape of Good Hope, the Isle of France, Ceylon, and the East-India Company's possessions in India, the plan which has been proposed is just as applicable to the British colonies in North America, the West-Indies, Trinidad, St. Lucia, Demerara, and Berbice. The cases which are appealed from the West-Indies being mostly cases of equity, those from North America and St. Lucia cases either of the ancient or of the more modern French law, those from Trinidad of the Spanish law, and those from Demerara and Berbice of the Dutch law, and therefore as much within the knowledge of those judges who have been alluded to, as the cases which come from the colonies, with which they have been more immediately connected.

We understand that in consequence of the suggestions contained in this paper, Mr. Clarke, of the Madras civil service, has been employed for some time by the Court of Directors, to prepare the whole of the Indian appeal cases so long in arrear before the Privy Council, for the consideration of the Privy Council, and that most, if not the whole of them, having been so prepared, Sir Alexander, about a year ago, submitted to Government the following plan, the object of which is, by means of the Indian judges who are retired to this country upon their pensions, not only to get rid of, without any additional expense to the public, and without any delay whatever, all such cases as are now in arrear, but also to prevent for the future all arrear in such cases, and to enable the British Government and the British Parliament to become thoroughly acquainted with all those systems of local laws which prevail amongst the different classes of natives in India, and which form the laws according according to which the courts in India, as well as the Privy Council, are bound to decide all cases in which their property and their interest are directly concerned.

9 July 1832.

Sir Alex. Johnston.

1st. That the Government do forthwith appoint a certain number of the Indian judges who are retired in England upon their pensions, to act either as members of the Privy Council, or as assessors to the Privy Council, in hearing and deciding upon all cases in appeal from any of the courts established in the East India Company's territories in India, on the island of Ceylon, on the Mauritius, and at the Cape of Good Hope.

2d. That these judges do forthwith draw up, in communication with the Lord Chancellor, the President of the Council, and the President of the Board of Control, such rules and orders as may enable the Privy Council to decide upon, without delay, the appeal cases from India, which have been so long pending, and to hear and to decide, as soon as they come before them, all future appeals from India.

3d. That they sit, from day to day, till they have got rid of all the appeals from India which are now pending.

4th. That one of them shall always be in attendance at the office of the Privy Council, and shall report to the Council, as soon as any appeal arrives from India, the nature of such appeal, and the steps which it may be necessary to take for the immediate hearing and decision of that appeal.

5th. That they forthwith draw up, for the information of the Council and the public, a full statement and explanation of the history and nature of the different systems of law which prevail amongst the inhabitants of British India, of the Island of Ceylon, of the Mauritius, and of the Cape of Good Hope; and amongst all the natives of Africa, Arabia and Asia, who navigate the Indian Ocean and the adjoining seas, and who trade with any part of the coast of Malabar and Coromandel, and with any part of the coasts of Ceylon, and the Mauritius, and Cape of Good Hope.

6th. As the specific grounds upon which the King in Council form their judgment in cases of appeal from India, ought, as soon as possible after that judgment has been given officially, to be made known to all the natives of India who are subject to the British courts in India, a printed copy of the published report of each case be officially sent by the Court of Directors to every sudder adawlut, provincial and zillah court, in India, with a positive order that such a report shall be forthwith, under the superintendence of the court, translated into each of the country languages which are in the most common use in the province in which the court is stationed, and publicly read and explained by an officer of the court to the natives of the country, in such a manner as the grounds of the decision of the King in Council being once understood by the natives themselves, may prevent them in future from incurring the unnecessary expense and delay of an appeal upon any point of law upon which the King in Council may have already given their opinion.

A PAPER containing the Plan adopted by Sir Alexander Johnston on Ceylon, for collecting Materials for framing a Hindoo and Mahomedan Code, for the use of the Hindoo and Mahomedan Natives of that Island.

At a Council held at the King's House, 31st December 1811;

Present,—His Honour the Lieutenant Governor, the Honourable the Chief Justice and President of His Majesty's Council, the Honourable the Puisne Justice, the Honourable the Chief Secretary to Government, the Honourable the Commissioner of Revenues;

AN extract of a letter from the Earl of Liverpool to his Excellency the Governor of these settlements is read; communicating his Royal Highness the Prince Regent's pleasure, that all the different classes of people who inhabit the British settlements on the island island should be governed as nearly as circumstances will admit, according to their ancient customs, and that the Chief Justice do prepare for their use a short and simple code of laws founded upon those customs, and divested of all technical languages.

The Chief Justice and President of his Majesty's Council thereupon submits to the Lieutenant Governor in Council the following as the plan which he intends to adopt, should it meet with their approbation for carrying into effect the wise and benevolent object which his Royal Highness has in view:—

1st. The Chief Justice will, with the concurrence of his Honour the Lieutenant Governor, immediately select a certain number of persons from each district to report to him upon the nature of the laws and customs which at present prevail in the different parts of this island, and to point out to him such alterations in them as they may think expedient.

2d. The persons whom the Chief Justice will select for this purpose will be such only as are the most distinguished in their respective districts for their integrity and good conduct, as well as for their thorough knowledge of the religion, customs, habits, and local interests of the people.

3d. As soon as the Chief Justice shall have received the reports from the several districts, he will draw up from the information contained in them, such a code of laws as the Prince Regent has commanded.

4th. The Chief Justice will cause a Dutch, Portuguese, Cingalese, and Tamul translation of this code to be publicly exhibited for one year in each district, in order that every one of His Majesty's subjects in these settlements may have the fullest opportunity of considering the code, and making such objections to it as may occur to them.

5th. The Chief Justice having thus taken the sense of His Majesty's subjects upon the code, and made such alterations in it as the further information he shall have received in the course of the year may have rendered necessary, will then submit it for the consideration of the Governor in Council in order that they may forward it to his Royal Highness the Prince Regent for his royal approbation.

The above plan being fully approved of by all the members of Council, the Lieutenant Governor in Council orders that it be published, together with the proceedings held thereon, for the information of His Majesty's subjects on this island.

COPY of a LETTER from the Right Honourable C. Grant, to Sir Alexander Johnston.

Sir,

India Board, 29th March 1832.

I TAKE leave to address you on a subject, the importance of which will, I trust, sufficiently apologize for requesting your attention, and, if you please to give it, your assistance in bringing it to a satisfactory settlement.

The Board have had, for some time, under their consideration the state of the outstanding appeals to the King in Council from the Sudder Courts in India.

On the 22d February 1831, a letter was addressed by the Court of Directors to the Indian governments, desiring to know their sentiments on the best course to be pursued; and especially in reference to a suggestion that counsel should be appointed for both parties in this country, by the Court of Directors, to carry on the appeals to a decision. The Court particularly wished to ascertain in what light such a measure (to be tried in the first instance experimentally) was likely to be received by the natives of India.

Answers have been received from Madras and Bombay.

No answer as has yet been received from the Bengal government; but the Board are strongly impressed with the necessity of some efficient measure being resorted to for clearing off those appeals, and for the disposal of such as may hereafter be preferred.

A memorandum

9 July 1832.

Sir Alex. Johnston.

A memorandum on the subject has, at my request, been prepared by Mr. Richard Clarke, a gentleman who, from particular circumstances, is minutely informed of the situation of these outstanding appeals. In order to assist their judgment as to the best mode of proceeding, the Board are desirous of submitting these papers to some gentlemen of general ability and information, as well as of local experience, requesting them to consider the subject in all its parts, and to report to the Board their opinion and observations.

Presuming that you may not feel disinclined to afford your valuable aid to the Board in their deliberations on this important subject, I take the liberty of mentioning that the other gentlemen whom I address on this occasion are Sir Edward Hyde East and Sir James Mackintosh, and I should be happy to know if you will consent to meet them at such times as may be agreed upon, in order to carry into effect the object in question.

I have the honour to be Sir,
Your obedient humble Servant,
C. Grant.

Sir,

19, Great Cumberland Place, 30th March 1832.

I HAVE the honour to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of this morning, and beg leave to assure you that I shall be most happy to afford the Board any aid in my power in attaining the important object which you have in view with respect to the appeals from India, and that I shall be ready to meet Sir Edward Hyde East and Sir James Mackintosh at any time you may appoint.

My attention has been long directed to the proceedings of the Sudder Adawlut Courts of Bombay, Madras and Calcutta, and to those of His Majesty's Privy Council in this country as a court of appeal from those courts.

In consequence of a request made to me by the late Marquess of Londonderry, while I was Chief Justice and President of his Majesty's Council in Ceylon, I gave the subject in all its bearings the most deliberate consideration: I made two journeys by land from Cape Comoreen to Madras and back again, for the purpose of becoming thoroughly acquainted by local observation with the proceedings in the Zilla, Provincial, and Sudder Adawlut Courts under the Presidency of Madras. I examined while in England in 1809 and 1810, with the assistance of the late Mr. Chalmers, the then clerk of the Council, all the proceedings which had taken place, and all the orders which had been made in every case of appeal from the colonies to the Privy Council, from the reign of King William down to that period.

In 1822, I gave the Marquess of Londonderry at his request a paper, of which No. 1 is a copy, containing my opinion as to the improvements which ought to be introduced into the system of administering justice in the territories under the Presidency of Madras, and also as to the measures which ought to be adopted for rendering the Privy Council an efficient court of appeal, in cases appealed from the Courts of Sudder Adawlut at Madras, Bombay, and Calcutta.

In consequence of Lord Londonderry's death, no steps were taken upon the subject at that time; and in order again to call the attention of the Board of Control, and his Majesty's Ministers to a question of so much importance, I drew up the paper, of which No. 2 is a copy, in 1826; gave copies of it to Mr. Wynn, the then President of the Board of Control, to Sir Robert Peel, the then Secretary of State for the Home Department, and to Mr. Wilmot Horton, the then Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, and suggested to Lord Lansdown the propriety of moving in the House of Lords, as he subsequently did, for a return of all the cases of appeal in arrear from India. In that paper I proposed, as you will perceive, that the Court of Directors should appoint one of their civil servants acquainted acquainted with the proceedings of their courts in India to arrange all the papers connected with the appeals from the Sudder Adawlut then pending before the King in Council. I shortly afterwards explained my ideas upon the subject to Mr. Richard Clark, a civil servant of the Madras establishment, with whom I had been long acquainted, and, conceiving him to be fully qualified for the purpose, advised him to offer to the Court of Directors to undertake the service to which I allude, and mentioned him to Mr. Wynn as the fittest person the court could appoint.

9 July 1832.

Sir Alex. Johnston.

In consequence of my advice, a communication was opened between the Privy Council and the Court of Directors through the Board of Control upon the occasion. Mr. Clark was examined before the Privy Council. I had a great many interviews with the Company's solicitor, Mr. Lawford, upon the subject, and the result of all these different steps has been to enable Mr. Clark to examine and to arrange all the papers connected with these appeals in such a manner as will render it very easy for Sir Edward H. East, Sir James Mackintosh and myself whenever we meet to propose to the Board such a plan as may enable the Privy Council to take steps for bringing those cases which have been so long in arrear to a speedy decision, and for preventing the occurrence of any unnecessary delay in future.

I have the honour to be, Sir,

Your most obedient humble Servant,

A. J.

COPY of the Joint-Opinion of the Right Honourable Sir J. Mackintosh, the Right Honourable Sir E. H. East, and Sir Alexander Johnston.

WE, the Right honourable Sir James Mackintosh, the Right honourable Sir Edward Hyde East, and Sir Alexander Johnston, at the request of Mr. Grant, have taken into our serious consideration the important case which relates to the almost total failure of the appellate jurisdiction of the Company's courts in India to the King in Council. This jurisdiction has now existed for more than 40 years, and during that time, in which about 50 appeals have been entered, only three have been brought before the Council in a condition which rendered it possible to give judgment upon them; and therefore no part of this failure is attributable to delays in the court of appellate jurisdiction.

We abstain from offering any opinion upon the general convenience of all appellate jurisdiction in this country over the Company's courts, not considering the extended view of the subject as intended to be submitted to our consideration.

It seems that neither the utmost diligence on the part of the Privy Council, nor the wisest constitution of that tribunal could abate the evil, so long as the Council are confined within their ordinary judicial duties. It has been suggested to us, that the principal cause of failure in the appellate jurisdiction from the Company's courts, is the ignorance of the natives in India of the measures necessary to give effect to an appeal, and that their ignorance in this respect is the more excusable, because the Company's courts of appeal in India, as we have been informed, always entertain and proceed upon an appeal from the inferior jurisdiction as soon as the record is lodged in their custody, without waiting for any further steps to be taken by either respondent or appellant.

Perhaps as the evil has arisen from a want of due provision in our laws, it would be improper to strike out appeals which have been long on the list, without giving notice to the parties that their interests may be defended at the bar of the Privy Council by those in whom they repose the greatest confidence. As it seems probable that in so long a period many of the parties must have died, it would have become necessary in the case of all long-standing causes, to grant time to the parties in India to take care of interests which may be important to them.

Would not that be sufficiently provided for by directing that notices of all causes now in appeal should be sent to the several Sudder Dewanny Adawlut, with due warning, that unless they were prosecuted to the stage of judgment within two years, they should be deemed and taken to be dropped appeals, and struck out of the list accordingly?

9 July 1832.

Sir Alex. Johnston.

The care of widely dispersing these notices, so as to reach every part of the country, could only be entrusted with perfect propriety to the several Sudder Dewanny courts out of which the records come. But it is impossible to doubt that appeals are in all countries frequently brought for the mere purpose of delaying the payment of just debts; and this grievance, as far as it exists, would be particularly vexatious in India, where the distance of place necessarily consumes so much time before the cause can be brought to a hearing at home. It should seem, therefore, that it would be essential to fix a time when all future appeals should, upon non-prosecution of six months after they are lodged in the Privy Council Office, without special cause assigned, be deemed to be dropped.

It would also be a measure of much remedial justice if the Privy Council were to be invested with a power of granting double or treble costs, in cases where the appeal may be manifestly intended for delay, and necessarily attended with great vexation to the opposite parties.

There are other matters of secondary importance which admit of easier remedy. At present, in Bengal, no appeal can be brought where the amount in dispute is not 5,000*l.* or upwards. There is no limitation at the other Presidencies. According to the views which we have taken of the undue advantage given to the rich by such distant and costly appeals, it seems to us that the judgment of all the Company's courts in India should be raised to the same appealable amount with those of Bengal. Most of these regulations might probably be carried into execution by Orders in Council; but with respect to the power of costs, and the amount of the appealable sum, they might probably be thought to require Parliamentary measures, which in that case would only be settled in conferences between the President and the members of the Cabinet.

If any Parliamentary measure be adopted, a power might well be given to the courts in India to receive and record any compromise of a suit between the parties, notwithstanding the pendency of an appeal, and to transmit a judicial certificate thereof to the appellant court.

It would be a very wholesome provision if the Privy Council were to direct the Company's courts in India to strip the records of needless verbosity, and to reduce them as far as possible to what lawyers in England would call issueable points. It is not intended to say that the huge masses of papers such as are now sent should not continue to be sent, in order that they might be examined, in case of necessity, with a searching eye by all those who took a special interest in a cause, and in order also that the fidelity of the abridgement might in all cases be easily ascertained. It must be owned, however, that as things now are, their immense magnitude, besides greatly enhancing the expense, much more tends to impede due examination of them than to promote it.

It is clear that appeals should not be made against judgments, orders, or decrees of an interlocutory nature, unless the applicant shall enter upon the record a suggestion that such judgment, &c. concludes the general justice of the case, and that he waives making any further appeal in the cause, if that judgment, &c. be confirmed against him.

COPY of a LETTER from Sir Alexander Johnston to the Right Honourable Charles Grant.

Sir, 19, Great Cumberland-place, 7th May 1832.

Sir Edward H. East, Sir James Mackintosh and I, had the honour on the 4th instant to send you, in answer to your letter of the 29th of March, our joint opinion upon some of the points which you had referred to us, relative to the appeals which are brought from the courts of Sudder Adawlut in India to the Privy Council in this country.

I have

9 July 1832

Sir Alex. Johnston.

I have now the honour, in consequence of the conversation which I had with you this forenoon, to enclose you a statement of the different measures which Mr. Clark and I think necessary to enable the Privy Council to hear and decide the fifty cases of East-India appeals which have been so long pending before the King in Council, but which, owing to the zeal and promptitude with which you have taken up the question, may now be expected to be brought to a conclusion without any more delay.

Allow me to add, in allusion to the very flattering terms in which you have done me the honour to ask my opinion upon the occasion, that receiving as I do the pension of a retired Indian judge, I shall always feel it to be a public duty which I owe to my country to co-operate in any way in which my services may be required in hearing and determining all the Indian cases which are now in arrear.

I should not presume to think that my services could be of any use in such a proceeding unless my attention had been particularly called to the subject from the year 1819 to the present period, in consequence of a reference which was then made to me by the late Lord Londonderry, and in consequence of my having been, during the whole twelve years I was Chief Justice and President of His Majesty's Council on Ceylon, ex officio First Member of the High Court of Appeal on that island, which court has the same appellate jurisdiction over all the inferior courts on the island as the several courts of Sudder Adawlut at the different Presidencies on the continent of India have over all the inferior courts in their respective Presidencies, and which court proceeds according to the same rules, regulates its decisions according to the same codes of Mahomedan and Hindoo law, and administers justice amongst natives of the same religious persuasion as the Courts of Sudder Adawlut do within those Presidencies.

I have the honour to be, Sir,
Your most obedient and faithful servant,
Alexr Johnston.

IT appears that under the operation of certain Regulations of the Indian governments, a great number of appeals from decisions of the Courts of Sudder Adawlut (or courts of the highest jurisdiction, established by the East-India Company, for the administration of justice to the natives of India residing in the provinces, and not amenable to the jurisdiction of the King's Supreme Courts of Judicature) have from time to time been transmitted to England; the earliest of which bears date in 1799; and that, with very few exceptions, they have not been prosecuted by the appellants in the usual mode in which appeals are prosecuted before the King in Council, neither have the respondents taken any steps to have them dismissed for non-prosecution; and it further appears, that in some cases the parties have compromised their suits subsequently to the arrival of their appeals in England, and have transmitted duly attested notice of such compromises in the same way in which the appeals were transmitted; and that as no orders have been issued by the Privy Council upon such references, the parties who have so compromised, and their sureties, are not released from their responsibility, nor are all their deposits and securities returned to them; because, as stated in the proceedings of the courts abroad, the appeals are considered as being lodged and depending before His Majesty in Council, without whose final orders such relief cannot be afforded to the suitors.

It appears that the right of appeal from the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut at Calcutta was limited by the 21 Geo. III. c. 70, s. 21, to cases in which the sum in issue is not less than 5,000*l.*; and that in pursuance of such limitation a Regulation was enacted by the Bengal government in the year 1797, prescribing the rules under which applications should be made by suitors for leave to appeal to the King in Council, and all other measures should be taken for the furtherance of the appeals, and of all documents necessary for the information of the King in Council; such Regulation, however, distinctly declaring the reservation to His Majesty of his right to exercise his full and unqualified pleasure in the rejection rejection or admission of appeals, notwithstanding any rules in the said Regulation. But the Act above referred to not having prescribed any limit to the right of appeal from the decisions of the highest Company's courts at Madras and Bombay, a different course was adopted at those Presidencies. By Regulation V. of 1802, enacted by the Government of the former Presidency, provision was made for an appeal from the judgments of the Sudder Adawlut at Madras to the Governor General in Council at Calcutta; and it is understood, that for several years subsequently to the date of that Regulation appeals were preferred accordingly, and that the Governor General in Council, on the receipt of the records of appeal (which were prepared and transmitted to him in like manner, and under similar rules to those which now govern the transmission of appeals to His Majesty in Council from that Presidency) used to issue his final orders or decrees on such appeals, and forward the same to Madras, to be there carried into execution. The Governor General in Council, however, having subsequently "relinquished the authority exercised by him" with regard to such appeals, the previous Regulation was repealed, and a new Regulation was enacted, which is now in force, and under which the appeals from that Presidency, now in England and unproceeded in, have been transmitted. At Bombay a Regulation was passed in 1812, containing the like provisions as that passed in Bengal for the admission of appeals, in such cases only as amounted to 5,000*l.*, although no limitation of the right of appeal from Bombay had been imposed by Act of Parliament. This Regulation, however, was very soon rescinded by Regulation XI. of 1813, and no rules appear to have existed for the admission, at that Presidency, of appeals to the King in Council until the passing of Regulation V. of 1818, which is similar in its provisions to the Madras Regulation VIII. of the same year, providing for all Acts necessary to be done in India for the presentation and admission of an appeal, and for the transmission of an authentic record of all proceedings, evidence, &c. for the information of the Privy Council; and likewise for the delivery of security, as well for the fulfilment of the eventual decree of His Majesty in Council, as for the payment of all costs that might be incurred in the prosecution of such appeals. When the Regulations of the Bombay Government were re-enacted in an improved form in 1827, rules similar in effect to those of 1812 were enacted in Regulation IV. c. 23; and it was there declared, that "the decrees of the King in Council, when duly certified, should be enforced, under the directions of the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut, by the judge of the zillah in which the suit was originally tried in the same manner as those of his own court." In all the Regulations above noticed the directions to the suitors are necessarily confined to such acts as were under the control of the Indian courts, and could not extend to measures which should be adopted in England, nor fix any limit of time for finally disposing of the suits in the event of the parties not moving in them by the agency of representatives in England.

It appears that to each of the records of appeal which have been received in England from the Sudder Adawluts in India is prefixed a certificate under the seal of the court, and the signature of the registrar, declaring it to contain authentic and correct copies of the orders, judgments, evidence and other documents in the case, prepared for submission to the King in Council; and it further appears that the said records have all been forwarded by the local governments to the Court of Directors of the East-India Company, by whom they have been lodged or deposited in the office of the Privy Council, and that those records are intended for the sole use of the Privy Council, and not for the use of the suitors or their agents; and it further appears, from correspondence between the Court of Directors of the East-India Company and their governments abroad and from proceedings of the Courts of Sudder Dewanny Adawlut, accompanying the references in compromised suits, that the reception of those records in England is deemed by the authorities abroad to be virtually a lodging of the said appeal before His Majesty in Council, whose orders thereon are looked for; and that without such orders Courts abroad do not consider themselves authorized to dispose, finally, of any case that has been so appealed, and to restore deposits, and deliver up securities; adverting to what is understood understood to have been the practice in cases of appeal from the Sudder Adawlut at Madras to the Governor General in Council previously to 1818, such expectation seems grounded on the former practice in India in that respect.

9 July 1832.

Referring to the peculiar condition of the natives of India, for whom a system of administration of justice has been provided, under legislative sanction, by the East India Company, and to the incompetency of the courts or governments abroad to promulgate any rules regarding the course of proceeding in England, or to authorize the dismissal of suits for non-prosecution or otherwise, unless such rules shall have first received the sanction of the Privy Council; and it being necessary that such rules should be made and duly notified by regulations to be promulgated at the Presidencies in India, and that provision should be made for giving due effect in England to such rules, so that the present accumulation of arrears may be finally disposed of, with due regard to the interests and rights of the suitors, the following provisional measures are proposed:

All the appeals and proceedings received from the Courts of Sudder Adawlut, through the Court of Directors of the East-India Company, shall be referred to a Committee of His Majesty's most honourable Privy Council, who shall meet as often as may be required, and who shall prepare such orders, judgments or decrees as the exigency of each case may require, to be submitted to His Majesty in Council for his confirmation and approval; notice of such reference shall be communicated to the Courts of Sudder Adawlut in India for the information of the suitors.

All appeals transmitted to England by the Courts of Sudder Dewanny Adawlut at the several Presidencies under the Regulations of the Indian governments, and received in this country before the 31st December 1831, and which shall not be proceeded in by the appellants before the 31st December 1833, shall be dismissed.

An officer to be called Registrar of Adawlut Appeals shall be attached to the Committee until the present accumulation of appeals shall have been disposed of, or until some permanent arrangement regarding appeals from the Courts of Sudder Dewanny Adawlut to His Majesty in Council shall be made.

The duties of that officer shall be as follows:—To have the care of the records and other documents transmitted from the Sudder Adawluts in India for the purpose of being laid before His Majesty in Council, and to keep a register of them according to their dates; to make such communications to the Sudder Adawlut Courts as the Committee of the Privy Council shall direct.

To prepare from each "record" a list of all the papers forming the collection so termed, exhibiting briefly the subject of each paper, number or document, for the better enabling the Committee to refer to the record; and also to prepare a glossary of all Indian terms used in each case.

To carry into effect the rules which may be passed for the direction of the parties, and the due order of proceeding in regard to the Adawlut appeal; to provide professional assistance for the parties when authorized so to do by a power from the suitors in India, and to keep a regular account of all monies expended on their behalf out of the deposits to be made by them in India, and to transmit copies of such accounts for audit to the proper officer of the East-India House before transmission to India.

The appellants in India shall be required by a Regulation, to be promulgated at each Presidency, to notify, within a term to be specified, whether it is their intention to proceed with their suits; and if such be their intention, they shall be required to state to the court of the zillah within which they reside, within a certain time, the name and address of the person who will be authorized to be their agent in England for conducting the said suit. The appellants shall be at the same time informed that they may, if they desire it, appoint the registrar of Adawlut appeals to be such agent, so far as to appoint counsel in their behalf, and to pay all expenses attendant on the prosecution of the appeal, provided they severally deposit in the treasury of the Presidency to which they belong a sum not less than

Sir Alex. Johnston.

1,000*l.*, to be drawn out as required for the payment of the appeal, on vouchers to be delivered to the auditor of accounts at the East India House. All suits in which the appellants shall not either appoint an agent of their own, or authorize the registrar of Adawlut appeals to act for them as above, in three months from the date of the notice served upon them, shall, on certificate from the Sudder Adawlut of due service of such notice and of failure to obey the same, be dismissed.

Like notice shall be given to the respondents, with like option of empowering the registrar of Adawlut appeals to appoint counsel on their behalf; and on certificate from the Sudder Adawlut of due service of such notice, and of no agent having been appointed, the appeal shall be heard ex parte, on application to that effect by the representative of the appellant.

In all applications for leave to appeal which may be presented after the receipt of these orders by the Sudder Adawlut Courts in India, the appellants shall be required, besides the previous conditions which they are now called upon to fulfil, and deposits now required, to state the name and address of the person who is to act as agent for the appeal in England or to authorize the registrar of Adawlut appeals to appoint counsel for them on their making the deposit for the expenses to be incurred; and no appeal shall be admitted by a Court of Sudder Adawlut unless such nomination of a representative be made by the appellant.

The substance of the foregoing rules shall be duly promulgated in the several Presidencies in India by Regulations drawn out in the prescribed form, and declaring in the preamble that the said rules have the sanction of His Majesty's most honourable Privy Council.

The Copy of a LETTER from the Abbé Dubois to Sir Alexander Johnston, giving him an Account of the present condition of the Native Catholics throughout India.

King-street, Portman Square,
London, 21st May 1831.

Dear Honourable Sir,

IN the last interview I had the honour to have with you, you appeared anxious to have a short sketch of the Christian missions in Asia. I will endeavour to comply with your wishes, as far as my inquiries on the subject, during my long residence in India, enable me to do.

The whole of the Christian converts in Asia, during the three last centuries, by the Jesuits and their successors, do not amount, at the present time, to more than twelve or thirteen hundred thousand, if we except those made by the Spanish missionaries, on the Phillippine Islands, which, from all accounts, amounts to about two millions, among the natives of those Islands. Of the twelve or thirteen hundred thousand converts on the Continent of Asia, India contains one half that number, under the superintendence of four titular bishops, and three bishops in partibus, with the titles of Apostolical Vicars. The four titular bishops are, the Archbishop of Goa, (the metropolitan of India,) and the Bishops of Cranganore, Cochin, and Malayapore, (St. Thomé, near Madras). The three apostolical vicars, who reside, one at Bombay, another at Verapoly, on the Malabar coast, and the third at Pondicherry, are immediately appointed by the Pope, without the interference of any temporal power. The two former are Italian Carmelite Friars, the latter is a Frenchman, and has the superintendence over the French mission in the Carnatic and Mysore.

Each bishop and apostolic vicar has a district assigned to him by the Holy See. The Archbishop of Goa has under his spiritual jurisdiction the most numerous congregations. It is he who directs all the Catholics in the Island of Ceylon, whose aggregate number amounts to at least 120,000. He has also under his spiritual sway, the great number number of congregations disseminated on the Malabar coast, from Tellicherry and Mangalore to Goa, inclusively, and containing at least 150,000 Catholic Christians. Next to Goa, the most numerous mission is that of the Apostolical Vicar at Verapoly, near Cochin, who reckons 130,000 converts, partly of the Syriac, partly of the Latin rite; the former are converts made by the ancient Jesuits, of the Syrians of the Nestorian sect, established from immemorial time in Travancore, and having still many congregations of that persuasion who steadfastly adhere to the doctrines of Nestorius; whose principal error consisted in admitting two persons in Christ. They, however, admit the seven sacraments, as the Roman-catholics, purgatory, invocation of saints, &c. but altogether reject the worship of images*. Those who are become converts to Catholicism have preserved the ancient Syriac, or Chaldeo-Syriac; and their liturgy is in that language, which their priests learn merely to read in order to be able to perform their religious ceremony, without understanding it, having no professors to teach them, and in general their native priests are very ignorant. The Bishop of Cochin has about 45,000 Christian natives under his spiritual sway; his jurisdiction extends from Cochin and Tuticorin, along the coast to Negapatam. His congregations along that tract of country are numerous, and are chiefly composed of fishermen, known under the name of Paravas, who boast and pride themselves on being the offspring of the converts made three centuries ago by the celebrated Jesuit St. Francis Xavier. The Bishop of Cranganore exercises his spiritual power in a part of the Travancore country, and in the province of Marava and Madura; he reckons 36,000 converts of several castes. Among his flock there are many thousands of those professional robbers called Colliers, who chiefly inhabit the Marava district. The Apostolical Vicar of Bombay, an Italian Carmelite friar, has the poorest mission in India; his flock does not amount to above 10,000 or 12,000 converts. The French mission entertained by the Seminaire des Missions Etrangères, in Paris, is composed of a French Apostolical Vicar, appointed by the Pope; his residence is at Pondicherry, and he is assisted by two French missionaries, scattered over the Carnatic and Mysore countries. The number of Christians under their charge amounts to at least 40,000. The Portuguese Bishop of St. Thomé's, near Madras, exercises his jurisdiction in the Tanjore country, where there are about 12,000 native converts; and all along the coast from Negapatam to Calcutta, there are found several congregations, chiefly consisting of that class of people calling themselves the offspring of the ancient Portuguese. Such is, Sir, the short analysis of the state of the Catholics in India I can give you; and such are the remainders of those once flourishing congregations, founded by the Jesuits, amounting, 80 years ago, to 2,000,000. Since that period, and chiefly since the extinction of the order of the Jesuits, the affairs of Christianity on the Peninsula, owing to many causes, which it would be too long to enumerate, have been visibly on the decline, and, in my opinion, will continue to be so.

9 July 1832.

Sir Alex. Johnston.

I will now say a few words about the Christian sects from the Catholic Church, which have also formed religious establishments on the Peninsula. The most ancient are the Nestorians, established in Travancore, styling themselves the Christians of St. Thomé's; a claim without foundation, it being well known that their patriarch and founder, Nestorius, Bishop of Constantinople, lived in the fifth century: most of them were, as already mentioned, converted to the Catholic faith by the ancient Jesuits, but a great many remained, and still remain, steadfastly attached to Nestorianism, and form several congregations, amounting in all to about 20,000.

There are also congregations of Protestants, of several sects; the most flourishing are those of the Calvinistic persuasion, established in the Island of Ceylon, amounting, it is said, to about 60,000, chiefly composed of Catholic converts, who turned Calvinists during the long persecution exercised by the Dutch against Catholicism; a persecution which lasted

* By worship of images is meant nothing more than respect and veneration for the holy persons represented by them.

9 July 1832.

Sir Alex. Johnston.

lasted, in a great degree, until the time when, by your benevolent and persevering interference, you succeeded to obtain the full emancipation of the Catholics, and to remove all the civil incapacities which weighed on them on account of their religion; a favour whose remembrance shall be handed down from generation to generation, among the Catholic population of the island, with senses of the liveliest gratitude. From the Peninsula of India let us pass over to the countries beyond the Ganges.

There is a mission of Italian Barnabite Friars, established more than a century ago in Pegu, having to attend to the five congregations at Rangoon, and some other parts of the country, an apostolical vicar, and three or four missionaries. That mission, owing to the civil wars which at all times raged in the country, and to other causes, was at no time prosperous, and at present reckoned only about 8,000 converts.

The Seminaire des Missions Etrangères, in Paris, has entertained, during these last 150 years, a mission in the kingdom of Siam, which at present consists of a bishop, apostolical vicar, and six French missionaries; the residence of the bishop is at Bankock, and the missionaries attend the congregations scattered over the country. The number of converts was once considerable; but, owing to the continual foreign and civil wars which have not ceased to exist in the country, their number is at present reduced to about 10,000 or 12,000. The most flourishing mission under the charge of the Seminaire des Missions Etrangères is that of Tonkin, where we reckon at least 160,000 converts, attended by a bishop, and an apostolical vicar, 10 French missionaries, and 60 native priests, properly educated by two French missionaries, delegated for that purpose. The Spanish mission, in the same country, is no less flourishing than the French one; thus the aggregate number of Tonkinese converts amounts to about 300,000 souls. Next comes the mission of Cochin-China and Cambodia, including at least from 70,000 to 80,000 converts, attended by a bishop, vicar apostolic, nine or ten French missionaries, and about 25 native priests, educated by the missionaries.

Finally, the Seminaire des Missions Etrangères entertains a mission in the interior of China. In the province of Futchneu, there are to be found about 50,000 Chinese converts, attended by a French bishop, six or seven missionaries, and 22 or 24 Chinese priests. The Portuguese, Spaniards, and Italians, have also established missionaries in several provinces of the Empire, many of which go on well, and the aggregate amount of the Chinese converts does not fall short of 200,000. However, as the Christian religion is proscribed by the laws of the empire, and the ingress of foreigners into the interior forbidden under pain of death, the missionaries are introduced by trusty converts with the greatest caution, at the risk of their lives for the introducer and the introduced; and even after their safe arrival in their missions they are obliged to live hidden, and to use a continual vigilance not to be discovered. If they are discovered, and given up to the Mandarins, they are judged and sentenced to death, or to perpetual exile in Tartary, ordinarily to Eli. They are, however, sometimes redeemed by giving heavy bribes to the Mandarins.

The Seminaire des Missions Etrangères sends every year a certain number of young missionaries to Macao, where we have an agent, a French missionary, well acquainted with the localities; whose charge is to receive the missionaries we send, keep the correspondence between our Missions and the Seminaire of Paris, receive and shelter the couriers which are sent once a year by the apostolic vicar, to accompany and introduce the missionaries newly arrived from Europe, send to the several missions the small sums of money, and other articles destined for each one, &c. &c.

The Seminaire des Missions Etrangères, founded two centuries ago, is directed by four members, who have passed at least two years in one of our foreign missions. I am one of the four. I have been deputed by my associates to this country, to keep the correspondence of the missions, receive the letters which arrive at this season by the return of the East-India Company's ships from Canton, return answers, and execute the commissions of the missionaries; the agitated state of France not allowing us a safe medium of correspondence at the present time.

Such

Such is, honourable sir, the short analysis I can give you of our mission, a more extensive account would prove tedious. I regret much that my leisure does not allow me to make a more neat, and a little better worded copy: this, as you will perceive, has been made with much haste, for which I beg to be excused.

9 July 1832.

Sir Alex. Johnston.

I have the honour to be, dear honourable Sir, your very obedient Servant,
The Abbé J. A. Dubois.

(H.)

THE Copy of a Plan for framing a Maritime Code for the use of all the different Natives of Asia who navigate the Indian Seas, and who trade with the several British Possessions in India.

AS the East-India Company's charter will soon expire, and as the Legislature of Great Britain will then be called upon to decide whether a royal government shall be established over the British territories in India, it is advisable that His Majesty's Government should take into their serious consideration every subject which is connected with the maritime and commercial prosperity of that immense empire.

There is no subject which is of more importance, both in time of peace and in time of war, to the maritime and commercial prosperity of Great Britain and India, than that which relates to the situation, the regulations, and the proceedings of the several Vice-Admiralty jurisdictions which have from time to time been established, as well in the East India Company's settlements at Bombay, Madras, Calcutta, and Penang, as in the King's settlements at the Cape, the Isle of France, Ceylon and New South Wales.

Of these eight Vice-Admiralty jurisdictions, the four first were, in consequence of their being situated in the East-India Company's settlements, established by several Acts of the Parliament of Great Britain; and the four last were, in consequence of their being situated in King's settlements, established by several orders of the King in Council.

Although there is a difference between the four first and the four last jurisdictions, as to the authority by which they were originally established, there is no difference whatever between them either as to the appointment of their judges, the nature of their jurisdiction, the forms and rules of their proceedings, the laws and usages according to which they decide, or the court in England before which their decisions are liable to be revised.

All the judges of these jurisdictions are appointed by the Lord High Admiral of England, and they all hold a commission under the great seal of the High Court of Admiralty, by which they are directed to exercise within their local limits a similar jurisdiction to the one which is exercised by that court, to proceed according to the same rules and forms as that court, to decide according to the laws and usages observed by that court, and in every case to allow of an appeal against their decisions to that court.

It is obviously the intention of the King and Parliament of Great Britain that these jurisdictions should, in consequence of their being so intimately connected as they are, both in time of peace and in time of war, with the maritime interests and naval superiority of Great Britain, be under the immediate control of the High Court of Admiralty and the general superintendence of the Lord High Admiral of England; and that all of them, as well those which are situated in the Company's as those which are situated in the King's settlements, should be considered as parts of the same system which Great Britain, in consequence of the extent of her territories to the east of the Cape of Good Hope, and the acknowledged superiority of her navy in the Indian seas, has felt it her duty to establish at her own expense, for the purpose in all maritime questions of administering prompt and substantial justice towards all the maritime traders and navigators of those seas, Europeans as well as natives of Asia; towards the former, according to such maritime laws and usages as prevail respectively amongst all the different Europeans who frequent those seas ; towards the latter, according to such maritime laws and usages as prevail respectively amongst all the different maritime people of Asia, consisting of Arabs, Persians, Maldivians, Malays, Hindoos and Chinese, who from time immemorial have had separate maritime laws and usages of their own, and who are most materially interested, as shipowners, maritime traders, and mariners in the navigation and trade of the Indian Ocean, and of all the adjacent seas which extend from the Cape of Good Hope west, to the Philippine Islands east, and from Van Diemen's Land south, to Calcutta north.

9 July 1832.

Sir Alex. Johnston.

It is now, however, ascertained by experience that these Vice Admiralty jurisdictions, from want of sufficient local information at the time they were first established, are framed too exclusively upon the model of the High Court of Admiralty in England, and therefore that they are not so well adapted as the other King's courts in India to the local situation of the different territories, and the local circumstances of the different people for whose benefit and protection they are established.

All the nations of Asia have a right to hope that Great Britain will, in consequence of the high character for justice and the naval superiority which she has acquired throughout the Indian seas, now do, with respect to all her maritime courts in Asia, what she has already done with respect to all her other courts in that part of the world.—modify them in such a manner as to render their proceedings applicable to the local circumstances of the different countries in which they are established, and to the peculiar character, manners, and feelings of the different people whose persons, property, rights, and interests it is her object to protect ; that she will, by collecting, printing, and publishing authentic collections of all the maritime laws and usages of the different people of Asia, enable as well the judges of her maritime courts as all other persons interested in the question, to become thoroughly acquainted with all those laws and usages ; and finally, that she will not only make but enforce, both in time of peace and in time of war, as well by her maritime courts as by her naval power, such regulations for the navigation and trade of those seas as are consistent with the general principles of justice, and in harmony with the different maritime laws and usages which have from time immemorial been observed by the several maritime nations of Asia.

The extent and the accuracy of the local information which has been acquired since the original establishment of these jurisdictions, will now enable the Lord High Admiral of England, should his Royal Highness think it expedient to take the subject into his consideration, to remedy without difficulty the defects which experience may have shown to be inherent in their present constitution, and to frame, from the most authentic materials, such a comprehensive and popular system for administering justice in maritime cases throughout the Indian seas, and such a comprehensive and popular code of maritime laws and usages for the security and protection of all the maritime traders, shipowners and mariners of Asia, as will not only in the present but also in future ages associate inseparably, in the minds of all the people of Asia, the idea of the justice with that of the maritime power of Great Britain. It is with this view submitted to the Lord High Admiral, that it will be advisable for his Royal Highness to order the Vice-Admiralty jurisdictions of the Cape, the Isle of France, Ceylon, New South Wales, Bombay, Madras, Calcutta, and Penang, to send to the Admiralty a report upon the three following points :

1st. Upon the origin, proceedings, and present state of each of the Vice-Admiralty jurisdictions which have been respectively established at Bombay, Madras, Calcutta, Bengal, the Cape, Isle of France, Ceylon, and New South Wales, and upon the nature of the different powers, civil and criminal, which are exercised by their different judges, as well in time of peace as in time of war.

2d. Upon all such general maritime laws and usages of Europe, and such particular statutes of the Parliament of Great Britain as are at present applicable to the trade and navigation in the Indian seas, both in time of peace and in time of war.

3d. Upon

9 July 1832.

Sir Alex. Johnston.

3d. Upon the several codes of maritime laws and usages which are respectively in force amongst all the different nations of Asia, who are in any way engaged in the maritime trade, or in the navigation of the Indian seas.

With reference to the first point, it is submitted that the report should, besides affording a minute detail of the rules of proceeding, of the tables of fees, and of the numbers, duties and emoluments of the officers of each court, also contain a distinct and clear view of the extent and nature of the sea coasts, of the castes and character of the mariners, of the several branches of maritime trade and of the different sorts of shipping within the local limits of each court, a description of the cases which are the most commonly brought before it, of the number and peculiarities of the cases which have been decided by it ever since its first establishment, of the number of those which have been appealed, of the amount of the expense which the several parties have incurred in consequence of each appeal, and of the time which had elapsed between the original decision given by the Vice-Admiralty Court and the final one given by the Court of Appeal.

With reference to the second point it is submitted, that the report should specify in what manner each of the maritime laws and usages of Europe, and each of the statutes of the Parliament of Great Britain which is at present considered as in force with respect to such maritime traders and navigators in the Indian seas as are natives of Asia, may have an effect upon or be in opposition to their religious and moral habits, their feelings and their prejudices, and in what manner such maritime law and usage, or such statute, may be so modified as to attain the political or commercial object for which it was made, without militating against any of those feelings or prejudices.

With reference to the third point it is submitted, that the report should contain authentic and perfect collections in the original languages of the country, and in English, of the several maritime laws and usages which prevail amongst the different nations of Asia who are engaged in the trade and navigation of the Indian seas. Sir Alexander Johnston knows, from his own experience, that such collections may be easily made, and that all the information which is required may be obtained through the different Vice-Admiralty establishments at the Cape, Isle of France, New South Wales, Calcutta, Madras, Bombay, and Prince of Wales's Island. In the course of the 16 years during which he held, under the Great Seal of England, and under that of the High Court of Admiralty, the offices of President of his Majesty's Council, Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, and Judge of the Vice-Admiralty Court in Ceylon, he felt it to be his duty repeatedly to assemble on that island some of the best informed of the natives of those parts of Asia, the inhabitants of which were the most engaged in the maritime trade and navigation of the Indian seas, and to inquire from them, not only the nature and history of all the different maritime laws and usages which were observed amongst the maritime traders and navigators of their respective countries, but also what moral, political, and commercial effects each of those laws and usages had produced in their several countries, both with respect to the different persons who were subject to them and the different branches of trade to which their provisions refer.

By these means Sir A. Johnston ascertained that the different maritime laws and usages which prevail amongst the different nations of Asia, are partly of Hindoo, partly of Malay, partly of Maldivian, partly of Persian, partly of Arabian, partly of Cingalese, and partly of Chinese origin; that a few of them are derived from the laws of Rhodes, Oleron, Itisbury, and Consolato-del-Mare; some of which were introduced by the Arabs, from the Mediterranean, into the Indian seas, during the 15th and 16th centuries; and finally, that they all are at present, in consequence of no authentic and perfect copies of them ever having been printed and circulated throughout Asia, so little understood, even by those who are the most interested in their observance, as to render it both easy and common for the native arbitrators, to whom commercial and maritime questions are often referred, to misconstrue and pervert their meaning.

A PAPER containing extracts from pages 15 and 16, of the Eleventh Report of the Directors of the African Institution, and from page 93 to page 100 of the Appendix to that Report, and giving a detailed Account of the different circumstances connected with the Resolution passed on the 15th July 1816, by all (in number 763) the Proprietors of Domestic Slaves on the Island of Ceylon, declaring free all Children who might be born of their Slaves after the 12th August 1816.

IT is with feelings of the most lively satisfaction, that the Directors of the African Institution have now to state, that the benevolent exertions of Sir Alexander Johnston, the Chief Justice of the island of Ceylon, for a period of ten years, to induce the proprietors of slaves in that island to fix a day after which all the children born of their slaves should be considered as free, have at length been crowned with success. Early in the month of July last, that liberal and enlightened judge addressed himself upon this subject to the principal proprietors of slaves at Colombo who were upon the list of special jurymen for that province. The proposal contained in the Chief Justice's letter was well received by these gentlemen; and at a general meeting which they called, to take it into consideration, they unanimously resolved, that all children born of their slaves after the 12th of August last should be free. That day was fixed upon by them, at the suggestion of Sir Alexander Johnston, in honour of the Prince Regent. They afterwards appointed a committee from among themselves to frame certain resolutions for the purpose of carrying their benevolent intention into effect; the principal object of which was to secure a provision for the children born free after the 12th of August 1816, from the masters of their parents, until the age of fourteen, it being supposed that after they shall have attained that age they will be able to provide for themselves.

Sir Alexander Johnston states, that the special jurymen of Colombo consist of about 130 of the most respectable Dutch gentlemen of the place, in which number are contained almost all the Dutch who are large proprietors of slaves. Besides these gentlemen, there are jurymen of all the different castes among the natives. The moment the jurymen of these castes heard of the resolution adopted by the Dutch special jurymen, they were so much struck by the example, that they also addressed the Chief Justice, announcing their unanimous acquiescence in the measure which had been resolved upon by the Dutch special jurymen. And Sir Alexander Johnston adds, that the example of the jurymen at Colombo, was, he understood, to be immediately followed by all the jurymen on the island. "The state of domestic slavery," he says, "which was practised in this island for three centuries may now be considered at an end." And he observes, that the measure which has thus been brought about, is in a great degree owing to the principles diffused by the circulation of the Reports of the African Institution.

The Directors are persuaded that they express the cordial feeling of the institution at large in offering the tribute of their grateful acknowledgement to Sir Alexander Johnston for his successful exertions in promoting, and to the special and other jurymen of the island for their general adoption of this important change in the condition of their country, and for the bright example which they have taken the lead in exhibiting to the world, of fixing a period for the extinction of the state of domestic slavery, an example which the Directors trust will speedily be followed wherever it may be done with safety. But whether this hope shall be realized or not, it will never be forgotten that the inhabitants of Colombo were the first of the British colonists to act upon this grand, noble, liberal and disinterested principle; and they will for ever deserve the best thanks of every individual who has at heart the advancement of the happiness of mankind, and the improvement of human nature.

Extract of a LETTER from the Honourable Sir Alexander Johnston, dated Colombo, 22d July 1816.

9 July 1832

Sir Alex. Johnston.

I HAVE, for the last ten years of my residence in Ceylon, been endeavouring, as I believe I have often mentioned to you, to get the principal proprietors of slaves on the island to fix a day after which all children born of their slaves shall be considered as free. My endeavours have at last, as you will see by the enclosed papers, been attended with success. I wrote on the 10th of this month a letter (of which No. 1 is a copy) upon the subject to the principal proprietors of slaves in this place, who are upon the list of the special jurymen for the province of Colombo, and who are therefore all personally known to me. By the letter, (of which No. 2 is a copy,) you will see that the proposal contained in my letter was well received by them; and that they, at a general meeting which they called to take the contents of that letter into consideration, unanimously came to the resolution, that all children born of their slaves after the 12th of August next should be free; (the 12th of August was fixed upon by them, at my suggestion, as a compliment to the Prince Regent). They afterwards appointed a committee from among themselves to frame certain resolutions (No. 3), for the purpose of carrying their benevolent intention into effect. The principal object of these resolutions is, as you will perceive, to secure that the children born free after the 12th of August next shall be provided for by the masters of their parents until the age of fourteen, it being supposed that after they have attained that age they will be able to provide for themselves.

The Dutch special jurymen of this place consist of about 130 of the most respectable Dutch gentlemen of the place; in which number are contained almost all the Dutch who are large proprietors of slaves. Besides these gentlemen, there are jurymen of all the different castes among the natives, such as vellales, fishermen, men of the mahabadde or cinnamon department, Chittees, and Mahomedans. The moment the jurymen of these castes heard of the resolution which had been come to by the Dutch special jurymen, they were so much struck with the example which they had set them, that they also immediately addressed me in the same manner as the Dutch had done; announcing their unanimous acquiescence in the measure which had been adopted by the Dutch, and their unanimous determination to consider as free all children that may be born of their slaves after the 12th of August.

No. 4. is a copy of the answer which I sent to the address which was presented to me on the occasion by the Dutch special jurymen; and No. 5. a copy of that which I returned to the respective addresses which were sent me by all the jurymen of the different castes of natives at Colombo.

The example of the jurymen at Colombo, is, I understand, to be immediately followed by all the jurymen on the island*. You will, I am sure, be delighted to hear of this event. The state of domestic slavery, which has prevailed in this island for three centuries, may now be considered at an end.

No. 1.—Copy of a LETTER from the Hon. Sir Alexander Johnson to the Dutch Gentlemen whose Names are on the List of Special Jurymen for the Province of Colombo.

Gentlemen,

Colombo, July 10, 1816.

THE able assistance which I so frequently receive from you in the execution of my office, renders it my duty to communicate to you, without delay, any information which may be interesting to your feelings. I therefore have the honour to send for your perusal, the Eighth and Ninth Reports of the African Institution, which I have lately received from England.

The

* It was shortly after followed by all the proprietors of domestic slaves (in number 763) on the Island; all the proprietors of slaves on Ceylon were on the list of jurymen.

9 July 1832.

Sir Alex. Johnston.

The liberality which you have always displayed in your sentiments as jurymen, make me certain that you will be highly gratified with the success which has attended the proceedings of that benevolent institution.

Many of you are aware of the measure which I proposed in 1806 to the principal proprietors of slaves on this island, and of the reason for which its adoption was at that time postponed.

Allow me to avail myself of the present opportunity to suggest to you, that, should those proprietors, in consequence of the change which has since taken place in the circumstances of this island, now think such a measure advisable, they will, by carrying it into effect, set a bright example to their countrymen, and show themselves worthy to be ranked amongst the benefactors of the human race.

I have the honour to be, gentlemen,

Your most obedient humble servant,

(signed) Alexander Johnston.

No. 2.—Copy of the Answer to the above.

To the Honourable Sir Alexander Johnston, Knight, Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Judicature in the Island of Ceylon, &c. &c. &c.

May it please your Lordship,

WE, the undersigned, respectfully beg leave to acknowledge the receipt of your Lordship's very kind and condescending letter of the 10th instant, accompanied with the Eighth and Ninth Reports of the African Institution, the perusal of which we did not delay, in consequence of the honourable distinction which your Lordship has shown in addressing us on so important a subject, with the laudable and humane view of directing our attention to the measure which your Lordship has heretofore proposed in the year 1806.

We sincerely beg leave to assure your Lordship, that the proposal conveyed by your Lordship's letter is gratifying to our feelings; and it is our earnest desire, if possible, to disencumber ourselves of that unnatural character of being proprietors of human beings; but we feel regret in adding, that the circumstances of every individual of us do not allow a sudden and total abolition of slavery, without subjecting both the proprietors and the slaves themselves to material and serious injuries.

We take the liberty to add, that the slaves of the Dutch inhabitants are generally emancipated at the death of their owners, as will appear to your Lordship on reference to their wills deposited in the records of the Supreme Court; and we are confident that those who are still in a state of slavery have likewise the same chance of obtaining their freedom.

We have, therefore, in following the magnanimous example of those alluded to in the aforementioned reports of the African Institution, come to a resolution, as our voluntary act, to declare, that all children who may be born slaves from and after the 12th of August 1816, inclusive, shall be considered free, and under such provisions and conditions as contained in a resolution which we shall agree upon, and which we shall have the honour of submitting to your Lordship, for the extinction of a traffic avowedly repugnant to every moral and religious virtue.

We have the honour to subscribe ourselves,

May it please your Lordship,

Your Lordship's most obedient and very faithful humble servants,

Colombo, July 14, 1816.

No. 3.—Copy of the Resolutions referred to in the preceding Letter.

At a meeting of the Members of the Special Dutch Jurors, assembled by general consent, for framing certain Resolutions, to be carried into effect for the eventual Emancipation of Children born of Slaves, held at Colombo, on Monday the 15th July 1816;

Present—Counr. Sebastian Wickerman, Esq., Johan Frederic Lorenz, Esq., John Gerard Kriekenbeek, Esq., Frans Philip Fretz, Esq., Leonard Van Dort, Esq., Christ. Cornelis Uhlenbeek, Esq., Wilh. Abraham Kriekenbeek, Esq., Dieterich Cornelis Fretz, Esq., Richard Morgan, Esq., Cornelis Arnoldus Prins, Esq., Johannes Justinus Stork, Esq., Jacobus Cornelis Vandendriessen, Esq., Johannes Bartholomeusz, Esq.

Resolved unanimously,

1st. That all children born of slaves from and after the 12th of August next ensuing shall be considered free.

2d. That if a female slave be sold who has a child or children born free, they shall go with her into the hands of the new master, if they have not completed their second year.

3d. That of all children who have past their second year, it shall be at the option of the master to return them, notwithstanding the sale of the mother.

4th. That all children who are born free shall remain in their master's house, and serve them without any wages, save and except their food and raiment, which shall be at the expenses of the masters; a male till the age of fourteen, and a female till the age of twelve.

5th. That when free-born children have completed the fourteenth and twelfth year of their age, as aforesaid, they shall from that day since be emancipated from their masters.

6th. That if a master manumits his female slave, who has a free-born child or children above two years of age, it shall be at the option of the masters to retain them, namely, the female till the age of twelve, and the male till the age of fourteen, or allow such child or children to follow the mother; in which latter case the mother shall be obliged to support the child or children.

7th. That in case any master, through manifest poverty, or from the incorrigible depravity of the free-born children, or for any other causes, finds himself unable to retain them any longer under his care, application shall be made by such masters to any charitable funds, or the magistrates, that they may be otherwise disposed of.

8th. That in order to prevent any fraud to the prejudice of the free-born children, all heads of the families in whose houses any child of that description is born shall have the birth of such child registered by the constables of his division at least within three days thereafter.

9th. That every constable shall, for the same purpose, open a register, in which shall be specified the sex, and names of the parents and masters; and a list thereof shall monthly be transmitted to the office of the sitting magistrate, to be entered in a general register of the free-born children.

10th. That in the register to be kept by the constable, an entry shall likewise be made by him of the death of every free-born child, upon the information to be given by the heads of the family within the same space of time aforesaid; and a monthly list thereof shall be transmitted to the sitting magistrate's office, to be entered accordingly in the general register.

11th. That of both the general registers of births and deaths quarterly returns shall be made to the Chief Secretary's office.

Lastly, Resolved unanimously,

That the foregoing resolutions be forwarded to the Honourable the Chief Justice, to be submitted to his Excellency the Governor, in order that the same may be made a rule, under such alterations, amendments, and modifications as his Excellency may deem expedient for the furtherance of the beneficial object in view.

(signed) By all present.

Sir Alex. Johnston.

No. 4.—Copy of the Answer of the Hon. Sir Alexander Johnston to the Address presented to him by the Dutch Special Jurymen.

Gentlemen,

Colombo, 21st July 1816.

I HAVE had the honour to receive the resolutions which you have sent me by Mr. Kriek enbeek and by Mr. Prins, and shall with pleasure present them, as you desire me, to his Excellency the Governor.

I beg leave to offer you my warmest congratulations on this interesting occasion. The measure which you have unanimously adopted does the highest honour to your feelings. It must inevitably produce a great and a most favourable change in the moral habits and sentiments of many different classes of society in this island; and generations yet unborn will hereafter reflect with gratitude upon the names of those persons, to whose humanity they will owe the numerous blessings which attend a state of freedom.

I return you my sincere thanks for the honour you have done me, by making me the channel through which your benevolent intention is to be communicated to his Excellency the Governor. As an Englishman, I am bound to feel proud in having my name associated with any measure which secures the sacred right of liberty to a number of my fellow creatures.

I have the honour to be, Gentlemen,

Your most obedient and humble servant,

(signed) Alexander Johnston.

No. 5.—Copy of the Answer of the Hon. Sir Alexander Johnston to the Address presented to him by the Jurymen of the different Castes of Natives at Colombo.

Gentlemen,

Colombo, 22d July 1816.

I HAVE had the honour to receive the resolutions which you have respectively passed declaring your unanimous acquiescence in the measure which has lately been adopted by the Dutch special jurymen.

I take the liberty to enclose you, as the best way of conveying to you the sentiments which I entertain upon the subject, a copy of a letter which I have written to those gentlemen.

Allow me to add, that I am fully aware of the anxiety which the jurymen of all castes have shown to emulate the example set them by the Dutch special jurymen; and that it will be gratifying to the friends of humanity to know, that whatever difference of religion or whatever difference of caste, may prevail among the persons who are enrolled on the list of jurymen of this place, no difference of opinion has for a moment prevailed among them as to the propriety and justice of the measure in question.

I have the honour to be, Gentlemen,

Your most obedient and humble servant,

(signed) Alexander Johnston.

A PAPER containing an Account of the different circumstances connected with the Repeal, in 1810, of all the Restrictions which were previously in force on the Island of Ceylon against Europeans acquiring and holding Lands in Perpetuity on that Island.

AS the steps that were taken by Sir Alexander Johnston many years ago to repeal the laws which then prevailed in the island of Ceylon against the admission of Europeans to colonize on that island form a precedent for adopting a similar measure in the British territories on the continent of India, and must of course be frequently referred to by the members of both Houses of Parliament when the discussion of this important measure is brought before Parliament, we shall, for the information of those members in particular, and for the British public in general, endeavour to give a detailed account of the restrictions against European colonization which were originally introduced into the island of Ceylon on the capture of the Dutch possessions in that island by the British arms, and of the different measures which led to the complete repeal of those restrictions, and to the complete change of policy by His Majesty's Ministers upon that subject.

When the English took possession of the Dutch settlements in the island of Ceylon, they were, in the first instance, placed under the government of the East-India Company, and the same restrictions against European colonization as prevailed in the rest of the Company's dominions were in force in them; when afterwards, in 1801, the Dutch possessions on that island were transferred from the government of the East India Company to that of the Crown, His Majesty's Ministers, adopting the same policy as the East India Company had previously done with respect to European colonization in Ceylon, sent out instructions, of which the following are copies, upon the subject, to the late Lord Guildford, the then Governor of that island:

"With a view to preclude all approaches towards European colonization, you will observe, that no grants of land in perpetuity, or estates of inheritance, are to be made by Government to British subjects or European settlers, and if any such have already been conceded by Government since the island has been in the King's possessions, as such grant could only have been made subject to ratification by His Majesty, the consideration (if any) which may have been paid should be refunded, and the grant revoked.

"You will also let it be understood that the purchase of lands in perpetuity, for the obtainment of a longer term in lands in Ceylon than the period of seven years, whether in their own name or by the intervention of a native trustee, be utterly forbidden to all British subjects in the civil or military service, and to all licensed residents in Ceylon. In the event of any act being done in violation of this restriction, the attempt should be deemed a revocation of the licence possessed by the offenders.

"That Government may be apprized of the fact, you will direct that all conveyances and contracts relative to land entered into by any licensed resident, unless as tenant at will, or from year to year, be registered in the Secretary's office within three months after the contract has been entered into, on pain that the whole transaction be rendered null and void.

"As purchases of land may already have taken place between British subjects and the Dutch or natives, which, if sanctioned by Government, would form an exception to the present system, you will call on such British purchasers to dispose of such landed property, the acquisition of which was, at the least, extremely injudicious during the present war; as the value will probably have risen, and they will receive the increased amount, they will have no right to complain. Should, however, any such British purchaser refuse to acquiesce you will consider that refusal as a revocation of his licence, and direct him to depart from the island."

9 July 1832.

Sir Alex. Johnston.

In 1806, Sir Alexander Johnston, having become Chief Justice and first member of his Majesty's Council in Ceylon, made, at the request of the then Governor, a complete circuit of the island, not only for the purpose of the administration of justice through every part of the British territories, but also for that of examining into, upon the spot, the state of the people, and the best means of ameliorating their condition, by improving the agriculture, the manufactures, and commerce of the country. Amongst other objects, he particularly directed his attention, while on the circuit, to the extent and nature of the vast tracts of waste lands belonging to the Government in the northern and eastern divisions of the island, which, although they had in ancient times been highly cultivated and well peopled, were then completely uncultivated and depopulated.

Sir Alexander being, in consequence of the report he made as to these lands, requested by Sir Thomas Maitland, the then Governor, to give his opinion as to the best mode of restoring them to their former state of cultivation, strongly advised that all the restrictions which were then in force against the colonization of Europeans in the island should be immediately repealed, and that, on the contrary, the greatest encouragement should be held out by Government to every European capitalist who would take grants of those lands from Government, and who would introduce European capital, European industry, and European arts and sciences, amongst the natives of the country.

Sir Thomas Maitland, agreeing with Sir Alexander Johnston in this opinion, recommended the adoption of the measure proposed by Sir Alexander to His Majesty's Ministers; and on Sir Alexander's proceeding to England, in 1809, for the purpose of submitting to His Majesty's Ministers, at the request of the Governor in Council in Ceylon, various measures for the improvement of the government and the situation of the island, instructed him particularly to impress on the minds of His Majesty's Ministers the policy of encouraging European colonization in Ceylon. Sir Alexander, on his arrival in England, having done so, the late Lord Londonderry, the then Secretary of State for the Colonies, sent out instructions to the Governor of Ceylon, annulling the restrictions which had previously prevailed in that island against European colonization, and authorizing him to adopt a different policy for the future, upon which the two proclamations were issued by His Majesty's Government in Ceylon, of which the following are copies:

(Government Advertisement.)

"Whereas certain restrictions have hitherto been laid on by His Majesty's commands, prohibiting Europeans from holding grounds in this island, and restricting the possession of lands to natives only, save and except in the town and fort of Colombo, and the gravetts thereunto belonging; public notice is hereby given, by command of His Excellency, that His Majesty has been graciously pleased to direct that all such restrictions be done away, and they are hereby done away accordingly, save and except in the district of Trincomalee, where the aforementioned restrictions are, for the present, still to apply.

"Grants of Land for Cultivation.—The advertisement published by the Right Hon. Lieutenant-General Maitland, dated 4th December, 1810, notifying that all restrictions existing against Europeans acquiring permanent property of land in this island were from thenceforth discontinued, except in the district of Trincomalee, is now republished, viz.:
• Whereas certain restrictions have hitherto been laid on by His Majesty's commands, prohibiting hibiting Europeans from holding grounds in this island, and restricting the possession of lands to natives only, save and except in the town and fort of Colombo, and the gravetts thereunto belonging, public notice is hereby given, by command of his Excellency, that His Majesty has been graciously pleased to direct that all such restrictions be done away, and they are hereby done away accordingly, save and except in the district of Trincomalee, where the aforementioned restrictions are for the present still to apply.' And the exception contained in the said advertisement with regard to the district of Trincomalee is hereby limited to the whole of the peninsula of Trincomalee, and three miles westward of the tank situated in the centre of the commencement of the isthmus. And for the further information and encouragement of persons desirous of obtaining grants of land from Government, for the purposes of cultivation, in any part of this island, with the temporary exception last mentioned.

"His Excellency is pleased hereby to publish the rules and conditions by which the grants will be regulated, in pursuance of instructions received from His Majesty's Ministers on this subject. Grants in perpetuity will be given to His Majesty's European subjects, and also to such Europeans, or their descendants, as were settled in Ceylon before the conquest of it by His Majesty, and who, by their good conduct since may have entitled themselves to that indulgence. The quantity of land so granted will not exceed 4,000 acres to any one individual. Such lands will be held free of all duty to Government for a period not exceeding ten, or less than five years. At the expiration of that period the lands will be subject to a fixed rent, liable to be altered at stated periods, but in no instance to exceed one-tenth of the actual annual produce. All such grants will be subject to a condition of cultivation and improvement according to the situation and capability of the land, the particulars of which stipulation, and of all other conditions, in which a latitude is left, will be fixed in the grants, upon a fair and equitable consideration of the circumstances of each case. Applications to be made by letter, addressed to the Chief Secretary of Government.

"Chief Secretary's Office,
Colombo, July 21, 1832."

The late Lord Londonderry, who entertained the same opinions as Sir Alexander Johnston as to the policy of encouraging European capitalists to settle in Ceylon, had determined, had he remained in office, to adopt, in pursuance of the system of policy acted upon in these proclamations, the other supplementary measures advised at the same time by Sir A. Johnston, as necessary to secure complete success to the objects which his Lordship had in view.

The supplementary measures advised by Sir A. Johnston were, 1st, to repeal such parts of the Governor's instructions as authorized him, under particular circumstances, to remove a European from the island without trial, and positively to direct that no European, American, or native of the continent of India, or the island of Ceylon, should be removed from the island, without his first having been found guilty, by the verdict of a jury, of some offence to which the punishment of banishment from the island is attached by law. 2dly. To prohibit the Governor of Ceylon from any longer exercising the power, which he has hitherto exercised, of ordering any native of the island to labour for Government by force, and to direct that all labour performed for Government by natives shall be paid for in the same manner as if they performed that labour for any private individual; the above power being often productive of the greatest hardships, and the greatest injustice to the natives, and being capable of being made use of as a means of depriving such Europeans or others as may settle on the island of a part or the whole of their native labourers, at a moment when the services of those labourers may be most essential to the success of their agricultural, manufacturing, and commercial speculations. 3dly. To declare the ports of of Trincomalee, Point de Galle, Colombo, and Jaffna, free ports. 4thly. To repeal such parts of the Governor's instructions as authorize him to make legislative acts for the government of the island by his mere will and pleasure, and without the check or control of any other person in the island, and thereby enabling him, if he thinks proper, virtually, though not avowedly, to defeat even the provisions of His Majesty's charter of justice for Ceylon, which is issued under the Great Seal of England. 5th. To frame, by Act of Parliament, a free constitution for all the inhabitants of the island of Ceylon, founded upon the principles of the British constitution, but adapted to the religion, the customs, and manners of the natives, as well as to the peculiar circumstances of the country. 6th. To frame a short and a clear code of laws, divested of all technical language, for the use of the inhabitants of Ceylon. 7th. To advise some of the leading merchants in the principal towns which have an interest in the agricultural improvement of, and trade with, the island of Ceylon, to form chambers of commerce, or committees, for the purpose of watching over and protecting, in England, the interest of such British European subjects as may embark their capital in speculations upon that island.

The reasons urged by Sir Alex. Johnston for establishing such committees, are contained in the printed account, of which the following is a copy:

"A few months ago, copies of official documents were published, from which it appeared that the settlement of Europeans in Ceylon had been allowed, at the instance of Sir A. Johnston, the then Chief Justice of the colony. It may be useful to state, that at the time Sir A. Johnston proposed to His Majesty's Ministers to take off the restrictions against Europeans holding land in Ceylon, which restrictions were taken off by the proclamations of 1810 and 1812, he was perfectly aware that this measure would not be attended with the full benefits which might be derived from its adoption, unless those persons who are connected with the trading and manufacturing interests of England were made fully acquainted with the real state of the island of Ceylon, and unless they were induced to exercise a salutary superintendence over the interests of the several capitalists who might determine, in consequence of this measure, to settle upon that island, but who were very unlikely to succeed in their speculations, unless they could obtain in this country, before they embarked in those speculations, such information as might be necessary to enable them to judge of the prudence or advisability of embarking in them; and unless they could also, after they once had embarked in them, be certain, in case of their meeting with opposition on the island, of receiving, in all cases in which they were really wronged, the support of the trading and manufacturing interest of England, both in their endeavours to obtain redress, and to secure for themselves the adoption of such a policy, and such a system of laws for the regulation of the agriculture, manufactures, and trade of the island, as might enable them to avail themselves, to the fullest extent, of the local capabilities of the island, and of the advantageous and free use of their capitals.

"In order to secure for them the certainty of being able to procure such information as they might require before they determined upon such speculations, and the equal certainty of obtaining redress in England, if wronged in the colony, after they once had embarked in such speculations, Sir Alexander proposed that a committee should be formed in England of some of the most respectable and best informed of the persons who were connected at Liverpool, Glasgow, Manchester, and other places, with such portions of the trading and manufacturing interests of England as were the most interested in the trade and improvements of all branches of trade and manufactures in India, and that that committee should adopt such measures as are necessary to enable it to obtain the most accurate information that could be procured of every thing relative to the island of Ceylon. Such a committee will be a great benefit—

"1st. To the persons who embark their capital in speculations on the island of Ceylon. 2d. To the native inhabitants of that island. 3d. To the people of Great Britain. 4th. To the Government of Great Britain.

"1st. To

9 July 1832.

Sir Alex. Johnston.

" 1st. To the persons who embark their capital in speculations on the island of Ceylon.

" It will enable all such persons to obtain, without expense, information upon which they can rely, as to all the following particulars :—As to what capital they ought to embark in any speculation; what profit they may fairly expect; what dangers or opposition they are likely to encounter; and what assistance they ought beforehand to secure from Government; as to the nature of the climate, the soil, the mineral and vegetable productions of the country; as to the extent, the description, and the character of the population; as to the price of labour, the state of machinery, and the different sorts of implements in use in agriculture and manufactures; as to the possibility of improving such implements, or of substituting in their room the machinery used for similar purposes in Europe; as to the facility, where labourers are not to be had in Ceylon, of getting them either from the peninsula of India or from China; as to the practicability of substituting for human labour, where human labour cannot be procured, either the labour of oxen or that of elephants; as to the nature of the religious and other prejudices of the people, and the effect which those prejudices are calculated to have upon their habits of thinking with respect to different descriptions of labour, manufactures, and trade. It will also enable all such persons, in case of any dispute, either with the local government of the island, or with persons of influence on the island, to bring their complaints before His Majesty's Ministers, through the committee, with much more effect than they could otherwise do, in consequence of His Majesty's Ministers being fully aware that those complaints had been first of all examined by merchants of respectability in this country, who were thoroughly acquainted with the subject; who viewed the circumstances in which the colonists were placed in Ceylon with the good sense, enlightened ideas, and liberal feelings of British merchants; and who, provided they approved of the conduct and proceedings of the colonists in Ceylon, would give their strenuous support to those colonists, and would excite in their favour the sympathy and support of the whole trading and manufacturing interests of England.

" 2d. This committee will be a benefit to the native inhabitants of the island of Ceylon, by encouraging capitalists from England to employ their capital with safety and with profit in agriculture, manufactures, and trade in that island, and thereby making the island what it is admirably fitted for by its local situation, the great entrepôt of trade between Europe, America, Africa, Arabia, and the western coast of the peninsula of India on the one side, and China, the Eastern Archipelago, all the countries on the eastern side of the Bay of Bengal, Bengal itself, and the coast of Coromandel, on the other side.

" 3d. This committee will be a benefit to the people of Great Britain, by rendering the people of Ceylon active, rich, and prosperous; by increasing the variety and quantity of their exchangeable produce, their demand for the manufactures and other produce of Great Britain, and thereby enabling them not only to defray the expenses of their own local government in particular, but also to contribute in some degree to the discharge of the expenses of the Government of Great Britain at large.

" 4th. This committee will be a benefit to His Majesty's Ministers, by enabling them to ascertain, from a body of merchants in this country, as well as from a body of merchants in Ceylon, who are better acquainted, both from their knowledge of the general principles of commerce and of the local circumstances of the island, than any other persons can be, with what the real wants of the island may be; what improvements in the agriculture, manufacture and trade of the island can be made by Government; what encouragement it is absolutely necessary and advisable that Government should give, in order to carry into effect these improvements; what laws now in existence are prejudicial to the agriculture, manufacture and trade of the island; what laws ought to be abolished; what, if any, substituted in their room. It will also enable His Majesty's Ministers not only to adopt, with benefit to the country, such measures as they may, under the advice of the committee think proper to adopt; but it will, through the influence it must possess in all the great manufacturing and trading towns of England, render all such measures popular by explaining to the the trading and manufacturing interest of England the advantages they are likely to derive from the adoption of those measures; it will also enable Government, in cases of complaints being made to them by the colonists and other speculators in Ceylon against the local government or persons of influence on that island, to know what decisions they ought to come to upon the subject, consistently with their own rights and the interests and feelings of the people of the island of Ceylon."

In consequence of the late Lord Londonderry having given up the office of Secretary of State for the Colonies, in the latter end of 1809 or beginning of 1810, although the instructions to the Governor of Ceylon against allowing Europeans to settle upon that island were repealed, and the proclamations, of which we have given copies, were published by the Government of Ceylon, none of the other measures, mentioned by us as having been recommended by Sir Alex. Johnston, were subsequently carried into effect; and few, or no European British subjects have availed themselves of the terms held out by the Ceylon government in the proclamations of 1810 and 1812, it being obvious that no British subject could prudently venture to embark a large capital in that island, without enjoying the security which the measures proposed by Sir Alex. Johnston were calculated to give him.

PAPER, containing Copies of a Letter from Mr. Ricketts, the Agent for the East Indians to Sir Alexander Johnston, on the 6th May 1830, and Sir Alexander's Answer, explaining to him the line of policy which he would advise the British Government to adopt with respect to all the East Indians in British India.

Copy of a Letter from Mr. Ricketts to Sir Alexander Johnston.

" 13, Brooksby-street, Liverpool Road,
6th May 1830.

" Dear Sir,

" YOU lately did me the honour to express a wish to peruse the East-Indian's petition to Parliament, with which I have been deputed to England by my countrymen in India; and it of course gave me great pleasure to put a copy into your hands. You are now, doubtless, made acquainted with the civil and political disabilities complained of in the petition.

" Aware, as I am, of your philanthropic efforts in behalf of the native burghers at Ceylon, the descendants of European fathers, during your residence as Chief Justice and President in Council on the Island, I shall esteem it a particular favour if you will kindly seize a moment of leisure to let me know the practical bearings and results of the measures pursued by you, and whether they turned out to be prejudicial in any way to the interests of the local government.

" I beg you will excuse my troubling you on the subject; and the best apology I can offer, and which I am sure you will as readily accept, is the vast importance of the public cause in which I am engaged.

" I have the honour to be,

" Dear Sir, your very obedient Servant

" John W. Ricketts."

" Dear Sir,

" 19, Great Cumberland Place.

" I HAVE the honour to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 6th of May 1830. In answer, I beg leave to assure you that I shall with pleasure explain to you the opinions which I entertain upon the subject to which you refer; and the different measures which in consequence of those opinions, I adopted while I was Chief Justice and President of His Majesty's Council in Ceylon.

" I have

9 July 1832.

Sir Alex. Johnston.

" I have always been of opinion that, in policy, His Majesty's Government ought to show the most marked respect to all persons on Ceylon, who are either descended from Europeans, or who bear any resemblance in features, manners, dress, religion, language and education to Europeans, and thereby constantly associate in the minds of the natives of the country an idea of respect and superiority with that of a European, and with that of everything which is characteristic of or connected with a European.

" That in justice it ought to do every thing in its power to place the native burghers on that island in a situation which may enable them to acquire the respect and esteem of their countrymen, and which may make it their interest and their wish as well as their duty to support the authority and promote the views of the British nation. That it ought to encourage them to improve their moral character and to cultivate their understanding, by affording them the same prospect as Europeans enjoy of attaining, if they desire them, situations of the highest honour and of the greatest emolument in all the different departments of the state.

" And that it ought to consider the exclusion by law, for no fault of their own, but merely on account of their complexion of so valuable a class of His Majesty's subjects, as unjust and impolitic, as systematically degrading them in the eyes of their countrymen, and as subjecting them on every occasion, in private and in public, amongst Europeans and amongst natives, however respectable, however well educated, and however deserving they may be, to the most unmerited contumely and the most painful mortifications.

" I have also always been of opinion, that His Majesty's Government ought, not only with a view to the religious, moral and political instruction of the people, but even with a view to the increase of its own strength and authority on Ceylon, to adopt measures which may gradually introduce amongst the inhabitants of that island such portions of the arts and sciences, and of the moral and political institutions of Europe, as may be applicable to the situation of the country, and may ultimately assimilate the character and feelings of the people of India to the character and feelings of the people of Great Britain.

" That it ought to consider the native burghers on the island of Ceylon as valuable auxiliaries in carrying into effect all such measures, and in bringing about all such changes as are calculated to improve the moral and political character of the natives of that island.

" And finally, that it must, so far from diminishing its popularity and endangering its authority, increase the former and affirm the latter by exalting the character and conciliating the affections of all the native burghers who are settled in different parts of the island, who, from the circumstances of their birth, are thoroughly acquainted with the language, habits, manners, usages and prejudices of the natives; and who, from the circumstances of their descent, their features, their names, their religion, their laws, their education, and their language, must, if wisely protected, feel themselves bound by every tie of affection and interest to adhere at all times to the British Government, and to consider their importance, if not their existence in society, as depending upon the continuance and strength of the British authority in India.

" Entertaining these opinions, I felt it to be my duty, as soon as I became Chief Justice and President of His Majesty's Council on Ceylon, to advise His Majesty's Government to place every descendant of a European on that island, whatever his complexion might be, precisely upon the same footing as a European; to look upon him as having the same rights and privileges, as subject to the same criminal and civil law, and as eligible to the same appointments in every department of government. Upon my recommendation native burghers were appointed to the offices of registrar, deputy registrar, keeper of the records, advocates, proctors, notaries of the Supreme Court, members of the landrards, secretaries of the provincial courts, sitting magistrates, justices of the peace, and superintendents of the police, to the office of ~~proctor~~ for paupers, a situation of great responsibility, created by Government at my suggestion for the specific purpose of protecting the rights of paupers and slaves, to that of ~~deputy advocate fiscal~~, and, under certain circumstances, even to that of acting advocate fiscal, an officer next in rank in the Supreme Court to the chief and puisne justice, and discharging duties in that court of great trust and importance to the safety of the Government and the tranquillity of the country.

" In consequence of the adoption by government of this line of policy, the native burghers on the island of Ceylon acquired a high value for character, and a powerful motive for improving their understanding, for cultivating every branch of knowledge, for making themselves acquainted with the arts, the sciences, the manufactures, and the agriculture of Europe ; they enjoyed a further opportunity of displaying their talents and extending their influence amongst their countrymen, and they felt a pride in exerting that influence in favour of the British Government, and in promoting amongst the natives of the island all such measures as were calculated to improve the state of the country, and to ameliorate the condition of the people.

" My experience on the island of Ceylon led me, many years ago, to believe that the only way of effectually and permanently improving the condition of that island is for Parliament, after having instituted in England a full and public inquiry upon the subject, to relieve its agriculture, its manufactures, its trade, and its population, from all unnecessary and impolitic restrictions ; to open its ports to vessels of all nations ; to encourage Europeans to settle on the island, and apply their capital, their skill, and their industry to the cultivation of the country ; and solemnly to guarantee, by an Act of Parliament, to the inhabitants of every description a free and a liberal system of government, founded on the principles of the British constitution, but adapted to the peculiar circumstances of the island, and to the peculiar manners, feelings and prejudices of the people. I therefore felt it to be my duty, in order to prepare the people for such a change, and to satisfy the Legislature of Great Britain that the natives of India, if properly treated, are capable of appreciating the value of freedom, and exercising all the rights and privileges of free men, to introduce such measures amongst the natives of Ceylon as were calculated to enlighten their understanding, to raise the standard of their moral feeling, to give them a value for character, and a respect for the rights of their fellow-creatures, to vest them with a power of making and administering the laws by which they were to be governed ; to encourage amongst them a calm and enlightened discussion of all questions, moral as well as political, in which either their spiritual or their temporal welfare might be concerned ; to remove all religious jealousies, by removing all political disabilities arising out of a difference of religious persuasions ; to make them acquainted with the history of their country, with the nature of the changes, religious and political, which it had undergone, with the causes of those changes, and the effects which they had produced upon the happiness of the people and the prosperity of the country, and with the great advantages which they were capable of deriving from the introduction amongst them of European settlers and of European capital, arts, sciences, skill and manufactures ; and to create amongst them, by means of a liberal and well-directed press, a public whose opinion might operate as a protection to all those who acted as the benefactors, and as a check upon all those who act as the oppressors of their country, and might thereby become a powerful engine for establishing amongst them a free, a mild and an economical government.

" In all these measures the native burghers took a most active part, and displayed the most enlightened and the most disinterested feelings in the uniform and efficient support which they afforded me, and acquired by the conduct which they observed in unanimously passing, of their own accord, a resolution emancipating all children born of their slaves after the 12th of August 1816, the highest credit, not only from his Majesty's Government, but also from the members of the African Institution, whose opinion is publicly recorded in the 11th Report of their proceedings in the following words : ' That the grateful acknowledgments of the society are due to them for their general adoption of this important change in the condition of their country, and for the bright example which they have taken the lead in exhibiting to the world of fixing a period for the extinction of the state of domestic slavery, an example which the directors trust will be speedily followed whenever it may be done with safety ; but whether this hope shall be realized or not, it will never never be forgotten that the inhabitants of Colombo were the first of the British colonists to act upon this grand, noble, liberal, and disinterested principle, and that they will ever deserve the best thanks of every individual who has at heart the advancement of the happiness of mankind and the improvement of human nature.'

"From the various communications upon literary, moral, and political subjects which I frequently received while on Ceylon from East-Indians descended from European fathers, in every part of India, from the frequent opportunities which I enjoyed during the two journies, the first in 1809, the last in 1817, which I made by land from Cape Comorin to Madras and back again, of becoming myself personally acquainted with many gentlemen of that class in the peninsula of India, and from the very high opinion which I received of the talents and acquirements of the whole class from the late Colonel Mackenzie, who while Surveyor-General of India employed a great many young men of that class, as well to survey the country as to collect for him the most valuable materials relative to the history of the people, I feel no doubt whatever that, were the Legislature of Great Britain to adopt, with respect to the East-Indians throughout the continent of India, the same line of policy which his Majesty's Ministers had at my suggestion adopted with respect to the native burghers throughout the Island of Ceylon, the British government at large would derive the same advantages which the Ceylon government in particular have derived from the talents, the zeal, and the loyalty of one of the most respectable and of the most useful portions of His Majesty's subjects in Asia. I was so convinced of this, and of the justice of extending to all East-Indians descended from European fathers on the continent of India the advantages of the system of policy observed by his Majesty's Government towards the native burghers of Ceylon, that I submitted, when I was in England in 1810, to the Lord Londonderry a plan upon the subject which secured his approbation, and which, had I remained on Ceylon, I should have advised His Majesty's Ministers to carry into effect under the sanction of a special Act of Parliament.

"The object of this plan was to afford the whole class of East-Indians descended from European fathers in Asia a favourable opportunity of raising their moral and political character in the estimation of the people of Europe and Asia, by inducing the most distinguished of that class, from every part of the continent of India, to co-operate with the most distinguished of the native burghers from every part of the island of Ceylon, in establishing an extensive settlement of their own in the northern provinces of that island.

"According to this plan a free constitution, and every right and privilege possessed in England by the most favoured European-born British subject, were to be guaranteed to all members of this settlement by the Legislature of Great Britain.

"The government lands in those provinces which, though at present uncultivated and depopulated, were in former ages most highly cultivated and most densely peopled, were to be granted by His Majesty's Government, in perpetuity, and upon the most liberal terms, to such of them as might be willing to cultivate them. The greatest encouragement was to be afforded them in agriculture, manufactures, and commerce. The only two navigable channels through the long ridge of sand-banks extending from the north-west part of the island of Ceylon, to the south-east part of the peninsula of India, and known by the name of 'Adam's Bridge,' were to be deepened so as to admit the passage through them of vessels of a large burden. The immense tank or reservoir of water, called the 'Giant's Tank,' and many other large tanks, were to be repaired at the public expense. An order of merit was to be instituted, in which each member of the settlement might receive a rank and a title according to the quantity of land which he had brought into cultivation, or according to the degree of improvement which he had made in any branch of useful science or useful manufacture. Elementary schools were to be established in the country for the education of their children; a college, with professors in every department of science and literature, was to be founded in the town of Jaffna, for their use and instruction.

"A certain number of the boys who had distinguished themselves the most at the schools were to be annually placed in the college; and a certain number of those who had distinguished distinguished themselves the most at the college were to be annually sent to England, and after a short course of education in that country, adapted to the professions for which they were intended, to receive from the British Government in India appointments according to their respective talents or dispositions, either in the army, the navy, the law, the church, or the civil service.

9 July 1832.

Sir Alex. Johnston.

“ I am confident that in such a settlement, situated within twenty miles of the continent of India, near enough to that continent to admit of their constant intercourse with their friends and relations, but far enough from it to be completely removed from the influence of local prejudices, all the East-Indians descended from European fathers would enjoy the most favourable opportunity, under the protection of a free and liberal constitution, and under the immediate care and superintendence of the British Parliament, of developing their moral character, of displaying their capacity to enjoy all the free institutions and privileges of Englishmen, and to discharge, with credit to themselves and benefit to their country, all the duties of the highest departments of Government ; of acquiring themselves, and of communicating to the natives of the country, all the arts, the sciences, and the literature of Europe ; and of gradually but effectually dispelling from the minds of the people of Europe and Asia the unmerited prejudices which, owing to circumstances not under their control, have hitherto prevailed against a numerous class of His Majesty’s subjects, who of all others in Asia are, on account of their European descent, the most naturally and the most especially entitled to the protection and sympathy of the British Parliament and the British nation.

“ I have the honour to be, dear Sir, your faithful servant,

“ Alex. Johnston.”

COPIES of LETTERS addressed by the Court of Directors to the Indian Governments, reviewing the Operations of the Civil and Criminal Courts at the Three Presidencies.

IV. APPENDIX, No. 1.

(1.) Letter to the Bengal Government, 8 Dec. 1824.

Civil and Criminal
Courts at the Three Presidencies.

(1.)—COPY of a LETTER from the Court of Directors to the Bengal Government, dated 8th December 1824.

1. OUR last Letter to you, in this Department, was dated the 20th October last.

2. In the hope of receiving your detailed Answer to our Letter of 9th November 1814, we have abstained from addressing you on many matters connected with your Judicial System, and the state of the Courts; which have nevertheless been the subjects of our anxious deliberation.

3. In preparation for the discussion which that Answer will necessarily induce, we have carefully examined the Statement of Suits entered, decided or depending, which, within several past years, we have received from you; and we think it useful to communicate to you the result of this examination of the state of your Civil Judicature, without referring on the present occasion to the various important matters contained in our Letter of 9th November 1814, which will be more conveniently recurring to when we receive your long-expected reply to our Orders.

4. The Regulations passed in 1814, which were in operation from the beginning of the next year, materially affected the institution and decision of Civil Suits; and as they continued in force without any remarkable alteration (except as to certain points which will be noticed) till the end of 1820, it will be useful to advert to the business as it stood during that period.

5. The following Table shows the number of Suits instituted or admitted in the several Courts, from 1814 to 1820 :—

6. By the abolition of the office of Assistant Judge, and by the extension of the powers and the addition to the number of Registers, many descriptions of Suits, which, under the Rules in force before 1815, would have been admitted into the Courts of the Zillah Judges, were thrown into the Courts of the Registers; and by the diminution of the number of the Moonsiffs, and the abridgment of their powers, with the extension of the jurisdiction of the Sudder Aumeens, and the increased number of the tribunals, many additional Suits came into the Courts of the Sudder Aumeens.

7. Some of the differences in the Table may be thus accounted for; but the general falling off in the institution of Suits, in the years immediately succeeding 1814, is no doubt to be chiefly ascribed to those provisions of the Regulations which added to the expense of Suits in the first instance, which limited the jurisdiction of the Moonsiffs, and which imposed restrictions on the admission of the Suits of paupers.

8. Comparing the Suits admitted in 1814, with the average of those admitted in the years 1815, 1816, and 1817, in the Courts of the Judges, Registers, and Sudder Aumeens, taken together, it will be seen that the numbers were—

Average of 1815, 1816, and 1817	50,561
Being an Increase of	9,806.

And making a similar comparison of those in the Moonsiffs' Courts, the numbers will be found—

In 1814	125,491
Average of 1815, 1816, and 1817	62,339
Being a Decrease of	63,152.

9. In 1817 the Moonsiffs, who had been prohibited, by the Regulations of 1814, from receiving Suits in which the cause of action had originated more than one year from the time of preferring the suit, were allowed to receive those in which the cause of action had originated within three years; and the expenses charged upon small Suits, which, being excluded from the cognizance of the Moonsiffs, had been filed into the superior Courts, were reduced. The effect of these changes was that the number of Suits in the Courts of the Moonsiffs increased very greatly, and those in the other Courts correspondingly.

10. The Regulations of 1814, therefore, prevented the institution of Suits, rendering justice more difficult of access than it had been before, and those who had objected to the institution of Suits, by removing some of the obstructions, had been removed.

11. The Suits which the Records show to have been instituted in the several Courts, from 1797 (the earliest date from which there are any accurate statements) to 1813 are as follows:—

IV. JUDICIAL.

APPENDIX, No. 1.

(1.) Letter to the Bengal Government, 8 Dec. 1824.

In 1797	330,977	In 1806	251,414
1798	382,482	1807	221,404
1799	368,274	1808	249,890
1800	357,283	1809	229,091
1801	362,342	1810	199,662
1802	353,801	1811	222,528
1803	256,676	1812	186,421
1804	225,931	1813	184,790
1805	268,687

12. The Suits instituted formerly were, therefore, much more numerous than those in later years; and it is to be remarked that till the year 1805, the Ceded and Conquered Provinces were not included in the jurisdiction of the Courts.

13. The Suits decided in the several Tribunals during the period to which we have referred, were as follows:—

	1814.	1815.	1816.	1817.	1818.	1819.	1820.
Sudder Dewanny Adawlut	89	94	120	161	144	82	174

Registers	7,930	8,953	12,066	12,587	11,269	9,584	8,259
Sudder Aumeens	24,090	26,702	38,922	42,559	42,378	41,019	43,226
Moonsiffs	132,466	93,953	72,055	68,983	77,326	91,324	103,167
TOTAL	172,049	136,552	130,912	132,503	139,210	148,740	162,575

14. The Sudder Adawlut had four and occasionally five European Judges, and the six Provincial Courts had each four; there were forty-six Zillah Judges, with as many or more Registers, more than double that number of Sudder Aumeens, and perhaps about fifteen Moonsiffs on an average to each Zillah. The number of Courts, on the whole, we suppose to have been fully nine hundred.

15. In 1814 arrangements were made for the conduct of business in the Sudder Adawlut and Provincial Courts, with a view to expedite decisions, and their establishments were enlarged.

16. The average number of decisions passed by the Provincial Courts in 1815 and the five following years considerably exceeded those passed in 1814; and in the Courts of the Zillah Judges and Registers taken together, and of the Sudder Aumeens, there was a large excess, but in the Courts of the Moonsiffs there was a very great falling off.

17. In the first three years of this period the average yearly decisions of the Moonsiffs were less than in those of 1814; and in the last three years, after the alterations of 1817, they fell short of the decisions of 1814 by about 40,000; while the average yearly decisions of Zillah Judges, Registers, and Sudder Aumeens together, during the whole period, exceeded the decisions of those tribunals in 1814 by a number less than 17,000.

18. The Suits decided in former years by all the Courts were as follows:

In 1797	282,395	In 1806	244,213
1798	346,574	1807	232,625

1800	353,758	1809	230,175
1801	376,417	1810	197,092
1802	344,526	1811	212,328
1803	308,033	1812	187,876
1804	278,180	1813	187,925
1805	271,109

19. The decrease in the number of decisions may be ascribed partly to the increase of various sorts of business, which prevented the European Judges from deciding so many suits as they did formerly, but chiefly to the reduction of the number of Native tribunals under Regulation XLIX of 1803. The decrease in the business done by those Courts has been very great. In 1801 the Native Commissioners in the Lower Provinces and Benares, disposed of 352,316 suits; in 1817, after the appointment of Sudder Aumeens, and after the accession of the establishment of the Ceded and Conquered Provinces, when the number of Zillahs was increased from twenty-nine to forty-four, the number disposed of by all the Native tribunals was only 111,542, being a difference of 240,774. In the year 1799, more suits were decided by the Native Commissioners in the Zillahs (Jessore and Purneah), than were decided in 1817 by all the Natives judicatories taken together. In one of these Zillahs the suits decided by them in several years were as follows:

Suits decided by Natives in Zillah Jessore in several years:—

In 1798	65,057	In 1806	14,619
1799	73,801	1807	14,461
1800	64,979	1808	13,320
1801	43,466	1809	9,223
1802	31,074	1810	6,033
1803	34,633	1811	5,893
1804	21,802	1812	7,092
1805	16,229

20. From the variety of miscellaneous duties, and the concerns of the Criminal department, which fall into the hands of the European judicial functionaries almost exclusively, and from the difficulty which frequently occurs of making any addition to the numbers of those officers, the time devoted to the decision of Civil Suits in their Courts is necessarily short, and liable to much fluctuation; but the Native tribunals are in a very small degree subject to such interruptions, and their numbers can be increased with less difficulty, and comparatively at little expense.

21. It is unnecessary for us to repeat to you here what we have already urged on the impracticability of adding materially to the European part of the establishment.

22. As your reply to our Orders of 1814 will, of course, convey to us your sentiments on the means of rendering the Courts more effective by improving their forms, we shall defer our remarks on that subject.

23. The suits depending at the beginning of 1815, and of the subsequent years, were as follows:—

TOTAL	134,869	136,552	92,499	79,037	81,206	90,759	103,454

24. It will be seen that the increase of arrears in the Courts of the Sudder Aumeens, from 1815 to 1821, was occasioned by an increase in the number of suits admitted, and not by a decrease in the number decided; on the contrary, the decisions after 1814 became progressively more numerous. In the Courts of the European Judges the arrears were reduced chiefly by the decision of an increased number of suits. In the Courts of the Moonsiffs, during the three first years, they were reduced by a falling off in the number of suits instituted; and during the last three, by an increase in the number decided.

25. An arrear being of importance only inasmuch as it indicates a delay of justice, it is to be remarked, that in the Courts of the Sudder Aumeens, notwithstanding the increase of arrears, the delay was diminished; and that in the other Courts the delay was reduced, as well as the arrear.

26. As suits are heard in the order of their institution, the number of those decided in a given time, compared with the arrears, will show the delay that would have occurred from the institution of a suit at any of the above periods to its decision.

27. Some old suits might remain on the files beyond the period so indicated, an equal number of newly instituted ones being brought on before their regular time; these, however, form but an inconsiderable part of the great mass of suits, and the general average of delay will be found as above.

28. There has been much fluctuation in the number of suits decided at different times and in different courts, and the delay has of course varied accordingly. As an example, the following Table has been compiled, showing the number of suits decided and depending in one Zillah, with the corresponding delay, for the last nineteen years; the rate of decision being always supposed to be that of the preceding year:—

APPENDIX, No. 1.

29. The Sudder Adawlut had estimated, from an average of the decisions of three preceding years, that the delay at the beginning of 1815 will be as follows:—

(1.) Letter to the Bengal Government, 8 Dec. 1824.

	Years.	Months.
In the Sudder Adawlut	6	3
Provincial Courts, nearly	4	0
Courts of Zillah Judges, upwards of	3	0
— Registers	1	5
— Sudder Aumeens	0	11
— Moonsiffs	0	6

And the time which actually passed before numbers of suits equal to the arrears of 1815 were disposed of, was as follows:—

	Years.	Months.
In the Sudder Adawlut	3	3
Provincial Courts	3	0
Courts of Zillah Judges	3	1
— Registers	1	2
— Sudder Aumeens	0	9
— Moonsiffs	0	9

30. The delay at the beginning of 1821, taking the rate of decision to be that of the average of the three preceding years, would have been:—

	Years.	Months.
In the Sudder Adawlut	2	6
Provincial Courts	1	8
Courts of Zillah Judges	2	2
— Registers	1	2
— Sudder Aumeens	0	8½
— Moonsiffs, nearly	0	6

31. Suits are sometimes prevented from being brought to a speedy decision, by causes arising out of the circumstances of the case of the parties and their agents, or of the evidence; but the chief interruptions to which suits are liable, are those especially referable to the law, the procedure, or the judicial establishment. In all cases, considerable time is consumed in admitting the suit, preparing and conducting the trial, hearing the parties and evidence on both sides, applying the law to the fact, and at every step endeavouring to preserve the best securities for justice. In reply to our Orders of November 1814, you will advert to any causes of delay that may justly be imputable to technicalities in your system or its operation, distinguishing those causes which are avoidable, from those which cannot be removed, without admitting some greater evil than delay. We remark, that of 46,153 suits instituted in the several Zillahs of the Bareilly division, from 1811 to 1816, 1,746 (that is, a portion less than 4 per cent.) were for property above 500 Rupees, and below 5,000. Of 1,549 suits depending at Cuttack in 1821, 68 (that is, a portion little more than 4 per cent.) were for property of the like amount. We conclude that, in all the courts, the number of original suits exclusively belonging to the jurisdiction of the European tribunals, must be very small, probably not 5 per cent. We suggest for your consideration, whether it would not be advisable to direct that every Zillah Judge, when there are many suits in arrear on his file, should make a report to the Sudder Adawlut, specifying the number of appeals from the Registers and from the Sudder Aumeens, the number of original suits of an amount from 500 to 5,000 Rupees, and the number of those which, though of small pecuniary amount, are excluded from the cognizance of natives. With the exception of these cases, every every part of the arréar might be disposed of by Sudder Aumeens, if a sufficient number of qualified and trustworthy natives can be found for these offices.

32. Your Regulations have provided, that certain descriptions of suits, the speedy decision of which it was most desirable to ensure, should be disposed of, not by the regular mode of trial, but by summary process. It is to be remarked, that these suits are not included in the Tables of regular Suits before noticed; and they constitute a formidable addition to the ordinary business of the Courts. Their numbers instituted in the three last years, were as follow :—

TOTAL in Three Years					111,526*

33. But whatever addition may be made to the number of tribunals, and whatever improvements may be effected in the arrangement of the business, it is of primary importance that the proceedings of the Courts should be in conformity with law and justice.

34. We have to regret that facts which would serve to throw light on the quality of the judicature are but imperfectly known to us. The usual statements do not show the number of appeals to the Provincial Court, nor the proportion of decisions which are reversed or altered by them in appeal, nor the number of regular suits instituted with the view of procuring the reversal of the summary decisions, together with a statement of the manner in which such regular suits were decided; nor have we met with any statement of decisions by Collectors, of suits referred to them; nor are we aware of any criterion for estimating, however roughly, the degree in which appeals are prevented by law expenses and other obstacles. We desire to be furnished with information on these points, and any other which may be in your power to supply.

35. In the conduct of trials, in unravelling intricacies of particular cases, in eliciting truth from witnesses, in appreciating evidence, in applying the law to the fact, Indian Judges, unprepared by education or otherwise for the judicial office, have many peculiar difficulties to contend with. The code of regulations by which they are bound, consists almost entirely of rules of procedure; the Mahomedan and Hindoo laws are the guide for their decisions in certain cases only, and in all others not specially provided for, the Judge has no law but that of his own conscience. For propriety in the proceedings of the Courts, therefore, little security is to be found in the state of the law and of the judicial establishment.

36. It should be the constant aim of your Government to effect improvements in the legislation, by defining rights and by correcting the rules of judicial procedure; to render those who are called to administer the law competent to the execution of their duties, by affording them instruction in jurisprudence, and by raising the condition of the Native functionaries so as to give them adequate motives for good conduct; continuing without relaxation your attention to the official reports and statements of business, and taking care that the proceedings of the Courts are as public, as open to appeal, and as effectually superintended, as circumstances will permit.

We are, &c.

(2.)—COPY of a LETTER from the Court of Directors to the Bengal Government, dated the 23d July 1828.

(2.) Letter to the Bengal Government, 23 July 1828.

1. Our last letter to you in this Department was dated the 2d instant,

2. We now proceed to reply to those paragraphs of your letters, dated 10th April 1823, 26th July, 14th September, and 5th October 1826, which relate to the administration of Civil Justice in the Lower and Western Provinces, in the years 1821, 1822, and 1823; and we shall refer to your Consultations for the Reports and Orders on the business of 1824, no letter from you on that subject having yet reached us.

3. The following Table shows the number of regular Civil Suits, original and appealed, which were instituted in the period above stated; also the number decided in the same time, and the number depending at the end of each year, in the several Courts :—

4. The arrear of undecided suits, therefore, was progressively increasing.

5. A comparison of the two first columns of the above Statement with a corresponding account for the four preceding years, gives the following result:—

6. It appears, therefore, that in the latter period there has been generally an increase in the number of suits instituted, and a decrease in the number decided; except that in the Zillah Courts (including the Courts of the Zillah Judges, Registers, and Sudder Ameens) there was a small decrease in the number instituted, and in the Courts of the Moonsiffs a considerable increase in the number decided. It is to be remarked, however, that the excess of the number instituted, above that of the number decided, was much greater in the second period than in the first, both in the Zillah Courts in those of the Moonsiffs.

7. Within the last four years various means were adopted to provide for an increase of business. In the Sudder Adawlut, and in one of the Provincial Courts, additional Judges were appointed, the number of joint magistrates was increased, the office of magistrate was in several districts separated from that of the Judge, the powers of Moonsiffs and Sudder Ameens were enlarged, and the assistance of the Collectors were extensively afforded in the disposal of summary suits; but the want of European officers was so great, that in the year 1821 no less than twenty-four Zillahs were without Registers during the whole or a part of the year; and in May 1823 twenty-two Zillahs were without them. Adverting to this circumstance, to the number of suits, and to the pressure of criminal and miscellaneous business before the Courts, it is plain that, in the period under review, the Judicial Administration was very inadequate to the wants of the country.

8. In the Resolutions of Government, dated the 1st May 1823, it is recorded, that the urgent demands of the public service in other branches of the administration rendered it impracticable to augment the number of European officers employed in the judicial department; but it does not seem to us that this embarrassment furnished any good reason for neglecting the arrear. Such expedients as the nature of the case admitted should have been resorted to, and they should have been applied without delay.

9. We observe that the annual Reports of the Sudder Adawlut for 1821, 1822, 1823, 1824, were not forwarded to Government in December 1822, October 1823, December 1824, and September 1825; and that Orders were not passed on them till May 1823, December

(2.) Letter to the
ment, 23 July 1828.

December 1823, March 1825, and January 1826, respectively. It was not until the 10th December 1824, that the Sudder Adawlut recommended the temporary appointment of a fifth Judge to the Calcutta Provincial Court; but it is recorded on the Resolutions of Government, dated 10th March 1825, that, relying on the increased exertions of the Judges of that Court, the Governor-General in Council did not think it necessary to appoint a fifth Judge, although the measure would doubtless be desirable if the state of the Civil Service would conveniently admit of it. When we advert to the state of the file of that Court, on which there were many suits of several years standing, to the steps taken for enabling the Judges and Magistrates to devote more time to their principal duties, and especially to the separation of the offices of Judge and Magistrate in four Zillahs of the division, by which the business of the Provincial Court might have been expected to increase materially, we cannot but think that some measures for reducing the arrear and preventing its further accumulation were most urgently required. It was not, however, till the 12th January 1826, when the arrear had greatly increased, that the Government resolved, on a suggestion of the Chief Secretary, to appoint a fifth Judge. The business of the Court had been for some years progressively increasing, as the following Statement, including regular Suits, original and appealed, will show:

YEARS.	Suits Instituted.	Suits Decided.	Suits Depending at the End of the Year.	Delay, according to the rate of Decision in the preceding Year.	Delay, according to the Average of the Four Years.
1821	292	230	628	2½ years	4 years.
1822	283	186	725	3 years 10 months	4 years 7 month.
1823	217	138	804	5 years 10 ditto ..	5 years 1 ditto.
1824	261	73	992	13½ years	6 years 4 ditto.

10. In November 1825, the arrear had increased to 1,038, exclusive of summary suits.

11. We are not aware that in 1825, or even at an earlier period, there was any greater difficulty in providing a relief for the Provincial Court than in 1826. If, for the temporary assistance of that Court, it was impracticable to detach a Zillah Judge from a district where there was a Register who could supply his place, a part, or, if necessary, the whole of the original jurisdiction in civil suits might have been taken away from the Provincial Court, and transferred to the Zillah Judges, Registers, and Sudder Ameens; and as many additional Sudder Ameens as necessary might have been appointed. Objections might perhaps have been raised to any of these measures, but, at all events, something should have been done to remedy the evil.

12. In all the other Provincial Courts, except that of Moorshedabad, the state of the file very much increased. In the Dacca Court, from the year 1821 to 1824, the number of suits decided generally fell short of the number instituted; at the beginning of the period the arrear was 117, at the end it was 167, and was increasing. In the Patna Court, in 1823 and 1824, fewer were decided than instituted; the arrear had increased from 419 to 512, and was increasing. In the Benares Court, from 1817 to 1824, fewer were decided than instituted, except in the year 1822; the arrear at the beginning of the period was 1,100, and at the end of it, 1,300, and was increasing. In the Bareilly Court, from 1818 to 1824, fewer were decided than instituted, except in 1821; the arrear had increased from 1,100 to 1,300, and was increasing.

13. We

13. We remark that you have appointed temporarily a fifth Judge to the Benares Court; a measure by which the arrear will, we hope, be soon reduced.

14. In the Zillah of the Jungle Mehals, the arrears has for several years been progressively increasing, as follows: The regular suits depending at the end of each year, were 1818.	1819.	1820.	1821.	1822.	1823.	1824.	1825.

And the summary Suits depending, } were	39	57	223	380	723	1,041	1,112	1,597

15. The separation of the offices of Judge and Magistrate in this district, which had been resolved on in June 1823, and was expected to secure a material diminution of the arrear, took effect in September 1823. The number of depending suits continued, nevertheless, to increase. On the date last mentioned, there were 1,899 regular and summary suits before the Judge; and in October 1825 they amounted to 3,023.

16. The accumulation of business was stated in the Governor-General's Minute of the 12th June 1823, to have been chiefly in consequence of the Revenue and Judicial functions having frequently and for considerable periods devolved on one individual; and in the Reports of the Sudder Adawlut, reference is made to the absence of the Judge or Register from the station, and to their being engaged in other duties. From these causes, the number of decisions was certainly much less than it would otherwise have been.

17. But, before it is assumed that an accumulation of suits cannot be prevented, or heavy arrear reduced, without an increase of the European establishments, the nature of the suits depending, and those instituted in a given time, should be distinctly detailed. It is only by an analysis of the arrear, that we can know whether, under the existing regulations, it might be reduced by one or more Sudder Ameens, or whether the employment of Europeans is indispensable. If the Returns required under the Resolutions of Government dated 28th June 1815, and the Circular Orders of the Sudder Adawlut dated 14th September of the same year, were regularly furnished, the necessary information must have been before the Sudder Adawlut; and it might have been easily shown how far the means actually provided for the decision of the different classes of suits were applied advantageously; and the nature and extent of the means best calculated to dispose of the arrear might have been accurately determined.

18. Of 4,106 summary suits decided by the Judge and Register in the Jungle Mehals, from 1821 to 1824, 3,475, which were for land-rent, might, under the Regulations, have been referred to the Collector. Appeals from the Moonsiffs, of which 317 were depending before the Judge at the end of 1824, might have been referred to Sudder Ameens. Appeals from Sudder Ameens, amounting at the same period to 603, might have been referred to a Register with special powers. Original suits not exceeding 500 rupees value might have been referred to Sudder Ameens, and those above that sum to Registers with special powers. We know not how many original suits of these two classes were depending; or whether any of them were so referred; but a great part of the Register's arrear may have been within the jurisdiction of the Sudder Ameens, and that of the Judge within the jurisdiction of the Register. It is of course desirable that, when circumstances will permit, a certain number of appeals from the Moonsiffs should be retained on the file of the Judge or Register; but, when the arrear is great, they should be disposed of as the Regulations direct, with as little delay of justice as possible.

19. It

19. It may not always be practicable to provide as many Registers, with or without special powers, as are required; but the number of Sudder Ameens may be increased at any time; and we trust that by a prompt and careful distribution of the business, and the appointment of a sufficient number of Sudder Ameens, the ordinary judicial duties of most Zillahs may be adequately performed, notwithstanding casual interruptions. At all events, we expect a sufficient explanation in every instance where such measures are stated to have been found insufficient.

20. In this respect, however, the Orders and Reports on the business of the Jungle Mehals appear to us to be remarkably defective. On one occasion, the Sudder Adawlut suggested that a Sudder Ameen might have special powers; and on another, that a Register might have special powers, if necessary; but a reference to the actual state of the business would have shown precisely the extent to which such nominations were required. These measures having been suggested for a specific purpose, and that purpose not having been effected, the succeeding Reports should have conveyed some intimation whether they were or were not adopted, or some explanation for their being unsuccessful. But the subject is no further noticed, either by the Sudder Adawlut or by the Government. In three successive years the Sudder Adawlut suggest that the aid of the collector may be had for disposing of summary suits; yet in no subsequent Report or Order is there any notice of the same suggestion having been made before, although it certainly had not been complied with.

21. No use seems to be made of the monthly Reports of suits, decided and depending, at the end of each month, which are laid before Government; they are prepared very irregularly, and on one occasion we have seen eight Reports received together; they are sent up without any remarks from the Sudder Adawlut, and a letter accompanies them, always in the same words. The orders passed on them by Government are invariably the same; viz. "The Governor-General in Council observes, that the foregoing letter does not require any orders." If these documents are intended merely for record, the yearly Reports, we should suppose, would answer the same purpose.

22. Our remarks in reference to the arrears of the Jungle Mehals being applicable, in a considerable degree, to those of other districts, we think it unnecessary to enter upon further details on the subject; we cannot, however, pass wholly unnoticed the immense number of appeals from Sudder Ameens on the file at Burdwan, amounting at the end of 1824 to 2,206, which is nearly as great as that of all the other Zillahs of the division taken together. In most of those districts the arrears of the appeals are moderate; in one of them, the suburbs of Calcutta, they were, for the last four years, from forty to below seventy. We cannot account for so great an accumulation at Burdwan, unless on a supposition that they have not been sufficiently attended to for many years.

23. When, as has frequently occurred in the period under review, districts are left for a considerable time with only one European judicial officer, and even that officer not always devoted to judicial duties exclusively, every effort must be made to keep down the business by the course above pointed out; but when those means are found insufficient, it becomes indispensably necessary to extend the agency of natives. We are of opinion, therefore, that the Regulations should authorize the occasional appointment of Sudder Ameens of a superior class, whose jurisdiction might generally correspond with that now belonging to the Sudder Ameens, with special powers, that is to say, they should be allowed to decide all original suits under 500 to 5,000 rupees value, and appeals from Sudder Ameens of an inferior class. We shall not, at present, enter into an examination of the objections you have urged against giving Sudder Ameens authority to dispose of all civil suits in the first instance; but when we consider the extent to which those officers are now trusted, and, as we understand, very deservedly trusted; when we advert to the securities which are provided for the due performance of their duties, and to the opinion you have expressed as to the expediency of enlarging their powers, we cannot but think, that in order to prevent the great evil of delay of justice, the measures we have suggested might with perfect propriety priety be resorted to on any occasion, when the want of agency of that description came to be seriously felt.

24. Thus a great increase of judicial business in the Zillah Courts might be provided for; and we conceive that if the Zillah Courts generally were kept clean of arrears, there would be no difficulty in affording the services of a Zillah Judge for occasional relief of a Provincial Court. We suggest, for your consideration, whether it may not be expedient to limit the original judicature of the Provincial Courts, or to take it away entirely, leaving them as they were formerly, mere courts of appeal; an arrangement which we apprehend would afford them great relief, without adding to the Zillah Courts more than could be amply compensated by extending the power of the Sudder Ameer.

25. In addition to the regular Suits, the number of summary Suits instituted and decided in the Zillah Courts, from 1821 to 1824 inclusive, and depending at the end of each year, was as follows:—

YEARS.	Instituted.	Decided.	Pending.
1821	49,790	39,191	25,436
1822	53,336	39,566	30,150
1823	42,977	39,230	27,681
1824	44,730	42,397	21,902

26. It will be seen that about two-thirds of these are for land-rent; the rest are for dis-possession, and miscellaneous suits.

27. We observe that in the decision of summary suits before the Provincial Courts, and in those for dis-possession before the Zillah Courts, the delay is very considerable.

28. Adverting to the immense number of these cases decided in the Zillah Courts, and to the large proportion of them which in some instances have been dismissed for default, we think it necessary that you should require the Sudder Adawlut to pay particular attention to the manner in which summary suits are disposed of.

29. Questions of land-rent may, in the first instance, be the subject of a summary or of a regular suit, at the option of the plaintiff. After the determination of the summary suit, the same cause may be again tried as a regular suit, from the decision of which there is also an appeal. The disadvantage of this course is, that it subjects parties to three sets of law proceedings instead of two; and that the summary process being ill-defined, is necessarily arbitrary. The great benefit expected from it is that of speedy decision; but the investigation may have been superficial, and the only purpose of the subsequent regular suit and appeal is to correct the presumed errors of the summary suit. It is evident, therefore, that if the regular Judicature were as expeditious as the summary, the latter would be superfluous.

30. The following Tables show the number of summary Suits for land-rent which were disposed of by the Judges and Registers, and by the Collectors, from 1821 to 1824; the number depending before them at the end of each year, and the average rate of deciding in the preceding year:—

BEFORE THE JUDGES AND REGISTERS.				BEFORE THE COLLECTORS.
YEARS.	Decided.	Depending at the end of the Year.	Delay.	Adjusted or Decided.	Depending.	Delay.
1821	20,508	16,754	9 months.	4,673	3,810	Near 10 months.
1822	23,727	20,703	9 months.	6,496	6,370	Near 12 months.
1823	25,269	18,669	Not 9 months.	7,406	5,180	Near 8 months.
1824	27,082	14,052	Not 6½ months.	8,211	5,081	About 7 months.

(2.) Letter to the Bengal Government, 23 July 1828

31. The delay here exhibited is much less than that in the regular Courts of the Judge and Register, but it is as great as that in the Courts of the Sudder Ameens, and is considerably greater than that in the Moonsiffs' Courts, which, for the last four years, has been less than six months. We suppose that a very large proportion of suits for land-rent must be cognizable by Moonsiffs; and we conclude that if the summary jurisdiction in these cases were abolished, and some provision made for the speedy trial of such of them as cannot be brought into the Moonsiffs' Courts, there would be less delay of justice than under the present system; and that a part of the time of the Judges and Registers, which is now employed on the trial of many thousands of summary suits annually, would be rendered available for other duties.

32. We remark that you did not expect Regulation 14, of 1824, by which Collectors are empowered to decide summary suits for land-rent, would extend any very effectual assistance to the Judicial authorities; but you resolved to postpone, until the operation of that Regulation should have been seen, the consideration of a proposal that had been made to empower Sudder Ameens to dispose of summary suits. Whatever may be the force of the objections urged against transferring the cognizance of summary suits to Sudder Ameens, the propriety of referring to them regular suits substituted for summary, would not, we conclude, be questioned. Such cases may now be referred to them; and indeed it would be inconsistent to suppose that a Sudder Ameen cannot safely be trusted to decide a question of rent, although he may be trusted to determine the right of property in the land out of which it proceeds, the securities for the due performance of his judicial functions being precisely the same in both cases. The Regulations require Judges to encourage parties to institute regular suits for land-rent before Moonsiffs, rather than summary suits in the Zillah Courts; thus recognizing as a principle, that it is better for the parties to dispense with the summary suits. But if such suits are indeed injurious to those immediately concerned in them, as they are certainly most inconvenient to the public service, it is difficult to understand why they should not be abolished.

33. We therefore, that you will take into consideration the expediency of abolishing the summary suits for land-rent; observing, however, that the regular process shall not be rendered more tedious, or in any way more vexatious, than that for which it is substituted.

34. Upon the proceedings which led to the passing of Regulation 2 of 1825, we think it necessary to make a few remarks.

35. In our letter of the 9th November 1814, we conveyed to you our sentiments on the inconveniences resulting from the admission of too great latitude of appeal; and we learned from a Report made to your Government by the Sudder Adawlut on the 9th of March 1818, that these sentiments had met your concurrence; our suggestion for a more strict limitation of of Appeals having been anticipated by the provisions for regular and special appeals contained in certain Regulations of the year 1814.

36. We observe, however, that in the year 1819 you very unadvisedly, as experience has shown, thought proper to suggest to the Sudder Adawlut, an extension of the Rules for the admission of special appeals; and having obtained their concurrence, you passed a Regulation for that purpose, by which the previously existing Rules limiting to certain specific grounds the admission of special appeals, were done away, and an unlimited opening was afforded for the presentation of petitions.

37. The consequences proved such as might have been easily foreseen; a dissatisfied party in a suit had only to present a petition, alleging a failure of justice; the time of the Judges was occupied in the consideration of multitudes of these petitions, and the evils of an accumulation of undecided causes in the Superior Courts were greatly aggravated.

38. In this state of things, your reverting to the rules previously in force, or adopting some other remedy, was a matter of obvious expediency.

39. We by no means consider an unlimited use of the right of appeal to be of any real benefit to the community: it necessarily tends to keep alive the spirit of litigation by encouraging suitors to look to the decision of another tribunal than that before which the suits are originally tried.

40. On the other hand, a party fairly desirous of having a decision against him revised by a superior Tribunal, should not be obstructed in obtaining it; but with regard to second or special appeals, we think that it is only upon very strong and specific grounds, and under certain responsibilities, that he ought to be entitled to claim a further protraction of the litigation.

41. We therefore approve generally of the provisions of Regulation 2 of 1825.

42. We observe the Reports of the Superintendent and Remembrancer of Legal Affairs on the state of the government business in the several courts, for the period under review, do not call for any particular remark. They are, on the whole, satisfactory.

43. We desire you will no longer neglect to furnish us with complete printed copies of the Circular Orders of the Sudder Dewanny and Nizamut Adawluts; and we direct you to send copies to the Governments of Madras and Bombay, for the use of the Judicial Establishment at those Presidencies.

3. In the Lower Provinces, therefore, there was in the last two years, as compared with the two preceding, an increase under the heads "Simple Decoity," "Predatory Offences (not Decoity) with wounding," "Homicide, not amounting to murder," and in "Affrays with loss of life;" and under the other heads a decrease. In the Western Provinces there was an increase under the heads "Decoity, with murder," "Wilful Murder," "Homicide," and "Affrays with loss of life," and a decrease under the others.

4. The inequalities in the amount of crimes were generally much more considerable in the Western than in the Lower Provinces. In the former, for example, there was an increase of 149 under the heads "Wilful Murder," "Homicide," and "Affrays, with loss of life," and a decrease of 233 under the several heads of "Decoity," and of "Depredations with murder and wounding," and of "Murder by Thugs;" while in the latter there was a decrease of five under the first of these two classes of crimes, and of two under the second.

5. On the whole, a comparison of the frequency of crimes during the two periods in both divisions, shows rather an improvement than a falling off; and the Reports for 1827 and 1828 do not appear to call for any particular remarks.

6. With these Reports the functions of the Superintendents of Police, who were appointed in 1806 and 1810, have ceased, and those of the Courts of Circuit are no longer to be performed performed on the principles established in 1793; the duties of Superintendents of Police and of Circuit Judges being now united with other duties in the persons appointed under Regulation I. of 1829, as Commissioners of Revenue and Circuit.

7. It would have been satisfactory to us to have received from you, on this occasion, an account of the apparent effects produced on the country by these institutions; but no remarks on the subject have been recorded by your Government, although they seem to have been called for by the following passage at the conclusion of the Report of the Superintendent of the Western Provinces: "I held the office of Superintendent in the Western Provinces for ten years, and have the satisfaction of leaving the police in a very different state to that in which I found it; an improvement to be attributed to the active exertions of the magistrates, supported and encouraged by the Government through my late office. I hope the present system will succeed as well, but I doubt it much, for many superintendents, with each a system, are not so good as one." We shall not here enter upon a discussion of the probable effects which this change may tend to produce on the whole judicial administration of the provinces; but it is obvious that the personal superintendence, by one man, of the police of twenty millions in the one case, and of forty millions in the other, cannot have been as immediate and effective as we may reasonably expect that of the Commissioners of Revenue and Circuit to be, each of whom will have on the average the control of the police of about three millions; and we hope that their number may have no other effect than that of giving the desire, as it does the means, of rivalling each other in the good order of their respective districts.

8. In the Lower Provinces, the great reduction of decoity which was effected within the period in question, is an event too remarkable to be passed over in this place without particular notice.

9. In 1772, the Committee of Circuit, proposing to remove the chief seat of the revenue administration from Moorshedabad to Calcutta, said, "We omitted to mention the insecurity of the public Treasury and the public Records at Moorshedabad, an open, straggling town, which a few desperate decoits might enter with ease, and plunder at discretion, before any force could be called to repel them. An event of this kind is not the less probable from its not having yet come to pass. The town of Calcutta is not only sheltered against such dangers, but the Fort offers a most complete security, both for public and private property, under all circumstances."

10. In 1802, decoity was spoken of by the Dacca Court of Circuit as follows: "Gang robbery, often aggravated by cruelty and sometimes by murder, though not carried near to the height it was ten years ago, seems still to be the crime most prevalent in this division. It is alleged that the opulent landholders in this division formerly retained great numbers of armed men, not only for the purpose of repelling the attacks of their hostile neighbours, but also to enforce payment of the rents of their estates from their under farmers and tenants; and that when the services of these armed bands became no longer necessary, from the increased security and protection which the laws afforded to persons of all descriptions under the British Government, they were paid off. Many of them from the Upper Provinces, as well as natives of Bengal, pressed by want on one hand, and allured by the hope of plunder on the other, as well as impelled by habits natural to their former course of life (a life of violence, plunder, and oppression), betook themselves to robbery, by which, and by occasionally hiring themselves to the Zemindars, to fight their battles for disputed crops and boundaries, they earn a precarious maintenance. Adverting to this state of things, at a period not long antecedent to the year 1793, it is no matter of astonishment to us that this terrible crime against the peace of society, called 'decoity or gang robbery,' should have gained the head it once had done, or having gained that head, it should still, though greatly lessened, remain to be subdued. It is in our knowledge that whole families have practised robbery from one generation to another; and so depraved and regardless are they of the most common distinction between good and evil, that they do not even consider robbery as a crime," &c.

11. In 1812 the evil of decoity in Bengal was particularly noticed in the Fifth Report of the Committee of the House of Commons. The Committee referred to a Despatch from Bengal, dated in 1810, in which it was stated, that the commission of robberies and murders, and the most atrocious deliberate cruelties, was established; that these offences were not of rare occurrence, or confined to particular districts; they were committed, with few exceptions, and with slight modifications of atrocity, in every part of Bengal. The Committee adverted to the endeavours of the Government from 1801 to 1807, to suppress decoity, and they remarked:—"But notwithstanding these measures, the disorders which they were intended to subdue still increased, and towards the end of 1807 had acquired such a degree of strength, as to oblige the Government to resort to measures much more forcible than had hitherto been tried for the deliverance of the country from this growing and intolerable evil." The Committee afterwards, referring especially to the new institution of Superintendent of Police, conclude as follows: "What has appeared in the latest intelligence on this subject, affords assurance, that after about two years' experience of the efficacy of the new measures, decoity or gang robbery had met with a check, and had been reported by some of the Circuit Judges to have happened less frequently in most, and to have ceased in some, of the Bengal districts, where antecedently it had prevailed in the greatest degree. It is earnestly to be hoped that these assurances may be confirmed by experience."

(3.) Letter to the Bengal Government, 30 March 1831.

12. The following Statement will show that those assurances have been confirmed:—

YEARLY AVERAGE NUMBER OF DECOITIES :

From 1803 to 1807 inclusive	1,481
From 1808 to 1812	927
From 1813 to 1817	339
From 1818 to 1822	263
1828	167

13. On the Superintendents of Police and the Courts of Circuit, the extent to which crimes have prevailed must in a very great degree have depended; for to them, and to the officers under them, belonged the administration of by far the most material part of the criminal law, and all the police. To those functionaries, and to the Nizamut Adawlut and the Government, under whose superintending authority and support they acted, may therefore be attributed the credit of at least checking that dreadful scourge, which had heretofore afflicted the country for so long a course of years, in spite of the exertions of former Governments.

14. The Report of the Superintendent of Police for 1818, from which the three first numbers in the foregoing statement are taken, shows also a great and progressive reduction in the number of murders and of violent affrays, attended with murder or homicide.

15. The periodical reports of the Superintendents of Police, compiled from Returns made by the magistrates, who received their information from the police darogahs, and such other sources as were available to them, show, with as much accuracy as could reasonably be expected, the number of crimes ascertained to have been committed in each district in every year. On these Reports the proceedings of the Courts of Circuit have formed a useful check; and every endeavour has been made to obtain the best information of the actual number of crimes, and to arrange them in the statements as correctly as circumstances would permit. It must however sometimes happen, that in particular districts crimes are committed which do not come to the knowledge of the magistrate; nor is it always practicable to refer every reported offence to its proper head. Instances of the concealment of crimes have been occasionally noticed in your Letters, and have been animadverted on by us. Many years ago, such instances were of frequent occurrence, and it was by some accident only, after a long interval, that the fact was discovered; but it is probable that that for a considerable time not many of the most atrocious crimes, such as murders and homicides, depredations attended with open violence, and affrays with loss of lives, have been perpetrated, which have not been included in the statements of the superintendents. In regard to crimes of inferior atrocity, little reliance can be placed on the statements. It is doubtless in every district numberless petty offences are committed, which are never taken of beyond the immediate neighbourhood of the place where they occur. Desiring to confine ourselves to those accounts which afford results least likely to be deceptive, we shall, in the following remarks, refer to no Reports before those in 1818; in which year a change was made in the forms of the superintendents' statements, and some of the crimes were classed on an improved plan.

16. In the Lower Provinces, the number of the principal heinous crimes ascertained to have been committed from 1818 to 1828 was, according to the statements of the superintendent, as follows:—

20. Decoity, the great crime of the Lower Provinces, is comparatively infrequent in the Western Provinces; but many offences which would be called decoity in the Lower Provinces may have been classed under different heads in the Western; and it appears that, taking the whole of the depredations attended with personal violence, the numbers in the Western Provinces greatly exceed those of the Lower; the former amounting, in eleven years, to 4,670, and the latter to 2,949. Distinguishing the aggravated cases of decoity, (that is to say, the cases attended with murder or torture, or wounding,) from the unaggravated, we shall find a much larger proportion of the aggravated, compared with the unaggravated, in the Western than in the Lower Provinces. The numbers were,—

21. Separating the offences reported to have been committed in the four Zillahs which constituted the Benares district, viz. Benares, Mirzapore, Juanpore, and Ghazee-pore, from those in the remaining parts of the Western Provinces, called the Ceded and Conquered Provinces, the following numbers will be found:—

(3.) Letter to the Bengal Government, 30 March

Homicide, not amounting to murder ..	160	692	49	136
Affray, with loss of life	114	486	20	98

The Yearly Averages of these numbers in the two periods being as follows:—

	Benares Zillahs.		Ceded and Conquered Provinces.
	1st Period.	2d Period.	1st Period.	2d Period.
Depredations, with murder	16 $\frac{2}{3}$	15	109 $\frac{3}{8}$	120 $\frac{1}{2}$
Ditto .. with torture or wounding ..	12 $\frac{1}{2}$	5 $\frac{1}{2}$	276 $\frac{8}{9}$	250 $\frac{1}{2}$

Affrays, with loss of life	12 $\frac{6}{9}$	10	54	49

22. From these numbers alone the comparative prevalence of crime in the different divisions of the country cannot be known; it is necessary to consider also the extent of their population. The Lower Provinces are supposed to contain forty millions of people, the Western may be estimated to contain about half as many; and of these the Benares Zillahs may have about five, and the Ceded and Conquered Provinces fifteen millions. On this supposition, the crimes reported from the Lower Provinces arose from a population eight times as great as that of Benares, and two and two-third times as great as that of the Ceded and Conquered Provinces.

23. To reduce those numbers, therefore, to the standard of the Lower Provinces, those of the Benares Zillahs must be multiplied by eight, and those of the Ceded and Conquered Provinces by two and two-thirds. The result will show the comparative prevalence of crime in each division in proportion to its population.

24. In the following Table are given, first, the number of crimes, arranged as before, ascertained to have been committed in each of the three Divisions, in eleven years ending with 1828; and second, the numbers, calculated as above, for Benares and the Ceded and Conquered Provinces, showing what, according to the existing rates, they would have amounted amounted to if the population of those Divisions had been equal to that of the Lower Provinces:—

	TOTAL OFFENCES in Eleven Years.			RATE of CRIME in proportion to the Population, reduced to the Standard of the Lower Provinces.
	Lower Provinces.	Benares. Zillahs.	Ceded and Conquered Provinces.	Benares Zillahs.	Ceded and Conquered Provinces.
Depredations, with murder	536	176	1,135	1,408	3,026
Ditto .. with torture or wounding ..	1,016	126	2,993	1,008	7,981
Ditto .. with open violence, but without personal injury	1,507	77	153	616	408
Murder, without depredation	1,285	145	1,292	1,160	3,447

Affrays, with loss of life	295	134	584	1,072	1,557

25. These calculations have no pretention to strict accuracy; but undoubtedly they approach to the truth. It is plain that the fluctuations in the prevalence of the most heinous crimes in the districts, and during the period here referred to, have not been such as to indicate any material unsteadiness in the execution of the laws, or sudden changes in the condition of the people; and that on the whole there has been an improvement. From these results, and from the check given to decoity and other crimes in the Lower Provinces, as above noticed, we must infer that the operation of the system, of which the institutions of Superintendents of Police and Courts of Circuit formed so important a part, was beneficial by preventing crime. We hope the new system may be found equally efficient.

26. It is also plain, that in the Ceded and Conquered Provinces the crimes referred to are very much more prevalent than in the Lower Provinces; and that in Benares they are in a middle state between those in the other two divisions.

27. In the Ceded and Conquered Provinces, depredations, with murder and wounding, were above six times more prevalent than in the Lower Provinces; affrays, with loss of life, above five times; and murder and homicide (without depredations), about two or three times. It is of importance to discover the causes of this great disparity. For the suppression of crime in all the provinces, the exertions of the local magistrates, and of their subordinates, of the Superintendents of Police, and of the Judges of Circuit, of the Nizamut Adawlut, and of the Government, were, no doubt, applied with equal zeal and equal ability. These functionaries were throughout either the identical individuals, or persons taken from the same classes of men, with the same means at their disposal; they administered the same laws, were bound by the same rules, and were probably actuated for the most part by the same principles, and the same general spirit and character. How then has it happened that the effects which they have produced in these countries are so different? The countries are, in some respects, obviously in different circumstances. They have not been equally long under our government; they are not equally distant from the supreme controlling and directing authority; they are not equally exposed to suffer from the neighbourhood of foreign ill-governed states; and their national character is not the same. One main point in which they differ is their revenue administration. How far that difference may assist in producing the effects to which we have alluded, we

we have not the means of knowing; but at all events, that is a branch of the subject involving too many considerations to be treated of incidentally, and in this department.

28. An assumption is sometimes made, and practical inferences drawn from it, that the people of the Ceded and Conquered Provinces are better off, and less criminal, than those in the Lower Provinces; but the facts to which we have adverted would seem to be irreconcilable with any such notion, and should not be overlooked.

(3.) Letter to the Bengal
Government,
30th March 1831.

29. There remain to be noticed the proceedings of the criminal courts, showing the number of persons convicted, the offences of which they were convicted, and the sentences passed, in the Lower and Western Provinces during several years. The documents furnished in your Letter, dated 5th February 1829, consisting of statements made out at the office of the Nizamut Adawlut, were intended to supply the necessary information on these points; but as they are not uniform, and several of them are in other respects imperfect, the following Accounts which we have prepared from them are unavoidably incomplete.

30. In regard to the courts of the magistrates, the only statements to which we shall here refer, are those for 1826 and 1827, which having been framed with great care, may be taken as more accurate than the others. According to these papers, there were in that period 44,523 persons sentenced to punishment by the magistrates and their assistants, in the Lower, and 32,820 in the Western Provinces.

31. The proportion of the offences against property in these cases, was as follows:—

	Lower Provinces.	Western Provinces.
Offences against property	21,228	19,293
Other offences, chiefly against the person ..	23,295	13,527

32. The punishments inflicted are stated to have been as follows:—

	Lower Provinces.	Western Provinces.
Imprisonment for two years	2,340	1,777
Ditto .. for one year and under two years ..	1,930	2,169
Ditto .. for above six months, and under one year	64	237
Ditto .. for six months and under	20,040	14,461

— Whipping	14,704	12,606
— Hard labour	13,211	12,473
— Dismissal, or suspension from office	1,887	929

33. The number of persons sentenced to imprisonment by the Courts of Circuit in the Lower and Western Provinces, without reference to the Nizamut Adawlut, from 1816 to 1826, were as follows:

Most of these persons were sentenced also to whipping, many to hard labour, and some to banishment from one Zillah to another.

34. The crimes for which they were punished may be classed as follows:—

	1816 to 1818.	1819 to 1821.	1822 to 1824.	1825 & 1826 } 2 years.

Other offences, viz. felony and misde- meanour, not otherwise described in the statements, and perjury	454	246	336	173

35. The enactment of Regulation XII. of 1818, by which the magistrates were empowered to pass sentence in cases of burglary, theft, and receiving stolen property, not attended with aggravating circumstances, will account for the diminution in the number of trials for such offences before the Courts of Circuit. We learn from a Statement in your Letter of the 22d February 1827, that in the two years before Regulation XII. of 1818, took effect, the yearly average of cases of burglary in which sentence was passed by the Courts of Circuit was 1,099, and in the five subsequent years the yearly average was 369; and that similar results might be assumed with regard to the number of cases of persons charged with theft, and receiving stolen goods.

36. The statements of sentences passed by the Nizamut Adawlut are very carelessly made; they contain many obvious errors, and no abstract accompanies them. We desire you will call on the Nizamut Adawlut to supply a corrected copy of those documents, with a proper abstract for each year; classing the offences of punishments, as they have been classed in the abstracts for the Courts of Circuit, and distinguishing the cases of the Western Provinces from those of the Lower.

37. From these statements, we have extracted (with some trouble) the following Lists of Persons sentenced to Death, and to Transportation or Imprisonment for Life, from 1816 to 1827:—

Western Provinces	69	54	103	105	100	89	62	62	56	77	101	57

The first of these Lists refers to cases of murder, or offences attended with murder; for which alone the capital sentences were passed. The second refers to many cases of homicide, but in the first nine years chiefly to cases of gang-robbery. The remarkable decrease in the numbers for the Lower Provinces, is to be ascribed not only to the decrease of decoity, but also to the altered character of that crime; the gangs now seldom consisting of large bodies of men, as they did formerly. Moreover, since 1824, most of the trials for decoity, which till that time would have gone to the Nizamut Adawlut, were disposed of by the Courts of Circuit.

(3.) Letter to the
Bengal
Government,
30th March 1831.

*38. The mitigation of the criminal law, under Regulations XII. of 1818, and III. and XVI. of 1825, and the practice of the Nizamut Adawlut, will, we trust, be attended with the most salutary effects; and it is very satisfactory to observe, that there has been for several years a decrease in the number of capital sentences; the yearly averages of which, in periods of four years successively, will be found to have been as follows:—

	From 1816 to 1819.	From 1820 to 1823.	From 1824 to 1827.
Lower Provinces	46½	27½	26½
Western Provinces	47½	32½	33½

39. In the two last years (1826, 1827) the yearly average in the Lower Provinces was only 24½; which, supposing the number of inhabitants of those provinces to amount to forty millions, is not more than one in 1,632,653 of the population. The yearly average for the last seven years, which was 27½, gives about one in 1,472,550 of the population. The corresponding numbers for the Western Provinces, supposing these provinces to contain twenty millions of inhabitants, would be for the average of the last two years, which was 36½, one in 547,945 of the population; and for that of the last seven, which was 33½, one in 592,592.

40. The capital sentences for murder in England and Wales, the population of which may be taken at thirteen millions, amounted, according to the Parliamentary Returns, to 110 in seven years, ending with 1828. This gives a yearly average of 15½, which is about one in 828,025 of the population. In France, according to official returns, extracts of which have been published in this country, there were, in 1826, 120 capital sentences for murder; this, supposing the population to be thirty millions, is one in 250,000.

41. The total number of persons executed in England and Wales in seven years, ending with 1828, was 456; the yearly average of which is 65½. This is about one in 199,539 of the population.

42. The total number of executions in the Lower Provinces in Bengal (supposing it to be the same as the number of capital sentences) is little more than one in 1,500,000 of the population.

43. The facts above stated serve to confirm the remark contained in a former part of this despatch, as to the comparative prevalence of heinous crimes in the two great divisions of the territory under the Bengal Presidency; and they give us the gratifying assurance that, in that country, but more especially in the Lower Provinces of Bengal, the most atrocious crimes are less frequent, and criminal justice is administered with much less severity, than in the most civilized states of Europe.

44. But notwithstanding these results, it is not to be doubted that there is still ample room for improvement in the police of both divisions of the territory under your Presidency; and to this great object your attention will, we trust, not relax.

We are your affectionate friends,

3. These numbers show, that in the courts of the European judges there is a delay of justice, which urgently requires to be remedied.

4. We observe with regret, that the arrear of suits in the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut is continually increasing; and that you were not prepared to pass any definitive orders on the suggestions of the judges, although they were of opinion that it was not practicable to effect any material reduction of their business, consistently with a due regard to the necessary control and superintendence which they were required to exercise over the lower courts.

5. Adverting to the immense amount of property in litigation before your courts, and to their excessive and continually increasing business; considering also that circumstances will not admit of any addition being made to the number of your European judges, or to the funds from which the expense of the administration of justice must be defrayed; it is essential that some decisive measures should be adopted for removing those pressing evils which have been so forcibly represented to you by the judges of the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut, and especially by Mr. Ross.

6. In regard to the Sudder Court, we know not how the object in view can, consistently with present arrangements, be attained by any other course than that which Mr. Ross has suggested; namely, by extending the powers of single judges, by adding to their numbers permanently, and by appointing supernumerary judges to reduce the arrear. Mr. Ross thought, that if there were no arrear, every appeal preferred to the court would be determined in a few months from the date of its admission; that for the reduction of the present arrear, two supernumeraries were necessary; and that for the official performance of the duties of the court there must be at least six permanent judges.

7. The public finances may not admit of all these officers, being very highly paid, but the Sudder Court must nevertheless be kept in an efficient state; and it may be necessary that the allowances of some of the judges, at least, should be on a reduced scale. There are indeed objections to the appointment of such officers on low salaries, but there are still more serious objections to the delay of justice, and in this case there seems to be no other alternative. If two of the youngest judges of the Sudder Court were to be allowed each a salary not exceeding that enjoyed by a judge of an inferior Court, their prospects of promotion on the departure of a senior judge, would be still sufficient to render their situations fair objects of ambition for most of the judicial servants. Supernumerary judges might be selected from any of the inferior courts, where they could be spared with least inconvenience; and the allowances for their temporary service in the Sudder Adawlut should be no more than an adequate compensation for their additional expenses. It is not, however, our intention to prescribe to you the adoption of the specific measures to which we have referred, more especially as we have recently directed you to consider the expediency of appointing for the Western Provinces a separate officer, with powers correspondent to those now vested in the Sudder and Nizamut Adawlut; and the adoption of that measure would materially influence the consideration of every question relating to the establishment of the Sudder Adawlut at the Presidency.

8. Mr. Ross says, that the accumulation of business in the Sudder Court is not to be ascribed in any degree to defect of system or of forms of procedure. "It is impossible" (he says) "to devise a more simple and less tedious process." We are not aware that any specific improvement of the forms has been proposed, but we conclude that every useful recommendation to that effect would be most readily adopted by your government and by the court. It is chiefly to a well-contrived distribution of the business, to a well-arranged and sufficient judicial establishment, and to a proper selection of officers, that we look for a reduction of all arrears, and for the maintenance of an administration of justice adequate to the wants of the people.

9. You have stated, that the separation of the office of judge from that of magistrate, has generally answered the purpose of effecting a reduction of the files of the judges' court, but that it has not been always practicable to adhere strictly to the plan. We know not not whether, by confining the judge to the functions of the civil court, by making the registers magistrates, and by appointing natives to the office of register, this object might be attained without an increased expense; but it is of importance that in every Zillah the duties now vested in the judge and register, should be always as effectively performed as may be possible with the means at your disposal. Zillahs have been too often left without registers, owing to a deficiency, either in the qualifications or in the number of the junior civil servants; and it has happened that the whole or great part of the functions of judge, magistrate, register, and even collector, has been imposed on the judge alone. We must again press upon you the necessity of making arrangements for obviating such inconveniences. When registers cannot be appointed, Sudder Aumeens, with the full powers of registers, should be substituted for them, and the accumulation of suits in the courts of judges and registers should at all events be prevented by transferring them to tribunals where they may be decided without delay.

10. We remark, that on some occasions when arrears of civil suits have accumulated in the court of a Zillah judge, you have directed the judge to attend exclusively to the duties of the civil court, and have transferred the magistracy to the collector. Two instances of this proceeding have lately occurred in the Lower Provinces, vis. in Jessore and Beerbhoom.

11. In your Letters of 22d February 1827, and of 15th June 1830, you have assigned reasons which in your opinion appeared to militate against the general employment of collectors as magistrates in the territories under your Presidency; and we have already, in certain circumstances, sanctioned the transfer of the magistracy to the registers.

12. The question relating to the union of the functions of collector and magistrate, is one of the first importance, and ought to be decided with as little delay as possible. But it is of still greater consequence that a proper determination should be come to in regard to it; and as the measures proposed in the Report of your Finance Committee, of 12th July 1830, will of course bring the subject again under your consideration, we shall defer any further remarks till we are in possession of the result of your final deliberations upon it.

13. We are happy to observe, that there is an increase in the number of suits decided by natives. But the Sudder Aumeens are not yet sufficiently employed; and if, as you apprehend, the Zillah judges are disinclined to entrust them with the extended powers authorized to be vested in them under Regulation IV., 1827, the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut should require of those judges an explanation in every instance where it shall appear that there is on their files an accumulation of causes, which might under the Regulations be referred to a Sudder Aumeen.

14. Not knowing your intention in regard to the Provincial Courts of Appeal, and various other matters connected with civil justice, which you appear to have had in contemplation, as subsidiary to the enactments of Regulation I. of 1829, we think it unnecessary here to enter into further details on the subject of the paragraphs of your Letters now before us; expecting your promised Report in regard to your projected improvements in the administration of civil justice, and trusting that you will have paid due attention to the suggestions contained in our Letter of 23d July 1828.

(5.)—COPY of a LETTER from the Court of Directors to the Bengal Government ; dated the 1st February 1832.

IV.
APPENDIX,
No. 1.

(5.) Letter to the Bengal
Government,
1st. Feb. 1832

ANSWER to LETTERS dated 22d February 1827 and 15th June 1830.

1. WE now reply to your Letters, dated 22d February 1827 and 15th June 1830, referring to the Despatch dated 9th November 1814, in which we communicated to you our view of the principal defects of the Judicial System, and of the remedies they seemed to require.

2. It appeared to us at that time, that the existing provisions for the administration of justice under your Presidency were inadequate to their ends, and that in reference to the wants and necessities of the people, some changes were indispensably necessary.

3. Our detailed suggestions for improving the system in Bengal were much the same as those which we had proposed to the Madras Government in the despatch dated the 29th April 1814; you were required to take into consideration the revival of the practices of native governments, and the making use of the ancient institutions of the country, in the manner pointed out. It was to the extensive employment of Panchayets, heads of villages, and heads of caste, and to the transfer to the collectors of an important portion of the functions, both civil and criminal, before exercised by the judges and magistrates, that substantial improvements in the administration of justice under your Presidency were looked for.

4. Having already intimated to you our dissatisfaction at the very long delay which has occurred before we could obtain from your Government a full and distinct answer to our orders, and thinking it unnecessary to enter upon any further discussion on the causes of the delay, we proceed to a consideration of your Letters above noticed.

5. In your Letter of the 22d February 1827, after adverting to our suggestions, and the grounds on which they were recommended, you have stated the objections to which you thought some parts of them were open; you have explained the extent to which you proposed to give effect to other parts of our instructions, or to measures directed to the same ends. Admitting the justness of many of our remarks, you have stated, that there were other causes besides those assigned by us, or those which could justly be attributed to the defective system of organization of the tribunals, by which the existing mass of litigation might be accounted for. Among these were the growing confidence of the people in the general proceedings of our tribunals; the increased population; the extended cultivation; the rise in the value of landed property; the progress of internal trade; and the general prosperity of the country. The delays in the proceedings of the courts you have ascribed, in part, to the want of moral principle in the natives, and especially to their disregard for truth in giving evidence.

6. The inadequacy of our civil tribunals to meet the demand upon them, you have referred chiefly to the precipitation with which the permanent settlement was carried into effect, without previously defining, and without providing such means as would have enabled the courts to ascertain the rights of the landholders and cultivators. You expected that, in the districts where the permanent settlement had not been introduced, the rules in force would, if it were found practicable to carry them into effect in the spirit and to the extent contemplated, go far to render the administration of justice in those parts simple and efficient. It is stated by your government, that in very few of those districts were the arrears of civil suits heavy; and when they were so, the cause was clearly traceable to local defects and irregularities in the past system of revenue management; that the real pressure upon our tribunals arose from the mass of litigation connected with the rights, tenures, and interests of the occupiers of land; that it was now too late to apply an effectual remedy to an evil which might have been guarded against when the permanent settlement was made; but that it would be the anxious wish of the government to adopt such measures as might be feasible, with a view to define the rights and interests of the cultivators.

7. You

32 APPENDIX TO REPORT FROM SELECT COMMITTEE.

7. You have given it as your opinion, that the employment of potails, or heads of villages, in the way suggested by the Court, was not applicable to the circumstances of the country under your Presidency; that the Panchayet, though highly useful in regulating matters of caste and religious discipline, had long been disused as a tribunal for the settlement of claims to property; and in your opinion it was advisable to permit the natives to adhere to their customary mode of assembling a Panchayet, when they voluntarily submitted to its decision, and to restrict the interposition of the established courts to cases in which their aid might be applied for. You were, however, sensible of the absolute necessity of employing natives extensively in the administration of civil justice, and of increasing the powers of the Moonsiffs and Sudder Aumeens.

8. You have adverted to our remarks in limitation of appeals, forms of pleading, and process, vakeels, and law expenses, in regard to which such steps had been taken as were thought best suited to the ends of justice.

9. In order to facilitate the adjudication of civil suits, measures, you inform us, were adopted for the formation and preservation of an accurate record of the rights and interests of the owners and occupiers of land; and the revenue officers were vested with certain judicial powers, with a view to determine cases involving such rights, and various matters connected with the revenue.

10. After noticing the above, and other measures, which were calculated to relieve the Civil Courts from a part of their business, you have given it as your opinion, that it would be impracticable, as a general measure, to transfer the duties of magistrate to the collector, without abandoning objects essential to the interests and happiness of the community.

11. You concurred with us as to the necessity of the village establishments for the preservation of a good police, regretting the resumption of their lands, and the ill-defined and insecure state of what remained to them in the Lower Provinces; and you state that the collectors and magistrates, in the districts where the permanent settlement had not been made, were urged to maintain those institutions in an efficient manner. You have adverted to various steps taken for the improvement of the police, by modifying and extending the authority of the magistrates and of the superintendents of police, and by arranging and defining the duties of the police darogahs, and of the landholders, farmers, munduls, and village watchmen, in matters connected with police.

12. You have noticed some cases in which you thought it expedient to give the collector magisterial powers; in some instances to vest the jurisdiction of civil judge and of a collector of revenue in the same officer; and occasionally to separate the office of magistrate from that of Zillah judge.

13. You were of opinion, however, that in every Zillah the business might be conveniently distributed among the judge, the collector, and the magistrate, as separate officers. We shall again refer to this subject, in a subsequent part of the present despatch.

14. In regard to the cognizance of petty offences, you were of opinion that sufficient provision was made by the power vested in the magistrates, to refer such offences for trial to the law officers and Sudder Aumeens, and that it was not desirable to establish numerous tribunals throughout the country for the reception and trial of complaints of that description.

15. You have pointed out various rules recently enacted for improving the administration of criminal justice; petty thefts and misdemeanours having been made cognizable by the Sudder Aumeens, numerous cases, formerly cognizable by the Court of Circuit only, having been made over to the magistrates, and many classes of cases which were before referrible to the Nizamut Adawlut, having been subjected to the final sentence of the Court of Circuit. You have stated, that the higher European tribunals having been thus relieved, the administration of criminal justice was rendered more prompt and efficient;

cient; prosecutors and witnesses in numerous cases were relieved from a double attendance at the Zillah Court; that the improved state of the police had enabled Government to mitigate and define the extent of the penalties annexed to many heinous crimes; that every precaution had been taken to prevent abuses of power on the part of the police officers, and to secure the impartial investigation of charges, and the humane treatment of prisoners; that the chief defects of the Mahomedan law had been corrected, and that the administration of criminal justice in all its branches was superintended with a degree of vigilance which precluded the hazard of serious errors and irregularities being long continued without detection.

16. You have remarked, that the habitual disregard for truth which pervades the bulk of the native community, was the great cause of failure in the administration of civil and criminal justice, and that the evil could not be effectually remedied until the inhabitants had undergone a great moral regeneration.

17. The country subjected to the Code of Regulations is described as consisting of forty-seven districts, each containing on an average more than a million of inhabitants; the area of a district being about 5,000 square miles, and the extreme length and breadth of several of the largest districts being about 158 miles by 100. The inconvenience formerly resulting from the extent and population of several of the largest districts, had been remedied by stationing a register or sub-collector, with powers of a joint magistrate, and with local jurisdiction over a portion of the district remote from the Sudder station.

18. You have stated that, in your opinion, the natives cannot safely be intrusted with judicial authority, civil and criminal, without subjecting them to European supervision and control, and that the administration of civil justice has been impeded by the paucity of officers employed; that the difficulty of supplying competent persons to fill the highest situations increases every day; and that to secure the efficiency of the civil administration a proper selection on the first admission of individuals into the service should be attended to. You add, that unless admission to the service in the first instance is made the reward of talents, industry, and good conduct, some of the highest offices must occasionally fall into the hands of individuals possessing very moderate qualifications.

19. You think it essential to the efficiency of the Government, that the higher classes of natives employed in the civil administration should be better qualified than at present by education and habits of business, and that they should be allowed emoluments sufficient to insure a faithful discharge of duty.

20. You have referred to numerous works of late years, compiled in the English and Native languages, under the sanction of Government, as evincing your anxiety to promote the general dissemination of a knowledge of the Regulations, and of the principles on which the administration of civil and criminal justice is conducted.

21. With the exception of a few points, which will be noticed further on, we think it unnecessary to enter upon a detailed discussion of the explanations and opinions adverted to in the foregoing summary of the principal parts of your Letter of the 22d February 1827; nor shall we here notice the various measures connected with the judicial system, which have been subsequently adopted by your government. On most of these, indeed, our sentiments have been already communicated to you.

22. Your Letter of the 15th June 1830, relating entirely to your correspondence with the Madras government, on the operation of the system introduced under that Presidency in 1818, does not require any particular notice in this place. We learn from it, however, that the beneficial effects of the agency of natives, as district Moonsiffs and Sudder Ammums, are fully acknowledged, although in other respects the Report from Madras is not satisfactory.

23. After an attentive consideration of the foregoing documents, we see no reason to regret that you suspended the execution of our suggestions in regard to the institution of village Moonshis and Punchayets; and to the transfer of the magistracy to the collectors. On the former of these two points, any further discussion is rendered unnecessary by the remarks contained in paragraphs 22 to 72 of your Letter of the 22d February 1827, and in the Report of the Madras Sudder Adawlut, referred to in your Letter of the 15th June 1830.

24. Your remarks on the suggested transfer of the magistracy to the collectors require separate notice. After adverting to the arguments opposed to this measure, on the ground of its being a very extensive innovation on a long established system, and a violation of the principle on which the civil administration of 1793 was regulated, you recapitulate the practical objections which had been most generally urged against it, and which were summed up by the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut and Nizamut Adawlut under twelve heads. We may here observe, that the duties now assigned to the collectors and to the magistrate, are very different from those vested in them in 1814, when we proposed that they should be united. The powers of each of these classes of officers have been much extended since that time, and any plan for uniting them at present must involve a consideration of the expediency of making a new distribution of authority, and of establishing new checks. Hence the question has become much more complicated than it was many years ago. Having declared yourselves decidedly adverse to any general introduction of such a plan, you inform us, that you are nevertheless of opinion, that considerations, connected with local circumstances, the character of individual officers, and the comparative pressure of business on the judicial and revenue officers, may render it expedient in particular instances to invest the collector with the powers of magistrate; and you mention several cases in which the duties of the two offices have been intrusted to one person.

25. You then refer to instances in which you had appointed separate magistrates, and you state that the practical advantages which had resulted from the experiment, had fully realized your expectations. Such an arrangement under which the Chief European officers of a Zillah would be the judge, the collector, and the magistrate, each having his separate and appropriate duties, you consider to be, more than any other, calculated to correct the most prominent defects in the management of the police, and in the administration of civil and criminal justice, and you have solicited our particular attention to the plan, earnestly wishing to see it as generally adopted as possible.

26. You state, that if this principle which you advocate, and which is supported by the recommendation of so many of your best informed public officers, should, as you earnestly hope it may, meet our sanction, you should propose to introduce it at present only in those districts where the pressure of civil and criminal business may render it more particularly necessary, and to extend it gradually, as circumstances might suggest. "We feel satisfied (you add) that under such a system, every branch of internal administration would be invigorated and improved, and that the labour of the European functionaries would, by such a distribution and division of power, be employed with infinitely more benefit to the interests of the community and to the credit of your administration, than by any other plan which could be devised, short of the multiplication of that class of officers, and of the extensive subdivision of the large districts now intrusted to them."

27. In our Despatch of the 30th April 1828, we sanctioned the appointment of separate magistrates, wherever that arrangement might be absolutely necessary for the due administration of justice, intimating to you our opinion, that, in ordinary cases, the existing establishment, with such occasional aid as might be easily provided for slight temporary emergencies, might be sufficient for the Zillah courts. Anxious as we are that the establishments for the administration of justice in the Zillahs should be put on the most approved footing, we should, if the state of the public finances permitted, authorize you to subdivide the districts, and to multiply European agency, so that there might be separate judges, magistrates, and collectors in each subdivision; but that course being at present impracticable, the alternative which you have proposed must be adopted; and

we accordingly direct, that in the existing Zillahs, the ordinary European establishment consist of a judge, a magistrate, and a collector, each having his proper functions, with the requisite assistance.

28. We do not mean to direct, peremptorily, that this arrangement be carried into effect in every Zillah (for it may happen in particular instances that the union of the offices of collector and magistrate may be expedient), but that it be considered as the general rule, all deviations from which will require a distinct explanation from you.

29. We trust that this plan will be attended with but little, if any, additional charge; for the salary of the register will be saved, and the increased receipts by sale of stamped paper (which, by the separation of the magistracy, in one district amounted to an excess of near 6,000 rupees in a year), will no doubt be considerable.

30. On the subject of the extension of native agency in the administration of justice, our sentiments are well known to you. The civil jurisdiction of the Sudder Aumeens, now extended to suits of 1,000 rupees value, includes a very large proportion of the litigation of the country; and you are aware that we have never prohibited you from enlarging their jurisdiction to any extent which you may think advisable. Their powers in criminal cases will, we presume, be, if necessary, increased; and you will have observed from the instructions contained in our Letter of the 23d July 1828, that it is our wish to extend the agency of natives to a large class of those cases now described as summary suits. In respect to the establishments of the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut and Nizamut Adawlut, our sentiments have been already made known to you.

31. The arrangements which, under Regulation I. of 1829, you have carried into effect, render it difficult for us to determine any practical plan for the improvement of the institution of circuit judges; nor are we sufficiently informed of your further intentions to enable us to give specific instructions in regard to the provincial courts.

32. Our attention has been particularly attracted to those parts of your Letter of 22d February 1827, which advert "to the precipitation with which the permanent settlement was carried into effect, without previously defining the relative rights and interests of the zemindars and other landholders, and the various classes of the cultivating population, or without providing such means as would have enabled the courts of judicature to ascertain those rights and interests, by recourse to recorded documents in those controversies which form, directly or indirectly, not only the most numerous, but often the most embarrassing of all the questions which are brought forward for adjudication;" and which describe this precipitation and its consequences as the cause, far more extensive in operation than all other causes, of the inadequacy of our civil tribunals.

33. We have no doubt that much of the pressure upon our tribunals is to be thus accounted for; and we fully recognize the importance of every measure which would serve as a remedy for the evil, by giving to parties the means of clearly understanding and satisfactorily establishing their respective rights. By the difficulties and delays, effects of the same cause, which still exist in the establishment of claims before your courts, persons deeming themselves to be injured, cannot, without extreme inconvenience, procure redress in a court of justice; whence wrong-doers are encouraged and oppression necessarily increases. Hence arise numerous complaints, and violation of rights far more extensive than the number of complaints indicate. Strongly impressed, as we have always been, with a conviction that your courts are not as practically open to suitors, and that expense, delay, and other impediments to justice, are not as much reduced as they might be, we have constantly urged you to adopt measures for improving the efficiency of your tribunals, and for rendering them more adequate to the wants and necessities of the people.

34. It appears, however, that at one time the Sudder Adawlut considered something more to be wanting than efficient tribunals of justice. In their register's Letter of the 12th June 1828, the judges of that court gave it as their opinion, "that no general change in the system could be expected in the condition of the cultivating classes, until some some general, clear, and positive rules should have been enacted, to guard them against the oppression and extortion to which, under the present system, they are necessarily exposed."

35. Upon the intimation of that opinion, you very properly desired the Sudder Adawlut to prepare and submit for your consideration such rules as to them might seem expedient, for more fully declaring and securing the rights and privileges of the Khood khoost and Cudeemee ryots, or other resident and hereditary cultivators and tenants of land, having a prescriptive right of occupancy.

36. Before any thing had been done by the Sudder Court, and despairing of their being able to suggest a satisfactory remedy, Mr. Harington was induced to submit to you the draft of a Regulation upon the subject, which you very properly referred to that court for their consideration and opinion.

37. The Sudder Adawlut were adverse to the provisions contained in the proposed Regulation; but we perceive that they were unwilling to pronounce a final opinion until they were in the possession of the sentiments of the territorial secretary and of the Board of Revenue.

38. Subsequently, however, two of the judges, Messrs. Leycester and Ross, recorded Minutes, in which they denied that the ryots could legally be considered to possess a claim to hold their lands at rates independent of the pleasure of the superior landholders.

39. It is not our intention to enter at length upon a consideration of the grounds on which Messrs. Leycester and Ross rest their opinions, because we perceive nothing which has been urged by these judges to induce us to alter the opinions which were conveyed to you in our Revenue Despatches of the 15th January 1819, the 9th May 1821, and the 10th November 1824, and because we feel assured that the Minutes of those judges will have been carefully weighed, in connexion with the fuller information which you determined to procure before you ventured to legislate upon this important and interesting subject. We highly approve of your having determined to circulate the draft prepared by Mr. Harington for the opinions of the local revenue officers; and we trust that you will be able to frame a regulation which may enable the courts of justice to determine rates of assessment on principles consistent with the declared intention of the Regulations of 1793, and with the security of all parties interested in the possession and cultivation of the soil.

40. Mr. Harington's draft having now been before you five years, we have little reason to apprehend the adoption of any hasty or ill-considered measure; but previously to passing any regulation for defining, in the way proposed, the relative rights of zemindars and ryots, we desire that it may be submitted to us for our sanction.

41. We concur with you in thinking, that in the degree in which control over the natives exercising judicial authority can be extended by the multiplication of European officers, the fair administration of justice will be secured, and the happiness and interests of the great body of the inhabitants will be promoted; but the number of Europeans employed must be limited by the state of the finances; and with respect to their qualifications, to which you very justly attach the greatest importance, you are aware that the principle of selection on the first admission of individuals into the civil service has, for a long course of years, been attended to by us with the greatest anxiety, and that an immense expense is annually incurred for their education. But this subject is full of difficulties; and we apprehend that the good conduct and efficiency of public servants in India will generally be best secured by a severe superintendence on the part of the local governments, by making advancement the reward of merit, by steadily refusing promotion to all who are unfit, and by visiting delinquency in every case with appropriate punishment.

42. The desire evinced by your government for extending a knowledge of the Regulations, and of the principles on which justice is administered, by encouraging various publications, publications, merits our fullest approbation; and we shall be gratified when circumstances will admit of your bettering the situations of the moonsiffs and police darogahs; an object acknowledged to be of the first importance for the improvement of your judicial administration.

(6.)—COPY of a LETTER from the Court of Directors to the Madras Government; dated 12th October 1831.

(6.) Letter to the Madras
Government.
12th Oct. 1831.

1. We now proceed to reply to such parts of your Letters noticed in the margin,* as relate particularly to the administration of criminal justice and the police.

2. Our remarks on the insufficiency and inaccuracy of the figured statements, referring to the administration of criminal justice and police under your Presidency, having been communicated by you to the Foujdarry Adawlut, the attention of that court was particularly directed to the subject; and, from the beginning of 1829, new forms of statements were adopted, and an improved system was established for procuring regular and well-digested reports. This change immediately produced a remarkable result. The periodical reports, which before had been satisfactory to your government, were now found to be of a very different character, and the returns for the second half of the year 1829 were much more unfavourable than those of the preceding half year. Heinous crimes appeared to be very prevalent, and many were reported to have been committed, the perpetrators of which were not discovered; the number of persons apprehended for the more serious crimes was very small in proportion to the supposed number of criminals; the persons apprehended for petty offences (especially assaults), and the persons acquitted in proportion to those apprehended, were very numerous, and there were many false and malicious complaints.

3. The Statements for 1829, contrasted with those for the three preceding years, professing to show the total number of persons apprehended, acquitted and punished by the magistrates and the district police officers, will serve to explain how very insufficient those documents, before 1829, were to supply information of the business done by the magistracy and district police.

4. The corresponding documents, referring to the business before the criminal judges, the Courts of Circuit, and the Foujdarry Adawlut, do not exhibit such remarkable differences.

38 APPENDIX TO REPORT FROM SELECT COMMITTEE.

5. In reporting on the Statements for the first half of 1829, the Foujdarry Adawlat made the following remarks: "By the first of these it appears, that the number of serious crimes committed during the six months under review, was 3,482, in which 14,959 persons are supposed to have been concerned. The most prevalent offences are housebreaking, by night, 1,051; by day, 27; thefts of considerable amount, 849; robbery by gangs, 686; by a single person, 168; maiming and wounding, 151; arson, 123; murder, 104; murder and robbery, 23; receiving stolen goods, 100; culpable homicide, 24." And, after noticing some other offences, they say, "In more than one-half of the whole, or in 1,814 cases, the offenders were altogether unknown; and in 1,856 cases, estimated to include 9,089 persons, no one party concerned had yet been apprehended. Of these, the cases of housebreaking by night were not fewer than 796, supposed to have been perpetrated by 1,671 persons; and 17 by day, by 24; 384 thefts by 1,033 persons; 410 gang robberies by 5,656 persons; and 105 robberies by single persons, supposed to have been perpetrated by 100 persons; 49 cases of arson by 161 persons; 33 cases of murder, including 115; and 15 of murder and robbery, 164 persons. The above certainly presents a very unfavourable view of the sufficiency of the existing police, especially as regards offences against property, the most injurious to individuals, and the perpetrators of which must be invariably encouraged, when the depredators on the public so generally escape detection."

6. The following extract from the Statements, show the number of some of the principal crimes ascertained to have been committed, and the number of cases in which not any of the offenders had been discovered, in the two half-years of 1829; also the number of persons charged with those crimes, who were convicted and punished by the several tribunals:—

	Crimes ascertained.			Cases in which none of the Offenders have been discovered.			Number of Persons sentenced and punished in the whole Year.
	First Half Year.	Second Half Year.	Total.	First Half Year.	Second Half Year.	Total.	By Criminal Judge.	By Court of Circuit.	By Foujdarry Adawlat.	Total.

Maiming and wounding ..	151	174	325	17	15	32	164	23	4	191

7. This indicates a great prevalence of some of the most atrocious crimes, especially of gang robbery; while the cases in which none of the offenders were discovered are very numerous, and the convictions are very few in proportion to the persons apprehended.

8. The information afforded by these Statements, however, can scarcely be considered conclusive as to the fact of crimes having increased, for however correct the statement for for 1829 may be supposed to be, those for former years are certainly otherwise, and the Statement of crimes ascertained to have been committed in the last nine half-years, which was furnished by the Foujdarry Adawlut, with their Report for the last half of 1828, is evidently too comprehensive and too vague to be of any use. But if the forms which have now been adopted are steadily continued, and proper pains are taken to have the returns prepared in every instance as correctly as possible for several years, the increase or decrease of crime in the Madras territory will be much better known than it has hitherto been.

9. The frequency of gang robbery in several of the districts is much noticed by the circuit judges, and from their description the crime seems to bear a close resemblance to that of decoity in Bengal: 686 of these robberies were ascertained to have been committed in the first half of 1829, and 824 in the second half. In these are not included robberies with murder, of which, in the two half-years there were 47; and robberies by single persons, of which there were 372.

10. We observe that, in the district of Canara, the number of cases of gang robbery ascertained to have been committed, compared with the number brought to trial before the Court of Circuit, in nine successive half-years, ending with 1828, were as follows:—

GANG ROBBERY.

220	20

11. In Malabar, in the same period, there were six commitments for gang robbery, while the number of cases ascertained (included under the heads highway robbery and robbery without murder) amounted to 55. We have referred to these two Zillahs, not because we understand gang robbery to be more frequent there than in other districts, but because the Reports of the Western Division are the only ones which supply any information on the subject. We conclude that in, reference to this point, the administration in other parts of the country does not materially differ from that in Malabar and Canara.

12. It is obvious that unless offenders are brought to trial with much more certainty than is here indicated, the administration of the criminal law will never be effective to suppress crimes.

13. We know no reason why gang robbery should not be checked as decidedly under your Presidency as it is in Bengal. The number of decoities ascertained to have been committed in the provinces of Bengal in 1828 was 167; 25 years ago the yearly average was near 1000. We trust you will use your best exertions to put down this dreadful scourge, the prevalence of which in your districts is very discreditable to the administration.

14. In the year 1829, 121,622 persons were, as appears appears by the Returns, apprehended by the magistracy and district police; of these 85,172 were acquitted, and 35,654 punished.

15. Of this number, 1,905 were punished by the criminal judges; 427 by the Courts of Circuit; and 106 by the Foujdarry Adawlut.

16. Of those punished by the Courts of Circuit, 162 were sentenced to imprisonment for a term above seven years, and 264 to imprisonment for shorter periods.

17. Of those punished by the Foujdarry Adawlut, 16 were sentenced to death; 16 to transportation or imprisonment for life; 16 to imprisonment for more than seven years; and 58 to imprisonment for not more than seven years.

18. We have extracted from the documents recorded on your Consultations, the following numbers of persons whose cases were referred to the courts, and the numbers acquitted and punished for several years past:—

(6.) Letter to the Madras
Government,
12th Oct. 1831.

21. The capital sentences passed by the Foujdarry Adawlut in several preceding years, are stated to have been as follows :—

1803.	1804.	1805.	1806.	1807.	1808.	1809.	1810.	1811.	1812.	1813.	1814.	1815.	1816.	1817.	1818.

22. It is satisfactory to observe so great a decrease in the number of capital sentences. This has occurred in a remarkable degree during the last four years, and in the same period the sentences to transportation and imprisonment passed by the Foujdarry Adawlut have much diminished. In former years the fluctuation on the sentences of that Court was very considerable.

23. We desire you will send copies of the foregoing tables to the Foujdarry Adawlut, directing them to report on their general accuracy or inaccuracy, to correct any errors which they may contain, and to give such explanations as they may be able to afford, of the causes of any considerable differences in corresponding parts of the tables in different years. The Foujdarry Adawlut will also separate, if the records of their office will enable them to do so, their sentences of imprisonment into classes; showing the number of persons sentenced to be imprisoned for terms not above seven years, above seven years, not above fourteen, and above fourteen, not being imprisonment for life. This has been done in the Statements for 1829, and we wish to have a corresponding account for former years. We should be glad also to have a similar table for the sentences of the courts of circuit, if it can be prepared without much trouble.

24. According to the Statements, the district police officers had before them, in 1829, 106,682 persons charged with crimes and misdemeanors and petty offences. In the same year they acquitted 70,121, sent 6,601 to the criminal courts, and punished 29,241. Of those punished, 21,533 were fined, 686 put in the stocks, 3,828 confined, and 3,193 flogged. Of those sent to the criminal courts, above one-third were released.

25. The persons annually subjected to the authority of these officers, including prosecutors and witnesses, as well as parties accused, must be exceedingly numerous. The Statements cannot give complete information on this point, far less can they show the number of persons who have been peremptorily rejected or dismissed without inquiry, or the number of persons punished unjustly, or harassed by being sent unnecessarily to the criminal courts. In the district (Masulipatam), the population of which a very large portion is said to be less than 530,000, there were, in the year 1829, 9,077 persons charged with petty offences before the district police officers.

Allowing

APPENDIX,

Courts at the

Allowing for the persons in attendance as prosecutors and witnesses in such cases, it is clear that a very large proportion of the effective inhabitants of the country (deducting for those who from sex, age, infirmity, or other causes, were unable to attend) must have been before them in the course of one year. Of the accused, no less than 8,723, which is almost nine-tenths of the whole, were acquitted. There is reason to suspect that the business before the district police officers is more extensive than the official returns indicate. For instance, in Cuddapah, the number of persons acquitted by them on charges of petty offences amounted in 1829 to 4,203, and the number punished to 1,554; while in the adjoining district of Bellary, the acquittals were 101, and the punishments 1,127. In the former Zillah, on similar charges before the magistrate, the acquittals were 1,176, and the punishments 248. In the latter, the acquittals before the magistrate were 34, and the punishments 58. It seems difficult to account for these differences, but on the supposition that the business in Bellary is not fully reported.

26. It is of great importance that the mode in which these officers exercise their power should be known, and that the people should be protected against its abuse, for the authority vested in them is great; they have constant temptation and opportunity to misuse it, without much risk of punishment or exposure; and frequent representations against them have been made by the circuit judges.

27. Under the Madras Regulations, the police officers are also the revenue officers, and no orders can be given to any police officer but by the magistrate, who is also the collector, his revenue superior. The judicial officers are not allowed to interfere with them, nor even with the magistrate, except in a very limited number of cases.

28. The commission of a crime having come officially to the knowledge of the native head of police, he sends the accused, with the witnesses and the papers of the case, to the criminal judge, who certifies that the persons and the documents have been received; and the Regulation after prescribing this course adds, "And no other communication shall be necessary." By the same Regulation it is provided, that "no order shall be issued to any police officer, excepting by the magistrate or his assistants." The inconveniences resulting from these restrictions have been very inadequately guarded against by a subsequent enactment, under which the criminal judge is authorised to call for documents which a police officer ought to have transmitted; and whenever there may not be a magistrate or assistant magistrate at the Zillah station, it is competent to the criminal judge to do all acts necessary for preserving the public peace, or securing public offenders, which the magistrate might do in such case. The criminal judge cannot correct the errors of police officers, nor direct their inquiries. He is to acquit or commit the accused, or to punish him according to the case. Although it must often happen that further investigation is required, or the presence of other parties than those who have been forwarded by the police officers, the criminal judge has no alternative; the Regulation, which declares that "no other communication shall be necessary," puts an end to the proceedings. For oppressive or irregular acts, a magistrate may censure police officers, or bring them to punishment; but, with the exception of a small number of cases, he has no opportunity of knowing any thing of the proceedings; while the criminal judge, before whom their proceedings are necessarily brought, has no jurisdiction; he cannot receive a complaint against the police officer, nor even ask an explanation of his conduct, however absurd or mischievous it may appear.

29. The people have no means of complaining criminally against the police officers, but by applying to the magistrate. If he does not hear them, there is no power to compel him; none to ascertain whether he attends to their complaints.

30. In the proceedings of the Foujdarry Adawlat, the same defects are to be observed. The sentiments of the court on this subject are expressed in the following terms: "It is of the highest importance that some efficient method be adopted for checking the abuses and abuses which seem to prevail almost universally among the lower agents of the police, and too generally, it is to be feared, among the higher. Experience has shown that the instructions issued by the judges of circuit and court of Foujdarry Adawlat have not produced duced material amendment in the conduct of the police officers ; a reprimand, or a trifling fine, is, with few exceptions, the chief penalty inflicted on a police officer whose irregularities are brought to the notice of the magistrate under the orders of the superior tribunals ; and Regulation III. of 1819, which was intended to provide more effectually for the punishment of oppression or other abuse of authority on the part of the police officers, has remained almost, if not altogether, a dead letter. The reason is pretty clear. An action, civil or criminal, by the party aggrieved, seems hopeless, so long as the police officer retains his influence, which would always be exerted, and too often successfully, to keep back evidence to establish his delinquency ; and the consequence is, that for the most flagrant violations of duty, police officers practically enjoy a degree of impunity which it never could be the intention of Government to extend to them."—"There can hardly be a doubt" (they add) "that the real or supposed influence of the police officer, with his immediate superior, operates with other causes to prevent witnesses from coming forward in true cases ; and thus at the outset a serious obstacle is opposed to the complete and satisfactory investigation of them by the magistrate."

31. The Foujdarry Adawlut further say, "Instances are still frequent, and several have recently come under the observation of the court, in which prisoners are detained in the custody of the inferior agents of the police, or of the district police officer, for weeks, and even months, before they are sent up to the criminal court ; and the reasons most commonly assigned for this irregularity are either false upon the face of them, or such as have been repeatedly declared inadmissible. It is surely not too much to infer, that the unwarrantable detention of the prisoners is the least of the irregularities committed in these cases ; and that on all, or nearly all of them, the police officers have been guilty of acts which ought to subject them to a much more severe punishment than the magistrate is authorized to inflict. But frequent as these instances are, it hardly ever happens that a police officer of the higher classes is brought before the criminal court ; and the unavoidable conclusion seems to be, that there is a failure of justice in these cases, or that the delinquency of the police officers is inadequately punished."

32. Of the authority of the Courts of Circuit in such cases, the Foujdarry Adawlut say, "At present their authority is limited to the mere formal act of bringing to the notice of the magistrate the misconduct of his subordinate officers ; and they have no control over his proceedings upon the receipt of this communication, which is seldom followed up by effectual measures for preventing the recurrence of the same irregularities, or for bringing to punishment the individuals guilty of them. The communication, therefore, is hardly ever attended with any other effect than to bring the superior tribunals into contempt, and to confirm the police officers in the impression that they risk little by the neglect or violation of the rules prescribed for their guidance."

33. The insufficiency of the authority of the circuit judges over the proceedings of the magistrates, and the oppression to which the people may in consequence be subject, are occasionally noticed in the circuit reports ; in one of those reports now before us we observe the following case. A petition was presented to a judge of circuit, alleging that a magistrate had kept a person unjustly confined for a considerable time, without any investigation into the charge against him. The judge called on the magistrate for explanation, and it appeared that the complainants had been confined nearly two months, and that no inquiry had been made into their cases. The circuit judge (although not satisfied that he had any authority to interfere) said, that the explanation was not satisfactory ; he directed that the cases should be immediately disposed of, and that a further return should be made in fifteen days. The magistrate replied to the judge that the prisoners had been released. The judge then explained of the insufficiency of the law ; and the Foujdarry Adawlut expressed their entire concurrence with the circuit judge, as to what he had said. The judge then said, that he had on the subject had on more occasions than one, and that he had on more occasions than one. In reply, you merely remarked, that the subject had been brought before the proceedings of Government.

34. The Foujdarry Adawlut, in a report to a prothonotary of Mr. Harris, the judge of circuit, that that the heads of villages, tehsildars, and collectors, should be relieved from the charge of police and magistracy, remarked, that the transfer of the police and of the magistracy from the judicial to the revenue department, having been carried into effect under the special orders of the authorities in England, it was to be presumed that no alterations in that arrangement could be made without our sanction; and they referred to their opinion on the general effect of the arrangement which they had communicated to you in their resolutions of the 25th April 1829. You intimated to that court your hope, that if the partial reforms suggested by the Finance Committee in Bengal were adopted, they would be attended with beneficial effects; and that in other respects it was considered desirable to give the existing system a further trial.

35. Although we are not satisfied of the necessity or the propriety of such extensive changes as those proposed by Mr. Harris, and must therefore concur with you as to the expediency of giving the existing system a further trial, we cannot shut our eyes to those parts of the system which obviously require amendment. It appears to us to be quite indispensable that a sufficient check should be established on the proceedings of the native police officers and the magistrates; that avoidable obstacles to the detection, apprehension and conviction of offenders should be removed, and that facilities of access to criminal justice should be given to the people; but these ends seem to be unattainable as long as the police is so exempted from the cognizance of the criminal courts. The sole object of this exemption has been to prevent collision with the revenue officers; but, from the consequences adverted to, this part of the arrangement appears to require revision and amendment. It is necessary, therefore, that the police should be rendered effectively amenable to the courts; and for this purpose we direct that the magistrates and the native police officers be (in all cases connected with the department) subject to the orders of the criminal judges and of the courts of circuit.

36. We have not been inattentive to the remark of the Foujdarry Adawlut, who have observed that any direct authoritative interference of the superior courts with the establishments under the immediate superintendence of the magistrates, might be opposed on the ground, that however it might serve to check the irregularities of the police, it would be liable, unless judiciously used, to weaken the efficiency of the revenue department, and throw it into confusion. It is certainly not our purpose that revenue officers, in their capacity of police officers, should be armed with power to apply or to withhold the penal law at their pleasure, or to leave parties aggrieved by their acts without the means of obtaining redress against them in the criminal courts. However anxious we may be to prevent collision of authority, it is not to be supposed that measures which are represented as tending to the increase of crimes, and to the protection of criminals, would be supported by us for the mere purpose of maintaining the arrangements of the revenue department. Those arrangements are always open to discussion in their proper place; and we trust that if the powers of control which we have directed to be invested in the superior courts, are judiciously defined and discreetly used (and it will be your business to see they are), the fear of throwing the revenue department into confusion, by subjecting the police to the authority of the courts, will be found utterly groundless; but even if it were otherwise, we should regard it merely as an argument of the imperfection of those arrangements. In no case could we conclude that it was expedient to uphold them by means inconsistent with justice, and generally oppressive to the people.

37. The prevalence of perjury has been much complained of by some of the circuit judges. We doubt the propriety of attempting to remedy this evil by making the penal law more severe. Convictions of persons charged with perjury should be rare, and become less frequent, and the repugnance to attesting falsely should be more generally felt by respectable people; would it were so. Many eyes are now disposed to rely on the good effects of the careful examination by the judges of the cases before them. Conspiracies and false testimony are less frequent, and it is likely that they were less frequently successful, and that those engaged in them were more likely to be exposed and punished. We fear perjury will not materially diminish in your courts.

courts till the people have acquired a well-grounded confidence in the correctness of the judicial proceedings. With this view we desire you will instruct the superior courts to take frequent opportunities of examining the proceedings of the inferior, whenever they shall have reason to suspect that the evidence has not been well sifted and duly estimated; and that they will communicate to the proper officer such remarks as the cases may call for.

38. We desire you will instruct the Foujdarry Adawlut to require of the circuit judges a strict account of the grounds on which they postpone trials at the sessions. The long and repeated journeys to the Zillah stations to which prosecutors and witnesses are subjected are so exceedingly vexatious, that their reluctance to attend cannot excite any surprise. On one occasion the witnesses had already travelled at least a thousand miles, and they had still another journey to perform. No doubt this evil is in part to be ascribed to defects in the previous proceedings, and to the distance of the Zillah station from the residence of the parties; but delays which are owing to the Courts of Circuit and to the Foujdarry Adawlut ought to be carefully attended to, and reduced as far as circumstances will permit.

39. There are also delays after the conclusion of the trial, which ought, at all events, to be prevented. The records of trial referred to the Foujdarry Adawlut are sometimes not forwarded by the circuit judges for a very long time. We have observed occasions in which twelve to twenty months elapsed before they reached the Foujdarry Adawlut; and amongst several instances of great delay in the final disposal of trials referred to the Foujdarry Adawlut, one occurs in which ten persons, who were tried by the Court of Circuit at Chicacole in May 1824, were not finally discharged by the Foujdarry Adawlut till April 1827. We are told that the omission to bring on their trials was occasioned by some oversight, and that nothing of the sort can happen again. We think it desirable that the periodical returns made by the Foujdarry Adawlut to Government should show the dates on which the trials were brought on before the Courts of Circuit; the dates on which the records were received; and the dates of the final proceedings of the Foujdarry Adawlut on the several cases, in any instance where the delay exceeds a certain specified time—say two months.

40. A practice, arising of course in a great degree from the doubts of judges as to the veracity of witnesses, appears to be gaining ground with your circuit judges, and even with the Foujdarry Adawlut, of ordering, in many cases, that persons acquitted on charges of specific crimes shall be detained on requisition of security on account of some suspicion of their guilt. We think this very objectionable, and we desire you will direct the attention of the Foujdarry Adawlut to the subject.

41. It appears from the Circuit Report of the 1st September 1830, for the Northern Division, that it is very common for powerful persons in the Vizagapatam district to send for a ryot who may have fallen into arrears, or if any property has been lost, for any one who may have incurred their suspicions, and to put him in confinement. When these persons are released, they frequently complain, that while in confinement they were starved, maltreated, and put to the torture. In about a year and a-half, fifty-three complaints of false imprisonment had been preferred in that district; many of them included charges of violence having been used and property forcibly taken; and others stated that the complainants were kept in confinement until they consented to sign some document or receipt. It is stated by the circuit judge, that, in the former case, the magistrate is competent to order the release of the prisoner, while, in the latter, he is obliged to reject the complaint. The order of the Foujdarry Adawlut passed in 1819, by which false imprisonment was declared to be a civil injury, of which a ryot might sue for compensation, has not been followed, his duty in a case of that nature being to obtain satisfaction for the injury by making him seek redress in the civil court. In substance, the ryot is referred to Government, the Foujdarry Adawlut merely intimating that the case has been referred for what is laid before Government on the day they were passed.

46 APPENDIX TO REPORT FROM SELECT COMMITTEE.

42. The only order passed on those proceedings by the Government is entered on your Consultation of the 3d March 1820, in these words, "Ordered to be recorded;" and the only notice you have taken of the circuit judges' Report now referred to, and of the proceedings of the Foudjarry Adawlut relating to that Report, is, that these papers were not considered to call for any observation from the Government.

43.* We know no reason why men who commit such offences should be exempt from the punishment to which other criminals are liable, or why those who have been oppressed so cruelly should be denied that protection which is granted to other sufferers in cases of much less importance. Crimes so encouraged must inevitably increase. We cannot but express our astonishment at your supineness and indifference on this important subject; and we now direct that this defect in your Regulations be corrected without further delay.

44. It has been too often the practice of our Indian governments to make, without our previous sanction, fundamental alterations in the system for administering justice to the natives. When such alterations have been carried into effect, things cannot be restored to their former state without great inconvenience. Hence, if we should disapprove the new measures, we are virtually deprived of the power of exercising our judgment on them for any practical purpose. Of this nature are some of the changes which you have lately taken upon yourselves to introduce, without any previous reference to us.

45. The chief alterations which you have resolved to carry into effect in the department of criminal justice, are these:—

1st. To reduce the number of circuit judges from twelve to seven.

2d. To give the circuit judges power to direct the dismissal of native officers of police, for misconduct in that department.

3d. To abolish the Mahomedan law in the Courts of Circuit.

4th. To extend the full powers of committal and punishment now vested in the criminal courts, to the native judge in Canara, to the two new native judges who are intended to be appointed in Southern Arcot and Guntoor, and to the Sudder Aumeens.

5th. To reduce one judge of the Foudjarry and Sudder Adawlut.

46. Some alterations also are to be made in the powers of the judges of circuit and of the Foudjarry Adawlut.

47. Connected with these arrangements, are various others relating to civil justice, the whole of which are described generally in the proceedings of the Sudder and Foudjarry Adawlut, dated 19th October 1830, but the details are not yet fully before us.

48. We observe, that in order to allow of a reduction in the number of circuit judges, much of the business which has hitherto been done by the Court collectively, is to be assigned to single judges, and that they are to be relieved from a considerable part of the civil business.

49. It should, we think, be competent to a circuit judge to recommend to the magistrate the dismissal of a native police officer, on the ground of any particular misconduct or neglect which may have been established against him in the Circuit Court; but the general question of fitness or unfitness of the police officer for his place, should be determined by the magistrate, with whom alone the responsibility should rest. It should be by a judicial act only, under a general power to revise the magistrate's proceedings, and to revise his orders, that the circuit judge should be vested with authority to direct the dismissal of an officer of his establishment; if circuit judges have not authority to direct the dismissal of native officers on the establishment of the criminal judges, and we are not aware that they have, except by a judicial sentence, there seems no reason for giving them that power specifically over the native police officers.

50. The abolition of the Mahomedan law in the Courts of Circuit is the most important of the intended alterations. We are not informed of the mode in which this change in the adminiadministration of justice in your principal criminal courts is to be made, but we think it necessary to apprise you, that in our opinion, the assistance of the law officer in the Court of Circuit as an assessor is a very important security for justice, which without some equivalent cannot be dispensed with; and we are not aware that any plan better suited to the ends of justice, more effective, and at the same time more economical, than that by which the law officers were established, has been devised. We direct that at all events the proceedings of the Court of Circuit be not held under the unchecked authority of an English judge, but that a native officer of character and ability, competent to the business and skilled in judicial proceedings, be permanently appointed as a component part of the court, with powers to assist with his opinion and advice at every stage of the trial; that the English judge be not authorized to pass sentence without his concurrence; and that in the event of his differing from the native officer, he be required, as at present, to forward a copy of the proceedings to the Foujdarry Adawlut, and wait the sentence of that court.

51. For the proper exercise of the powers entrusted to native judges and Sudder Aumeens, the best practical securities will, we trust, be established.

52. The following remarks of the Sudder Adawlut, in reference to the plans of the Finance Committee, and especially to the reduction of a judge of the Sudder court, to the abolition of Zillah courts, and to the increased powers in the administration of justice, which are to be given to natives, have particularly attracted our attention. "The reduction of the former Zillah into auxiliary and native courts, which had already partially been carried into effect, is a mere change of name in the local agency, and a diminution of expenditure for the administration of justice. It can neither reduce the number of crimes, nor of lawsuits in the provinces, and the same quantity of business remains to be done by an agency less competent and more corrupt than that formerly employed. Instead of relieving the superintending authority at the Presidency, as seems to have been imagined by the Finance Committee in Bengal, this alteration in the local agency from the increased errors of its greater inexperience, and its greater liability to local influence, partiality and abuse, will considerably augment the labours of this Court. These changes are now proposed to be carried still further, and native agency is about to be substituted for much of the most important remaining European authority, hitherto devoted for the last thirty years to the local administration of justice." The Sudder Adawlut have justly observed, that in these circumstances, it is evidently of the highest importance to strengthen the efficiency of the superintending court; and you have at their suggestion provided for an extension of authority in single judges of the Sudder and Foujdarry Adawlut, corresponding with that which is established in the Courts in Bengal. This arrangement we entirely approve. We trust that the Sudder and Foujdarry Adawlut will vigilantly watch the proceedings of the auxiliary and native courts, and that we may receive from you frequent reports respecting them; for we shall be anxious to learn how far experience will justify the confidence which has been reposed in them.

53. We entirely approve your having adopted the suggestion of the Foujdarry Adawlut, that the magistrates and their subordinates should be required to furnish periodical reports of the state of the police in their respective districts. We desire that similar reports may be furnished by the principal native police officers under the magistrates, and that copies of these documents may be forwarded regularly to us.

We are your loving friends,

(7.)—COPY of a LETTER from the Court of Directors to the Madras Government, dated the 21st December 1831.

1. We now proceed to reply to the paragraphs of your Letters, noticed in the margin,* which refer to the Reports on Civil Justice in the years 1827 and 1828, and the first half of 1829.

2. The number of original suits instituted in the several judicatories under the Madras Presidency in the years 1827 and 1828, and in the first half of 1829, were as follows:—

5. It appears from this statement, that almost the whole of the original suits were decided by natives, about one forty-fifth part only having been disposed of by Europeans; and that the average delay in the courts, according to the rate of decision in this period, was as follows:—

	Average Delay.
Provincial Courts	near 2 years.
Zillah Judges	near 1½ year.
Registers	not 3 months.
Sudder Aumeens	more than 3 months.
District Moonsiffs	not 6 months.
Village Moonsiffs	above 9 months.
Punchayets	near 2 years.

6. The appeals instituted in the same period, were as follows:—

	1827.	1828.	1st Half of 1829.
From the decisions of the
Provincial Courts	15	16	9
Zillah Judges	58	110	42

TOTAL	2,380	2,292	1,030

7. No appeals are allowed from the courts of the village Moonsiffs and Punchayets.

8. The numbers decided were,— Appeals from the decisions of the

Provincial Courts	34
Zillah Judges	148
Registers	210
Sudder Aumeens	1,332
District Moonsiffs	765

10. Of the 1,003 appeals decided in this period, 3,283 were from the decisions of District Moonsiffs, and of these, 2,502 were determined by the Sudder Aumeens. Almost half the decisions on appeals, therefore, were passed by natives.

50 APPENDIX TO REPORT FROM SELECT COMMITTEE.

APPENDIX,
No. 1.
continued.

Civil and Criminal Courts at the Three Presidencies.

11. According to the above rates of decision, the delay in disposing of the appeals depending in 1829, would be as follows:—

12. In appeals from the decisions of the—

Provincial Courts	more than 3 years.
Zillah Judges	more than 1½ year.
Registers	about 2½ years.
Sudder Aumeens	more than 2½ years.
District Moonsiffs	about 7 months.

13. Comparing the number of appeals with the number of original decisions, it appears that about half the decisions of the provincial court were appealed from; about one-tenth of the decisions of the Zillah judges; one-fifth of those of the registers; one-eighth of those of the Sudder Aumeens; and one-fortieth of those of the District Moonsiffs.

14. These differences in the number of appeals, as compared with the number of decisions in the original suits, do not indicate corresponding differences in the equality of the judicature in the lower courts; they depend chiefly on the nature of the suits, and on the different degrees of facility with which appeals are admitted. The suits decided in the provincial courts always involve property to a large amount, and the parties can generally afford to pay the expense of an appeal. The appeals from the decisions of the Zillah judges, compared with those from the decisions of the registers and Sudder Aumeens, are proportionably few: because the parties are subjected to much inconvenience and expense, owing to the provincial court being at too great a distance from the suitors, and the costs being considerable. The comparatively small number of appeals from the District Moonsiffs, is no doubt partly owing to the poverty of the suitors in cases involving property of small amount, but principally to the exclusion from appeal of suits for personal property decided by them, in which the amount does not exceed 20 rupees value. As the average value of suits disposed of by the District Moonsiffs is less than 40 rupees, the number of unappealable suits must be a large part of the whole; the exact proportion is not known. It is to be observed, also, that in the courts of the District Moonsiffs more than one-third of the cases are settled by razeenamah; of course none of these would be appealed. Excluding razeenamahs, about one-twenty-fifth of the decisions would be appealed from.

15. The Statements show, that of 1,254 decisions of the Sudder Aumeens disposed of in appeal, 381 were reversed; that of 3,294 decisions of the District Moonsiffs disposed of in appeal, 1,245 were reversed; that is to say, about 30 per cent. of the former, and 37 or 38 per cent. of the latter, were reversed. There is no reason, therefore, to conclude from the smaller proportion of appeals from the decisions of the District Moonsiffs, that their judgments are better than those of the Sudder Aumeens.

16. Although the state of the business in regard to the promptness with which suits are brought to a decision in your courts is generally satisfactory, there are some exceptions; and your attention is necessary to prevent accumulation of suits in the higher courts, especially in regard to appeals. It is obvious, that a large proportion of original suits instituted in the Zillah courts, might be referred to the District Moonsiffs. Many of these, however, are retained on the file of the judges, or referred to the register or Sudder Aumeens. But suits once placed on the file of any particular judicatory, remain there, of course, till they are decided; and if while this mode of distributing suits continues, the judges, or registers or Sudder Aumeens have other business, which prevents them from attending to their civil courts, arrears must accumulate. The assigning of small causes to the register and Sudder Aumeen, occasions a still further accumulation in the higher courts; for any cause, however small the amount, which may be appealed from the decision of a register, must be tried in appeal by the Zillah judge, and any cause appealed from the Sudder Aumeen must be tried by the judge or the register; whereas if they had been assigned to a District Moonsiff in the first instance, appeals from the decisions might have been heard by a Sudder Aumeen.

17. In the Canara Court, where the accumulation of arrears has been so great as to attract the special attention of the Sudder Adawlut and Government, nearly three-fourths of the business appears to have accumulated in this manner. The inconvenience might have been obviated, if the state of the files had been properly regulated. If this matter is carefully attended to, the present system will afford the means of disposing of a very large additional number of civil suits; but if it be not attended to, arrears will inevitably accumulate in other districts, as they have done in Canara.

18. The average value of the suits instituted in the courts of the Zillah judges, and the value of the suits decided by those judges, and by the registers, the Sudder Aumeens, and the District Moonsiffs, contrasted with the value of suits which come within the jurisdiction of those officers, will show how unnecessary it is to keep the files of the superior judicatories overloaded, and how easy it would be to prevent arrears, merely by a careful distribution of the business, without any additional expense to the Government or to the suitors, and with manifest advantage to all parties.

19. In the five half-years ending with the first half of 1829, there were instituted, in the courts of the Zillah judges, 16,533 suits, in which the value of the property litigated was Rs. 26,52,868. In the same period 1,233 suits, in which the value litigated was Rs. 3,50,198, were referred to the register; 14,555, in which the value was Rs. 13,95,180, were referred to the Sudder Aumeens; and 384 suits, in which the value was Rs. 23,744, were referred to the District Moonsiffs. It will be seen that the average value of the suits instituted in the Zillah courts was about Rs. 160; and that the average of those referred the registers, Sudder Aumeens, and District Moonsiffs were Rs. 284, Rs. 92, and Rs. 62 respectively. Of the suits instituted, therefore, there must have been but a very small number which were not within the jurisdiction of the District Moonsiffs. Your constant attention will be necessary to secure to the people that prompt and unexpensive decision of their suits, which cannot be effected if the causes are allowed to accumulate, and to be drawn into the higher courts.

20. Adverting to the large number of cases settled by razeenamah before the District Moonsiffs, we observe, with regret, that the judges of the Sudder Adawlut have seen ground to apprehend that many of them are mere fictitious suits, got up by the Moonsiffs for the fraudulent purpose of obtaining from Government the fee of half an anna in the rupee, to which they are entitled under Regulation II. of 1828, in all suits instituted in their courts, and settled by razeenamah. In the proceedings of the Sudder Adawlut, dated 19th October 1830, we find the following passage: "As an example, the court take the following from the returns of the Vailpund Moonsiff, in Cuddapah, for the second quarter of this year:—

	Number of Suits.	Value of Property claimed.	Fees.
" Dismissed	140	Rs. 1,221	No Fees.
" Decreed	73	2,582	Rs. 161

Rs. 185 fees, making a total of Rs. 255 per mensem; and passes only 73 decrees, but settles nearly four times that number of suits, or 248, by razeenamah: his fees from decrees are only Rs. 161; from razeenamahs no less than 395. Now to insure the receipt of this last sum, of which nearly half, or Rs. 197, comes out of the public treasury, it is only necessary to advance the other half to enter a fictitious plaint and razeenamah, and, at the close of the month, the sum returns doubled into the hands of the District Moonsiff." The circumstances stated certainly require explanation; and we trust that you will have the matter thoroughly investigated. The Sudder Adawlut have justly remarked that such abuses are not only calculated to corrupt the moral character of this important branch of native agency, but to vitiate the very returns on which a judgment of their efficacy depends. The court do not take upon themselves to declare that such frauds are systematically pursued in general, but they say there is strong reason to suspect their prevalence. Even if these suspicions should not prove to be well-founded, it will still be necessary to keep in mind the temptations to which the District Moonsiffs are exposed, and the injustice which parties in suits for personal property, not exceeding Rs. 20 value, may suffer in their courts from the absence of those important safeguards for justice which are established in all the superior courts, viz. the recording of the evidence and the right of appeal. In suits for land before the district Moonsiffs, those safeguards have already been provided; and it is deserving of consideration, whether any inconvenience which might be apprehended from extending the rule to all other cases, would not be more than compensated by the improved security for justice which would be afforded to the poorer classes of suitors.

(8.)—COPY of a LETTER from the Court of Directors, to the Bombay Government; dated the 15th February 1832.

1. WE proceed to reply to your letters, noticed in the margin,* relating to the administration of civil justice under your Presidency from 1825 to 1827; and we shall refer to the accounts for 1828, and for the first half of 1829, which are recorded on your Consultations.

2. According to the periodical statements laid before Government by the Sudder Adawlut, the number of original suits instituted, decided, and depending at the end of the year was as follows:

3. The excessive amount of business in the courts in some of these periods, as compared with that in others, and the circumstances connected with it, should have been brought specifically to our notice. They required a full explanation, and we regret that you should have referred to them in a cursory way only.

4. The number of original suits instituted in the first half of 1828 and first half of 1829 in the Old Provinces, were as follows:—

	1st Half of 1827.	1st Half of 1828.	1st Half of 1829.
Instituted	10,471	40,793	10,188

And in the Deccan in the first half of 1826, the first half of 1828, and the first half of 1829, there were—

	1st Half of 1826.	1st Half of 1828.	1st Half of 1829.
Instituted	5,542	15,167	6,092

5. This great fluctuation was owing to changes in your regulations respecting stamps. In all the courts under the Bombay Government, suits for property of an amount less than Rs. 100 value had been (in common with all other suits) subject to a stamp-duty or institution fee, till the middle of 1826, when, at the recommendation of Mr. Elphinstone, those in the Deccan were exempted from it; at the end of 1827 the same exemption was extended to the Old Provinces. About the middle of 1828 the suits in both divisions were again subjected to the tax.

6. Mr. Elphinstone, after adverting to an objection to his proposition, which had been raised on financial grounds, recorded his opinion on the subject in these words: "I must own that I doubt the accuracy of the calculation that rates the loss by the exemption of suits under Rs. 100 from the stamp-tax, at a lac and a half of rupees; but if the amount were 15,00,000, I should not have the least hesitation in supporting the exemption. I have before said that I conceive a tax on complaints from the lowest order of natives, especially ryots, to be the very worst tax that it is possible to lay upon the people. If Rs. 1,50,000 or Rs. 15,00,000 are to be raised, I would rather lay it upon the land, on the trade, on opium, on salt, on salaries, or on anything rather than suits under Rs. 100."

7. The rule had not been in force many months, when it was again brought to the notice of Government. In April 1828, the secretary called their attention to a falling off in the stamp collections, and ascribing this in part to small suits being exempted from payment of the duty, he suggested that the rate should be revised. Mr. Warden, who had before objected to the exemption, now again protested against it as injurious to the revenue, and vexatious to the administration of justice; and Mr. Goodwin, the other member of council, maintained the propriety of it, as he had done before. At the desire of Sir John Malcolm, who had by this time succeeded to the government, your secretary prepared a comparative statement of the stamp collections for different periods, and the result showed that, in four months before the tax was taken off, the stamp collections amounted to Rs. 1,01,502, and in four months after to Rs. 52,455.

8. But it might have been seen, by comparing the tables of stamp-duties under the new and old regulations, that, in addition to the exemption in favour of suits below Rs. 100, various various material changes had been made in the stamp laws. There was another large class of suits exempted from stamp-duty under the new regulations, viz. all those cognizable by the collector. The rates of stamp-duty for other suits, and the duties on the production of exhibits, and on applications for the summoning of witnesses, were also altered.

9. A statement, showing the average number of suits below Rs.100, filed for several years under the old regulations, with the amount of duty to which they would have been liable under the new rates, might have served as the basis of an estimate, which (though still necessarily imperfect) would have been more to the purpose than that which was submitted to you. Whatever might have been the value of the tax as a financial measure its amount should have been calculated as accurately as circumstances would permit, and it would have remained for consideration, whether there was any object of sufficient importance to warrant a sacrifice of revenue to that amount. The Government did indeed adopt an opinion that there was no such object; but they came to this conclusion after a rough and superficial estimate of the question, without any discussion respecting it being entered on the Consultations.

10. Yet we cannot charge the Government with precipitancy, for they knew their views were in perfect accordance with those of the principal judicial officers, who on such an occasion ought to have been competent advisers. The judges of the Sudder Adawlut had expressed themselves strongly on the subject; and in one of the Circuit Reports we find the following remarks by Mr. Anderson, the fourth judge: "The practical inconvenience that resulted from allowing suits below Rs.100 to be instituted without payment of costs, has already, I believe, attracted the attention of Government, and has been placed in progress of alteration. However* failed, it is satisfactory that the experiment has been tried; it was adopted against the voice of all experienced servants, and is an instance, perhaps, how in judicial arrangements, in most cases, it is better to be guided by the results of practice, rather than to give weight to conclusions drawn from theory."

11. The practical inconvenience here referred to, was, that there had been a large influx of suits, a consequent severe pressure of business on the judicial officers, and an accumulation of arrears. But it should have been known to a judge of the Sudder Adawlut, that the only legitimate way to get rid of that inconvenience was to decide the suits, not to refuse them a hearing. The theory which was thought so little deserving of attention, was a fundamental principle on which justice is administered, namely, that suits, mere applications for justice, must be taken prima facie as fair demands; that to provide for the due reception, investigation, and determination of such demands, is one of the first duties of Government; that to exclude any class of suits, is so far to deny justice; and that to receive those only which are paid for, is to sell justice to the rich and to refuse it to the poor. An attention to the 58th and 59th paragraphs of our despatch of the 23d October 1823, would have shown you the consequence we attached to the maintenance of this principle; and we cannot but regret that so good a work as that which was done by the abolition of the tax, should have been so little appreciated, and so soon abandoned.

12. From your Consultations in the revenue department, preliminary to the passing of Regulation III. of 1828, it might be supposed that the question, whether the duty should be re-imposed or not, was a question of finance; and in this view, the opinion of Mr. Elphinstone, who considered that duty as a tax upon complaints from the lowest order of natives, and as the very worst tax that it was possible to lay on a people, was, we think, entitled to more attention than it appears to have received. But in the preamble of the Regulation, a different ground is taken. It is there said, that the exemption from the stamp-duty "has been found to occasion great inconvenience, by the multiplication tiplication of unnecessary law-suits." If this notion, of the tax serving to check unnecessary litigation, were correct, it would follow that, independently of all financial considerations, its imposition, instead of being oppressive, would be highly desirable, as a measure calculated to promote the ends of justice. And, in a matter of so great importance, it would have been proper for you to record the grounds which led to your opinion. We regret that you did not take this course; for a very cursory examination of the Statements alone would have served to confirm the soundness of the doctrine on which the exemption from the tax was founded.

13. In the following tables, made from those statements, are shown the number of suits decreed wholly or in part, or adjusted, and the number of those dismissed for default or otherwise, in both divisions of the country in several half-years:—

56 APPENDIX TO REPORT FROM SELECT COMMITTEE.

14. The sum of these numbers in the first class is 119,041, and that in the second class 42,678. In every 1,000 suits, therefore, there were about 736 decreed or adjusted, and 264 dismissed.

15. Whether the tax was on or off, there was but little variation in the ratio of the first class of suits to the second. Of the former there were only about two per cent. more in the first half of 1829, than in the first half of 1828.

16. All the suits of the first class were ascertained to be just demands. Among those of the second class, many that were dismissed after trial were, no doubt, bond fide suits; and of those dismissed for default, there must have been many which were so disposed of on grounds quite unconnected with the merits of the case, and many in which a just claim was satisfied by the defendant, merely on its being made known to him that the plaintiff had proceeded against him. In all cases of this last description, the plaintiff would of course disappear from the court, and the suit would be struck off the file because of his non-attendance.

17. There cannot, therefore, be any doubt that the number of mala fide plaintiffs is but small in proportion to the whole; that the effect of taking off the duty was to open the door of justice to a large class of persons against whom it had before been closed; and that the effect of again putting it on, was again to close the door of justice against them.

18. The number of suits annually excluded from your courts by the re-imposition of the tax cannot be estimated at less than 70,000. Of these it may be said confidently, that more than three-fourths are just claims, and that probably a large proportion of the remainder are equally so.

19. The unavoidable expense and trouble attendant on the prosecution of a suit at law, and the prospect of further annoyances of the same sort, perhaps of the payment of costs, or of a heavy fine, will always prove a sufficient check against vexatious litigation; and although the services of the court are undoubtedly sometimes perverted to the bad purposes of a fraudulent or vindictive man, such offences are not frequent. The proper way to check them is that by which other offences are checked, to punish the offenders; and this was accordingly provided for by Regulation IV. 1827, s. 53, c. 11; under which litigious plaintiffs are punishable by a fine from Rs. 50 to Rs. 500, and eventually by three months' imprisonment; but it cannot be fit that innocent men, or the community at large, should be punished, merely in the hope of preventing a few false suits.

20. We see no reason to doubt the sufficiency of the existing establishment to meet the most extensive demand for justice which has yet appeared in your courts. The whole number of suits remaining undecided at the end of the year 1827, was 11,764, and at the end of the next half-year it was only 11,723, notwithstanding 55,960 suits had been tried in that half-year.

21. The same, or nearly the same, number of native functionaries, that is to say, 80 in the first half of 1827, and 79 in the first half of 1828, disposed of 19,879 suits in the former period, and 52,794 in the latter; and when we observe the large number of decisions passed by some of them, and the small number by others, we are led to conclude that by judicious arrangements and an improved superintendence over the native tribunals, the number of their decisions might be greatly extended.

22. By the decrease of the stamp collections, and by the equivalent paid to the commissioners in lieu of their fees, a considerable loss fell on Government. The Sudder Adawlut showed that the amount paid to the commissioners for fees in the first half of 1828 was Rs. 1,16,991. We are of opinion, however, that the system of paying the commissioners should have been revised, and that an adequate fixed allowance should have been paid to every individual in reference to the importance and extent of his business. The mode of paying native judges by fees, instead of a fixed salary, appears to us objectionable; and although we are not prepared to give you any positive orders on the subject, we should have been glad if you had taken into consideration the expediency of altering that that part of the existing system. The whole sum, including fees and salaries granted to eighty native judges in the first half of 1827, amounted to Rs. 91,818; and the allowances to seventy-nine, in the first half of 1828, to Rs. 1,52,871. This gave, on an average, above Rs. 191 a month to each person in the first period, and above Rs. 322 in the second. It appears to us that this last rate of payment was unnecessarily high, and that it would have been much less objectionable to meet the deficiencies in the treasury by withholding from those officers any increase of their allowances, than by re-imposing the tax on small suits.

23. Having thus made you fully acquainted with our sentiments respecting the stamp-duty on suits of small amount, we desire you will again take the subject into consideration; and if you do not agree with us in the propriety of abolishing the tax, you will report to us, distinctly, the ground of your determination, showing, according to the best estimate that can be formed, the extent of the increased demand for justice which its abolition would bring upon your courts; with the means of meeting that demand, and the probable expense with which the measure would be attended, both in the way of sacrifice of revenue, and in additional payment to judicial officers. We desire, also, to be furnished with a statement of the number of instances in which plaintiffs have been fined for litigious suits under the Regulation above referred to, as far as the same can be furnished.

24. The number of appeals preferred from the decision of the registers and assistant judges and native tribunals, was as follows :

	1825.	1826.	1827.	1828.	1st Half of 1829.
Old Provinces	900	1,008	764	1,147	566
Deccan	249	560	996	653	403
TOTAL	1,149	1,568	1,760	1,800	969

25. The number of such appeals decided were—

	1825.	1826.	1827.	1828.	1st Half of 1829.
Old Provinces	702	1,433	770	764	669
Deccan	305	584	897	755	362
TOTAL	1,007	2,017	1,667	1,519	1,031

26. And the number remaining undecided were—

	1825.	1826.	1827.	1828.	1st Half of 1829.
Old Provinces	536	110	204	497	434
Deccan	253	161	370	347	388
TOTAL	789	271	574	844	822

27. The increased number of decisions on original suits, at the time the duty on small suits was taken off, accounts for the increased number of appeals. The arrear, however, is inconsiderable, in comparison with the number of decisions within the year.

28. From some apparent inaccuracies in the Statements, we are unable to make out any clear account of the business in the Sudder Adawlut; but it appears from the register's Letter dated 28th March 1828, that the arrear in that Court has for some years past continually increased; that at the end of 1825 it consisted of 82 appeals, and at the end of 1826 of 160, and at the end of 1827 of 227. The number of appeals instituted in those years being 114, 225, and 211 respectively. You have stated to us that this arrear has arisen from the court being deprived of the services of the fourth judge, and from the periodical interruption of civil business by the absence twice a year on circuit of one of the three judges. We observe, however, that there has been some correspondence between your Government and the judges respecting the cause of the delay of business before them; the judges ascribe it to the provisions of a regulation in your new code, and the Government ascribing it to their perseverance in conducting the business in a particular way not required by the regulation. We trust that you have at length come to a right understanding with the court on this subject; and it is indispensably necessary that some distinct course should be prescribed and peremptorily enforced, so that there may be no longer an accumulation of suits on the file of the Sudder Court.

29. Of the suits cognizable by Europeans, a considerable number were decided by the collectors, to whose jurisdiction, under ch. 8, Regulation XVII. of 1827, belong almost all suits relating to land, its rent and produce. A statement of these suits, including all such as are referred by the collectors to their ramavisdars or other officers, under Reg. VI. of 1830, should be included in the general reports on the administration of civil justice.

30. The proportionate number of original suits disposed of by Europeans and natives respectively, is sufficiently shown by the decision in the first half of 1827 and the first half of 1828, which were as follows:—

	1st of 1827.	1st of 1828.
By Europeans	2,762	3,249
By Natives	19,787	52,752

31. Separate statements relating to Dharwar have not been regularly furnished; the latest which we have found are for the two half-years of 1827; from these we have made the following extracts, which are sufficient to show generally the extent of the business in that district.

	1st Half of 1827.	1st Half of 1828.
Original Suits instituted	1,604	1,934
Decided	1,863	2,173
Depending at the end of the year		617

32. Dharwar having been constituted a distinct Zillah, reports of its judicial business will of course in future be forwarded with those of the other districts.

33. This province was brought under your general Regulations in March 1830, by Regulation VII. of that year. The collector, however, held the joint offices of judge and session judge, as well as those of collector and magistrate. A proposition was afterwards made by Mr. Romer to appoint a separate judge and session judge at Dharwar. This, however, was objected to by Sir John Malcolm, and we understand that it had not been carried into effect. We observe that on this occasion the Governor appended to his minutes extracts of letters which he had received from Mr. Nisbet, the collector of Dharwar. We disapprove this mode of conducting public business, by extracts from unofficial communications. A full report on the state of the district and of the business, should have been furnished by the collector through the visiting Judge of the Sudder Adawlut, whose comments on the whole would have assisted in bringing the case properly before Government. At all events the necessary documents should have been regularly recorded. We must here remark, however, that there is an official document on your Consultations of the 13th May 1829, viz. a Report of one of the judges of the Sudder Adawlut, exhibiting a view of the state of the district in several respects different from that given by Mr. Nisbet. That Report certainly gives a favourable idea of the situation of Dharwar generally, and of the exertions of Mr. Nisbet; but it also adverts to several defects, which seem to point out the expediency of making some change in its judicial arrangements. The information communicated to us respecting Dharwar is, however, altogether insufficient to enable us to form any decided opinion on the proposed arrangement. But we are decidedly averse to the union of such powers as those held by the collector of Dharwar, and we desire that they may not be so continued for any period longer than the necessity of the case may seem to require. A separate judicial officer should be appointed there as in other Zillahs.

34. In your Letters of 1st December 1830, you have drawn our attention to the state of the judicial business in the Poonah Zillah, and you have informed us of your having nominated a joint judge and session judge to afford temporary assistance in reducing the arrears. This temporary arrangement seems to have been very proper.

35. In your Letter dated 14th January 1831, you have referred for our decision a suggestion of Mr. Romer's, that the innovations in the new code respecting perjury should be cancelled, and the provisions of the old code restored: also, that in regard to the crime of subornation of perjury, the advocate-general should be consulted on the propriety of providing for its definition and punishment by direct and express enactment.

36. We entirely agree with Sir John Malcolm and Mr. Newnham, in objecting to make any attempt to assimilate the provisions of your Regulations to those of the English law, or to consult the advocate-general, as proposed by Mr. Romer. We are also of opinion with the Governor, that the law which provides for the punishment of instigation to perjury renders any separate enactment for the punishment of subornation of perjury unnecessary. On the other hand, some of Mr. Romer's objections to the new law appear to us to be well deserving of attention.

37. We shall not, however, enter upon a detailed discussion of the questions referred to, being of opinion that they will be much more properly brought to a determination by your government, after making a reference on the subject to the judges of the Sudder Adawlut.

38. You have sent us, through your secretary, copies of several Regulations passed by you in 1830, but you have not made any communication to us on the subject of the new enactments. We shall here briefly notice those which refer to the department of civil justice.

39. By Regulation I. of 1830, you have rescinded Regulation VII. of 1828, under which a provincial court of appeal had been established; and you have extended the jurisdiction of native commissioners to the cognizance of all original suits, of whatever amount. Of these measures, the former is in conformity with our orders; and the latter was adopted on the recommendation of our late president, Sir John Malcolm.

40. We remark, that it was not on account of the state of the business, but with a view to economy, and to the advantage of that class of people from which the commissioners are taken, that the jurisdiction of those officers was thus extended. The cases excluded excluded from their jurisdiction are, 1st, suits against all public officers, whether European or others, for acts done in their official capacity, unauthorized by any Regulation; 2d, suits in which either of the parties is an European or an American, or is related to the commissioner, or is his servant or dependant, those in which the commissioner is personally interested in the suit, or in which the evidence could be more conveniently taken elsewhere, or where other sufficient reason exists why the commissioner should not take cognizance of the case; 3d, suits cognizable by the collector, viz. all disputes in regard to the tenures of land and its rent, and regarding the use of wells, tanks, water-courses, roads to fields, and boundaries. Suits of the two first classes are to be tried by the judge, or may be referred by him to his assistants. With these exceptions, all original suits, of whatever amount, are to be tried by native commissioners; they may be either filed in the commissioners' courts or referred to them by the judge.

41. Appeals from the decisions of native commissioners, when the amount of the suit does not exceed 5,000 rupees value, may be referred by the judge to the senior assistant.

42. By Regulation II. of 1830, it is provided, that decisions on appeals from the decisions of the native commissioners shall be open to appeal to the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut, in cases where the sum adjudged in confirmation of the commissioners' decree, or the amount at issue amounted to or exceeded 3,000 rupees value; and, if modified or reversed, the sum disallowed or at issue amounted to or exceeded 1,000 rupees. A special appeal to the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut is open in all cases under the prescribed rules.

43. By Regulation V. of 1830, sub-collectors are vested with the same powers as collectors in the decision of suits and appeals.

44. By Regulation VI. the collectors and sub-collectors are authorized to refer to the Komavisdars suits instituted under C. 8, Regulation XVII. of 1827, when the amount does not exceed 500 rupees. Appeals from the decisions of assistant collectors and Komavisdars are open to the collector or sub-collector, and a further appeal to the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut; when, if the decree was confirmed, the sum adjudged or at issue amounted to or exceeded 1,000 rupees, or if modified or reversed, the sum disallowed or at issue amounted to 200 rupees. A special appeal to the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut is open in all cases under the prescribed rules.

45. Regulation VII. of 1830, respecting Dharwar has been noticed above.

46. By Regulation XIII. powers of deciding civil suits may be granted by government to Jageerdars and others, according to a list furnished by government; these persons are to have authority to decide all original suits, of whatever amount, that may be filed in their courts, or referred to them by the judge. All persons residing in the jurisdiction of the Jageerdar must bring their suits before him, unless when the parties both agree to the contrary, or where one of the parties is an European or an American, or is the relation or dependant of the Jageerdar, and an objection is made on that ground. Suits so excepted, to be sent to the judge; the Jageerdar is to pass a written decree recording the proceedings held, and his judgment in every case. The decisions of the Jageerdars enumerated in the list shall be final; this, the Regulation says, is in conformity with right and authority by tenure. The decisions of other Jageerdars are to be appealable, some to the agent for Sirdars' claims and some to the judge, with a special appeal in certain cases to the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut. Decrees of a Jageerdar, are not to be set aside for want of form in the proceedings. Jageerdars to execute their own decrees.

47. By regulation XVIII. a joint judge was appointed to assist in the administration of civil justice in Poona. This subject we have before referred to.

48. We observe also that by Regulation I. of 1831, you extended the jurisdiction of the agent for Sirdars' claims to the cognizance of suits connected with land, its rent and produce, wherein persons of rank of the privileged classes are concerned, and which by the general Regulations were under the collector. Your proceedings which led to this enactment have not yet been received.

49. We must express to you our strong disapprobation of your adopting measures like these, not only without previous reference to us, but without making to us any communication on the subject. We expect to receive from you a distinct Report respecting these alterations.

50. In reference to the sentiments communicated to you in our despatch of the 27th May 1829, and to the remarks contained in the paragraphs 20 to 27 of the Calcutta Finance Committee's letter, dated 30 May 1829, which correspond very nearly with our own views; adverting also to the provisions of Regulation I. of 1831, we desire that you will reconsider the whole system of exemptions from the ordinary course of justice which are enjoyed by privileged persons under your Presidency. We direct that the lists of those persons be revised; that the names of all such as have no pretensions to be placed on a different footing from their neighbours in regard to the administration of justice, be struck out, that new names be not added without previous reference to us, and that every fair opportunity be taken of reducing the lists as much as possible.

51. We desire that the general reports of business in the civil courts may include an account of cases before the agent for Sirdars' claims.

(9.)—COPY of a LETTER from the Court of Directors, to the Bombay Government; dated 28th March 1832.

We proceed to reply to the paragraphs of your Letter noticed in the margin,* which refer to the Reports on police and criminal justice.

We had not till the end of 1831 received any general report from you on the periodical statements furnished to your government from the criminal department to any later period than the year 1827, nor have we found on your Consultations any statements later than those for 1828. The Circuit Reports for your Presidency are not only very irregularly supplied, but for a considerable time they have not been noticed in your letters. We cannot pass over these irregularities without expressing our marked dissatisfaction at such neglect. We desire that in future the necessary documents may be duly prepared and forwarded to us punctually.

We proceed to offer such remarks as have occurred to us on an examination of the statements from 1825 to 1828, and the reports accompanying them. The statements for the Deccan are more incomplete than those for the Old Provinces.

The following is an Account of the number of Complaints said to have been preferred to the several authorities in both Divisions of the Country, and of the persons apprehended, from 1825 to 1828:

Capital punishments	16	18	12	25	—	5	7	11

The unequal numbers of persons punished by the magistrates and criminal judges, and Court of Circuit in the Old Provinces, and in the Deccan, may be accounted for in some degree by the powers of the officers being different in the two divisions; but there are some other very remarkable differences in the statements. The number of complaints, especially those cognizable by natives, and the number of persons apprehended, are very inconsiderable in the Deccan, compared with those in the Old Provinces. In the Old Provinces, the numbers acquitted by the magistrates and their assistants, and by the heads of villages and districts, are very small in proportion to the numbers convicted. The numbers punished by the heads of villages and districts in the Old Provinces, are very great in proportion to those in the Deccan. These numbers are so very disproportionate, in reference to the supposed population of the two divisions,* as to throw great doubt on the accuracy of the returns.

8. We desire that in furnishing these statements, the Sudder Foujdarry Adawlut will notice particularly any remarkable differences which appear to require explanation; and will account for them as well as they can.

9. The Deccan having been now placed under the same general system as the Old Provinces, and the powers of the magistrates and criminal judges having been made alike in both divisions, we trust that in future there will be no material dissimilarity in the returns, except in regard to matters which will be sufficiently explained by the circumstances of the different districts.

10. An Account corresponding with that which we have above given for the Old Provinces, in the years 1825 to 1828, of the number of persons sentenced to punishment under the several heads, should be furnished to us for the Deccan in each year from 1819 in both divisions; and it should be noticed whether the offences for which persons were executed, were for crimes including or not including murder.

11. It has long been the practice in Bengal for the local officers to furnish periodical reports of crimes ascertained to have been committed in their several districts. We desire to have corresponding returns from your Presidency. You will procure from Bengal a copy of the forms which have been found most convenient there, and you will adopt them, with such alterations as you may think appropriate. These returns should be transmitted by the magistrate, through the Zillah judge, to the Sudder Foujdarry Adawlut, and every care should be taken to ensure their correctness.

We are your loving friends,

APPENDIX, No. II.

A SELECTION of Papers containing Discussions relative to the Measures recommended by the Home Authorities in 1814, and the Modifications introduced into the Indian Codes.

(1.)—COPY of a LETTER from the Bengal Government to the Court of Directors ; dated the 22d February 1827.

Honourable Sirs :

(1.) Letter from the
Bengal
Government,
22d Feb. 1827.

Para. 1. In your letter of the 8th December 1824, you have enjoined us to furnish a specific reply to your Honourable Court's despatch of the 9th November 1814, reviewing the Judicial Institutions under the Presidency of Fort William, and suggesting various important modifications in the system then in force for the administration of Civil and Criminal Justice, and for the management of the Police.

2. The separate letters addressed to your Honourable Court, under dates the 7th of February 1817, and 1st of September 1820, and various incidental notices in other despatches, have apprized your Honourable Court of the proceedings adopted by the Supreme Government, either in consequence of or in immediate connection with the instructions communicated in your despatch above referred to ; you have been furnished with the Reports of the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut, and Nizamut Adawlut, the Boards of Revenue, the Superintendents of Police, and the subordinate officers in the Judicial and Revenue Departments, who were required to submit their sentiments on the modifications proposed by your Honourable Court ; and the sentiments of the Marquess of Hastings, Mr. Dowdeswell, and Mr. Stuart, on various points connected with your instructions, are recorded in their Minutes, dated respectively the 2d October 1815, the 22d September 1819, and the 21st October 1820.

3. The circumstances which opposed any unanimous or immediate decision upon the merits of the various measures which you had suggested, are very clearly and forcibly detailed in Mr. Stuart's minute ; and we are persuaded, that in consideration of those circumstances, of the subsequent changes in the members of the Supreme Government, and of the pressing demands on the attention of the Governor-general in Council during the continuance of the war with Ava, your Honourable Court will be disposed to view with indulgence the delay which has occurred in replying to your instructions.

4. The information which was furnished to us by the Government of Fort St. George in the year 1818, and more especially the tenor of the Reports of the Sudder Adawlut, and Board of Revenue under that Presidency, did not justify the inference that the corresponding changes which had been introduced in the year 1816 in the judicial institutions of that Presidency, were likely to prove very successful, or to fulfil the expectations under which they had been enjoined and carried into effect ; while the Report of the Judicial Commissioners at Madras, dated the 15th October 1818, was equally calculated to induce the Supreme Government not to introduce precipitately in these provinces a system, the real merits and advantages of which, could not, in the opinion of the Commissioners themselves, be ascertained until it had been pursued for a period of six or seven years.

5. We now proceed, in conformity with your repeated injunctions, to submit to your Honourable Honourable Court's consideration our views and sentiments on the various suggestions contained in your despatch of the 9th of November 1814.

6. We shall advert to those suggestions, and to the grounds on which they are recommended, in the order in which they are treated in that despatch. Where the modifications in our judicial institutions, which you have suggested, appear to us open to decided objection, we shall candidly state those objections for your further deliberation. We shall explain the extent to which we have already given, or propose to give effect to other parts of your instructions, or to measures directed to the same end, which have appeared to our predecessors and to ourselves calculated to promote the public interests.

7. In reviewing the administration of civil justice under the Presidency of Fort William your Honourable Court have first adverted to the heavy arrears of regular civil suits depending before the several judicial tribunals (and which are supposed by your Honourable Court to form only a small proportion of the cases of individuals who stand in need of judicial protection), as a proof of the insufficiency of the existing provisions for administering civil justice within the extensive and populous range of territory under this government.

8. You have referred * more particularly to those injuries to which the ryots are exposed from excess of collections, or undue exactions made from them by the zemindars, and their under-tenants, and to disputes regarding the right of possession in land, crops, or water-courses; you have observed † that the great subdivision of zemindaree property from the sales of land, and the extended operation of the Hindoo and Mahomedan laws of inheritance, are likely still further to augment litigation, and that the increasing demands for justice which must in consequence be experienced, will render the present system far more unequal to its proposed purposes than it was when your Honourable Court's letter was written; and that as the wants of the system could not be adequately supplied by an augmentation of the European part of the judicial establishment, the remedy must be sought by employing natives in conducting this branch of internal regulation.

9. In the general justness of your Honourable Court's remarks under the foregoing heads, we readily avow our concurrence.

10. Other causes, however, besides those which are assigned by your Honourable Court, or those which can justly be attributed to the defective system or organization of our civil tribunals, may be adduced to account for the existing mass of litigation, and for the daily increasing number of applications to our Courts, for the redress of real or supposed grievances.

11. Amongst these causes may be reckoned the growing confidence of the people in the general proceedings of our tribunals, and the progressive demands arising from a rapidly increasing population, from extended cultivation, from the rise in the value of landed property, from the progress of internal trade and commerce, and from the general prosperity of the country.

12. It is needless to remark, how much the proceedings of all our tribunals are delayed and embarrassed by the notorious disregard for truth, so generally displayed by the natives in giving evidence, and from their want of moral principle, evils which cannot be mitigated or remedied by any direct or immediate modification of our judicial institutions; but, having a far more extensive operation than all of the foregoing causes, we are led to ascribe the alleged inadequacy of our civil tribunals in the Lower Provinces to most the demands upon them, to the precipitation with which the permanent settlement was hurried into effect, without previously defining the relative rights and interests of the zemindars and other landholders, and the various classes of the cultivating population, without providing such means as would have enabled the courts of justice justice to ascertain those rights and interests, by recourse to recorded documents, in those controversies which form directly or indirectly, not only the most numerous, but often the most embarrassing of all the questions which are brought forward for judicial adjudication.

13. The rules now in force for ascertaining, adjusting, and recording those rights and interests in the districts into which a permanent settlement has not yet been introduced, will, if it is found practicable to carry them into effect in the spirit and to the extent contemplated by government, go far to render the future administration of civil justice in those portions of our territory simple and efficient.

14. In very few of the districts so situated, are the arrears of civil suits heavy, and where they are so (in Allahabad, Cawnpore, and Goruckpore, for instance), the cause of the arrear is clearly traceable to local defects and irregularities in the past system of revenue management.

15. Controversies regarding succession, inheritance, adoption, marriage, dower, gift, and other questions more immediately connected with Hindoo and Mahomedan law, form a comparatively minute portion of the number of suits brought into our courts. Claims or disputes relative to debts, simple contracts, mercantile transactions, and other dealings of ordinary occurrence, or for personal damages, though necessarily more numerous, admit generally of easy adjustment. The real pressure upon our tribunals arises from the mass of litigation connected with the rights, tenures, and interests of the proprietors and occupiers of land. This pressure could not, we apprehend, be removed by any modification in the nature and description of our tribunals. It is now too late to apply an effectual remedy to an evil which might have been guarded against when the permanent settlement was formed, but it is and will be our anxious wish to adopt such measures, both in the Revenue and Judicial Departments as may be feasible, with a view to define the rights and interests of the cultivators, and to secure those rights.

16. In connection with this subject, we beg to refer your Honourable Court to the documents noticed in the margin,* copies of which accompany this despatch as separate numbers in the packet.

17. In the present stage of the business, it is sufficient briefly to notice the principal objects contemplated in the draft of the regulation proposed by Mr. Harrington for more fully declaring and securing the rights of khodkasht ryots, and other permanent under-tenants of lands.

18. They are as follow :

1st. To explain the intention of the existing regulations in recognizing the hereditary and transferable rights of zemindars, independent talookdars, and other proprietors of malgoozarry lands, as not meant to abrogate or abridge the prescriptive rights and privileges of dependent talookdars, hereditary or permanent ryots, or any other description of under-tenants or cultivators of the soil ; to provide expressly for securing the rights and privileges of under-tenants, possessing an heritable and transferable property in their tenures, as well as of those entitled to a permanent right of occupancy on certain conditions ; and to declare the restricted property and interest of the zemindars, independent talookdars, and other sudder malgoozars, with respect to lands occupied by permanent under-tenants, such as those above mentioned ; also, to declare a similar reservation of rights of property or occupancy, belonging to the actual possessors or cultivators of land included in jageers, or other lakheraj grants.

2dly. To explain the real and sole objects intended by parts of Regulations V. and XVIII. 1812, which are supposed to have been very generally misconstrued and misapplied, plied, as vesting the zemindars and other superior landholders with a discretion in raising the rents of their under-tenants, not before possessed by them under the ancient laws and usage of the country.

* Civil Consultations, 19th Oct. 1826, Nos. 5 to 11. Ditto, 8th Feb. 1827. Nos. 8 to 15.

3dly. To explain the rules passed for enabling sudder malgoozars to realize the rents payable to them, as not meant to limit the actual rights of any description of landholder or tenant; and to amend the existing rules relative to the pottalis and rents of khloodkasht ryots, and other permanent under-tenants, entitled to hold their tenures at a fixed rent, or a rent determinable by the rates of the pergunnah, or other known rule of adjustment, by declaring such under-tenants not liable to the payment of any enhanced rent, without a written engagement to pay the same: or, if the justness of the demand be contested, without a judicial decision in a regular suit.

4thly. To declare the intention of the existing rules of process which have been prescribed for sudder malgoozars desirous of enhancing the rents of their under-tenants, with a further enactment, when the sudder malgoozar may proceed by distraint for the recovery of enhanced rent, without a specific engagement, and the justness of the demand may be disputed by the under-tenant. The demand of enhanced rent not to be recoverable by distraint in such cases, without proof of the claimant's title thereto in a regular suit; and no khloodkasht ryot, or other permanent under-tenant, to be ejected from his tenure on a plea of default and forfeiture, without a regular decree of court. Dispossession by force or threats, in opposition to this rule, to be cognizable by the magistrate, under Regulation XV. 1824, and to be punishable, on conviction, by a penalty equal to three times the annual rent of the land.

5thly. To provide for a careful investigation and decision of the rights and interests of the parties, in all cases of disputed permanent tenures, between superior landholders, farmers, or managers, and subordinate tenants of malgoozarry land; as well as in similar cases of dispute between holders or managers of lakheraj land, and the owners, occupants, or cultivators of lands in such tenures, and to make provision for the requisite accounts and information being furnished in such cases by the village putwary and pergunnah canoongo.

6thly, and lastly. To establish certain general rules for the guidance of the courts of judicature, collectors, or other public officers, who may be authorized to adjust and determine the rents payable by ryots or other under-tenants of land, as well in regular and summary suits as in all other cases whatever, in which the officers of government may be empowered by the regulations in force, or by the special orders of the Governor-general in Council, to adjust the rents payable by the cultivators and under-tenants of land, especially by such as possess a permanent right of occupancy in their tenures, subject to a fixed rent, or a rent determinable by the rate of the pergunnah, or other known rate of adjustment.

19. The detailed provisions of the proposed regulation will demand the most mature consideration, and we shall avail ourselves of the experience of the Boards of Revenue and the suggestions of other competent officers, before finally enacting the regulation in question; and we have brought the subject under your notice in its present immature state, chiefly with a view of satisfying your Honourable Court of our anxiety to meet the wishes you have so frequently expressed on this very difficult and important question.

20. We now proceed to advert to the specific remedies suggested by your Honourable Court for the more effectual administration of civil justice.

21. In the fifth paragraph of the Report of the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut, dated the 9th March 1818, the suggestions are divided into twelve classes; but it appears to us that they may be conveniently arranged under three general heads, viz.

1st. Such as relate to the more extended employment, in the distribution of civil justice,

(1.) Letter from the
Bengal
Government,
22d Feb. 1827.

tice, of native agency, and especially in the form of punchayets, and in the persons of those who are considered to be the permanent and natural village authorities, or to possess influence as the heads of particular classes, professions, and tribes of the inhabitants.*

2d. Such as relate to the limitation of appeals; the simplification and abbreviation of the forms, proceedings and processes of our established courts; the improvement of the office of vakeel; the reduction of law expenses, and the suggested institution of a new court of Sudder Dewanny Adawlut.†

3d. Such as relate to the transfer from the judicial to the revenue authorities of claims regarding land, rent, distraint, undue exactions and boundaries, and to the improvement of the existing rules on these subjects, as well as regarding the interchange of written engagements between the landholders and the ryots.‡

22. With regard to the plan of investing the munduls, mocuddums, gomashas, or other heads of villages, however designated, with judicial powers, we would observe, that the number of mouzas or villages comprised within the provinces to which our code of regulations extends, is assumed, according to different calculations, at from 260,000 to 400,000; and that whatever may have been the case in former times, there are not now to be found in a great majority of those villages, any persons either actually possessing or supposed to possess the influence, authority, advantages, or emoluments appertaining to the class of officers contemplated by your Honourable Court, as the natural and permanent heads of the village institutions.

23. In Bengal, especially, the real head of the village, or in other words, the person possessing the chief influence and authority, is either the proprietor of the village, or the gomashtha or agent, paid and employed by the zemindar or farmer to manage and collect his rents, or the under-renter of such zemindar or farmer. These are not the natural or permanent village authorities contemplated by your Honourable Court, but the very individuals who, either directly or indirectly, are the oppressors of the cultivating classes, by undue exactions and other injurious acts, which it is the object of your Honourable Court to remedy; and it is obvious that to confer judicial powers on such persons would be to deliver the ryots bound hand and foot into the power of their greatest enemies.

24. We observe, indeed, that such powers have been conferred on renters of villages in some parts of the Madras territories, but that the measure was earnestly deprecated by many of your best informed servants under that Presidency; and unless the standard of the native character is much higher in that part of India than it is here, we should anticipate from its adoption, results very opposite from those benevolent objects to which your Honourable Court's instructions were directed.

25. Excluding therefore from those on whom it is proposed to confer judicial powers, as heads of the villages, the resident proprietors and farmers, the sub-renters of proprietors and farmers, and their gomashas, stewards, or agents, the first difficulty which would present itself in constituting the heads of villages to be village moonsiffs, would be the selection of the individuals best entitled to the designation of mundul or mocuddum, and as such possessing, or supposed to possess, a natural and permanent local authority as head of the village.

26. We are satisfied that in the Lower Provinces individuals so qualified will rarely be found to exist, and that where the title of mundul or mocuddum may yet be recognised, the person so designated will still more rarely be found to enjoy any defined rights.

* Par. 43 to 62, and par 88 to 90, of the Court's Despatch.—Included in the 1st, 2d, 3d, 4th, and 18th heads of the Report of the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut.

† Par. 61 to 67 of the Honourable Court's Letter.—Included in the 5th, 6th, 7th and 8th heads, and in the 6th par. of the Report of the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut.

‡ Par. 68 to 87 of the Honourable Court's Letter.—Included in the 9th, 10th and 11th heads of the Report from the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut.

rights, privileges, or emoluments annexed to it. We may remark also, that amongst those who are from time to time designated as munduls or heads of villages, the title has been in some instances obtained, not by any greater opulence or rank, not by hereditary claims or any superiority of worth or intelligence, but by a greater turbulency and litigiousness of character, which has given them an ascendancy over their more timid and peaceable neighbours; and that in other cases a claim to the title is asserted by different individuals, which becomes the source of feuds and animosities between parties in the same village. But supposing that it were found practicable to trace and select individuals of the description contemplated by you, there would naturally arise a general objection on their part to undertake a novel duty without receiving some pay or emolument in compensation of their labour, responsibility, and loss of time; nor do we perceive with what justice this objection could be over-ruled, while, if they voluntarily consented to undertake the duty without remuneration, we could ascribe their willingness to do so to no other motive than the expectation of deriving illicit advantages from the power they would possess. In almost every instance it would be the interest of these heads of villages to conciliate the favour and good will of the zemindar or farmer, or their agents; and it is the concurrent opinion of all our best informed public officers, that it would be impossible to place any confidence in the justice or impartiality of such village moonsiffs, in cases in which the interests of the ryots and inferior classes of inhabitants might be opposed to those of the zemindars or farmers, or of their agents.

27. Of functionaries thus characterized, there would be on a general average between 7,000 and 8,000 in each district, who, under similar rules to those established under the Presidency of Fort St. George, would be authorized to hear, try, and determine of their own authority and without appeal, such suits as might be preferred to them for sums of money or other personal property, not exceeding in value or amount 10 rupees; to hear, try, and determine in their capacity of arbitrators similar suits to the amount of 100 rupees; to proceed ex parte if the defendant should refuse or neglect to attend; to take the oral depositions of witnesses without committing them to writing; to fine recusing witnesses, as well as parties, vakeels or witnesses for disrespect: or to imprison them for 12 hours if the fine be not paid; and to cause execution of their decrees to be enforced by a sale of the defendant's property, unless charged before the Zillah judge with corruption or gross partiality within 30 days from the date of the decree.

28. These powers must, under the principles of the Madras rules, be imposed in each village on some one individual who may be designated the head of the village, however reluctant he may be to exercise them, whatever may be his character or qualifications, or, what appears of still more importance, his relation to the zemindar or farmer.

29. The only control which can be exercised over them is that which goes to prevent the execution of their decisions in cases in which they may appear both to the Zillah judge and provincial court to have been guilty of corruption or gross partiality; and the rule which permits either party in a case to prosecute them for damages in the Zillah court for any oppressive and unwarranted act of authority. But, limited and weak as this control undoubtedly is, we are satisfied, that in this part of India, the Zillah judges and provincial courts would not be able to investigate and decide upon the complaints which would be brought before them, with the despatch necessary to render the control practically useful; while if the powers of superintendence to be exercised by the Zillah judge were to be extended so as to be really efficient, the labour devolving upon him would preclude him from paying proper attention to his more important duties.

30. In concluding their review of this branch of the subject, the Court of Sudder Dewanny Adawlut have expressed their sentiments in the following terms: "We are decidedly of opinion that every encouragement should be given to the munduls, mocudums, and other heads of villages to arbitrate and settle, as heretofore, any trivial disputes between the inhabitants of their respective villages which may be voluntarily submitted to their adjustment and award. But on a general consideration of the objections which have been stated, we must deliberately repeat the doubt already expressed by by us on the expediency of vesting them with any regular judicial authority, and a defined civil jurisdiction, in the numerous villages which subsist in every Zillah under this Presidency."

31. Concurring as we do in the foregoing sentiments, we must add our firm conviction that no modifications of the system adopted at Madras for the regulation of the office of village moonsiff, which would not be subversive of the principle on which that regulation is founded, could render the class of officers indicated generally useful in the regular administration of civil justice in this part of India; but that, on the contrary, the attempt to introduce a similar system in Bengal would be attended with nearly insurmountable difficulties; and that if it were introduced, it would be productive of results in the highest degree injurious to the interests of those very classes for whose benefit it is more particularly designed.

32. In the foregoing remarks on the office of village moonsiff, we have not adverted to that part of your Honourable Court's suggestions, in which it is proposed that village punchayets should be assembled under the authority of the village moonsiff, either to aid the latter in the trial of civil claims brought before him in that capacity, or to act as arbitrators in other civil cases voluntarily submitted to the punchayet for award; and it will be convenient to consider this question in connection with the corresponding though more extensive authority proposed to be vested in district moonsiffs, in regard to the assembling of district punchayets for similar objects.

33. According to the best information which we possess, the punchayets, under the Hindoo law and practice of former ages, had no jurisdiction or cognizance of clauses, except such as were voluntarily submitted to them by the parties for arbitration. The punchayets are expressly declared to be constituted at the request of the parties; and the consent of the members of the punchayet to act in that capacity was to be obtained by solicitation, presents, or other means. Such assemblies are declared not to be established by the operation of the law, nor by the act of the King, though a special reference to punchayets of individual cases depending before the King or the established judges is also recognized; but it appears from various writers on Hindoo law, that the awards of punchayets were always open to an appeal, either to a superior assembly, or to the established courts of justice, over which the King was the tribunal of last resort. This mode of adjusting civil controversies by arbitration, differs not in principle from the systems generally adopted in other countries, and it is a subject of regret to ourselves and to our judicial officers, that the natives cannot be prevailed upon to have more frequent recourse to it.

34. Various reasons may be assigned for the reluctance so generally exhibited by the natives of this part of India to resort to such a mode of adjusting their differences, even when most strongly urged to do so by our public officers, whether in their official or private capacity.

35. We firmly believe that whatever may be the defects of our judicial tribunals, the natives repose more confidence in them than in the judgment of their neighbours, or of such of their fellow-countrymen as could be induced to furnish their unpaid assistance in the adjustment of disputes. The latter are not willing to sacrifice their time, without remuneration, for the benefit of their neighbours or for the public good. They know that their award will in all human probability make one of the parties their enemy, and they are too well aware of the character of their countrymen to doubt that the first mark of such enmity would generally be an accusation, whether just or unfounded, that they had given such award under the influence of partiality or corruption.

36. The rules of Regulation XXII. 1816, regarding the establishment of a subsidiary police in the chief cities and towns, provided for the appointment of chowkeedars and the assessment of the inhabitants through the agency of punchayets, consisting of the most respectable inhabitants of each mohulla; the negligence of those punchayets, and the abuses practised by them, even under the immediate eye of the magistrate, show how little is to be expected from the aid of native society in conducting the details of the simplest municipal regulation.

37. It seems indeed to us, as it has done to many of the civil officers now or formerly belonging to this establishment, who have entered upon a discussion of the punchayet system, that it has seldom been resorted to in any part of India as a means of terminating civil controversies regarding property, except in times and places where the government had failed to provide any tolerable system for the equitable administration of justice.

38. Mr. Fullerton has expressed his full persuasion that the real advantage of the punchayet mode of administering justice was, that at the time it prevailed, there existed no other, and that if a man had no punchayet to settle his cause, he obtained no settlement at all.

39. Mr. Macsween, the judge and magistrate of Agra, in a Report dated the 5th June last, has described the administration of civil justice, and the operation of the punchayet system in pergunnah Gobarthun, in the following terms :

“As to civil justice, it was not uncommon for a plaintiff to pay money to a foudar to induce him to support a claim, which was usually done by sending armed men to enforce payment, without any inquiry ; applications which were favourably received by the rajah, were similarly enforced. Many questions of marriage, inheritance, caste, claims to land, &c. &c. were referred to punchayets, which here, as elsewhere, were corrupt and prejudiced. Questions were referred to them, because each party hoped by some corrupt means to gain the cause ; not from any confidence in the honesty of the punchayet, or in the justice of the cause. Armed men were not unfrequently assembled to support each party, and the meeting occasionally terminated in a serious affray, instead of a decision of the disputed rights.”

40. Your Honourable Court are aware that Gobarthun is a place held in peculiar sanctity by the Hindoo ; its population is almost exclusively composed of Hindoos, and those chiefly brahmins, rajpoots, and jauts ; and it has been for a considerable period subject to the administration of the Hindoo government of Bhurtpore.

41. The province of Bundelcund also is one in which the Hindoo usages had been less affected by foreign rule than most other parts of Hindoostan. The system of punchayet, as it existed in Bundelcund, is thus described by the late Mr. Wanchope :

“With respect to the system alluded to in the 45th paragraph of the Honourable Court’s Letter for the settlement of disputes by punchayte, under the superintendence of mocuddums or heads of the villages, I do not find that any established system of that nature ever had existence in this province. It is true that punchayte or arbitration was very generally resorted to for the settlement of disputes of all kinds under the former government ; but when we come to examine the manner in which those settlements were conducted and their awards executed, we shall find little to regret from the disuse of the system, or rather from its improved existence (for it still prevails) under our government.

“Under the former government of this district, the superintendence or management of punchaytes was never, from the earliest times that I have been able to trace, confined to any particular individuals or body of men whatever ; and the consequence was, that they were very often either futile in their results, or terminated in a murderous conflict between the parties and their adherents. The selection of the arbitrators proceeded always from the disputants themselves, and they were chosen, generally, from the most respectable of the tribe or profession to which the parties belonged. If the subject was rent, the head zemindars or canongoes were generally chosen, but residents of neighbouring villages were commonly preferred to their own townsmen. Boundary disputes were settled in the same way ; and a large assemblage of men from all the surrounding villages were often invited by the parties to witness the settlement. This almost invariably led to violent affrays, and the loss of many lives, and which again branched out into into innumerable feuds, laying the foundation of continued future disorder and bloodshed. The officers of the former government seldom interfered, until matters got to such extremes as to endanger the realization of their revenue, which was the primary, I may say the only object of their care, they then interposed their influence to bring about a final adjustment of the dispute. But in proportion as the former government was more indifferent to the peace of society, and to the security of individual rights, and less capable of maintaining them than the present government is, in the same proportion will the general condition of the people be found to be ameliorated by the effects of our system of management. Numerous as are the evils and inconveniences incidental to our present judicial administration, it is quite fallacious to suppose that the body of the people were happier under their own system of settling their disputes, or that their interests will ever be promoted by any system which tends to augment the responsibility of native agents, or to separate that responsibility from European superintendence. Until a principle of public virtue, regard to truth, and liberal and enlarged notions take the place of the opposite vices which now characterize the generality of all natives, we must in vain look for the correct discharge of any trust by native agency not under the immediate and active superintendence of European authority."

"As the disputes connected with land and its produce were generally settled by punchayets composed of zemindars or canoongoes (the putwarry will never admitted to the punch further than to record the proceedings), so were the claims and accounts of bankers settled by arbitrators, consisting of the most respectable of that profession; and the same obtained with other professions; but the habits of those classes being more peaceable than those of the zemindars, the greatest evil arising from the inefficacy of the system with respect to them, lay in the frequent futility of the award, from inability to enforce it. Dhurna was the principal resource for recovering debts in the absence of any regular tribunal to try and enforce their claims."

42. The following is an extract from a letter from the Delhi Commissioner, recorded on the proceedings noted in the margin :*

"The Board are not aware that any description of persons resident in the Delhi territory can come under the denomination of heads of caste. The principal assistants (the Board remark) are in the habit of submitting boundary and other disputes to the arbitration of a certain number of persons usually named by the litigants, but it seldom happens that by such means disputes are permanently adjusted, partly from the want of confidence which one native has in the discernment and just motives of another, and partly because they generally place greater reliance in the justice of the European officers."

43. We add in this place the following extract from a letter from the Government of Bombay, addressed to your Honourable Court, dated the 31st May 1826; paragraph 8 : "The fact represented by the collector of Poonah, that Punchayets are less resorted to than formerly, deserves attention. This, which appears to be the case elsewhere, as well as the great increase of the demand for justice, we are disposed to attribute in a great measure to the improved system of administration, by which it is brought near every man's home, and is of speedier operation."

44. In a letter from the resident at Nagpore, dated the 16th December 1826, para. 44, Mr. Jenkins has remarked, "that the experience of seven years in the principal city court has fully established the inefficiency of punchayets, when chosen by the parties themselves, as instruments for dispensing justice with either impartiality or celerity. It was found that the members of the punchayets usually considered themselves and acted as the partizans of the party by whom they were chosen; in numerous cases it was found impossible to get them to come to any decision at all, the adherents on one side positively refusing to concur in a decision adverse to the interests of the person by whom they were elected, elected, so that there remained to the court only the alternative of confirming the award of the other three members, two of whom had been chosen by the other party, and the other appointed by the court, or of itself taking up the cause and trying it de novo. In other cases, where a direct refusal to join in the award was not offered, still the ends of public justice were greatly obstructed by the endless delays and shifts of the members chosen by the party who could not hope to obtain a decision in his own favour, and who therefore only aimed at preventing one being come to at all. Much embarrassment also was constantly occasioned by frequent references to the court on points, the determination of which involved an investigation of the whole matter in dispute, but without which the punchayet objected to going on with its proceedings. To obviate these evils, many and repeated attempts were made, but they were attended with but partial and temporary success, or with utter failure.

45. The system now established at Nagpore with regard to punchayets, as described in Mr. Jenkins' Report, does not appear to us likely to succeed better than that above condemned.

46. It is in fact merely a compulsory reference of difficult cases to individuals, who are previously summoned to attend the court, and who are aided by the native officers of the court.

47. On our proceedings of the 25th May last, your Honourable Court will find recorded a letter from Mr. Wilder, the civil commissioner in the Saugor and Nerbudda territories, forwarding reports from the several assistants in charge of districts under his authority, on the subject of the administration of civil and criminal justice, and of the police of those territories.

48. Your Honourable Court are aware that our code of regulations has not been extended to those territories, and that it has been our object to maintain in vigour such of the native institutions as could be rendered available for the objects of good government, and more especially to encourage a resort to punchayets in all practicable cases.

49. The several assistants employed under the civil commissioners have explained the nature of the cases which they are in the habit of referring to punchayets, the mode of assembling them, and the character of their proceedings.

50. There is some difference in the practice observed in these respects by the several assistants, as well as in the opinions they entertain of the efficiency of the punchayets in facilitating the administration of justice.

51. They are generally, however, favourable to the institution, and although it does not appear to have been found safe or expedient to refer any criminal cases to the punchayet, they have been very generally employed, when both parties have agreed, in the investigation of questions relating to marriage and inheritance, to local usages and customs, and of disputes involving an adjustment of intricate accounts.

52. Mr. Stirling, the assistant in charge of Saugor, observes, that petty affrays and disputes regarding boundaries are constantly referred to punchayets, but that the intrigues of both parties frequently protract the decision; and at the commencement of each season an affray may be anticipated, unless some preventive measure is adopted.

53. Captain Hardy, the assistant at Huttee, observes, that "no criminal cases, however petty, which if proved would call for punishment, have been referred by me for examination or for decision to any of the native officers of the court, or to individual referees; and for the administration of criminal justice, I have not in any instance had recourse to a punchayet; but in cases of complaint evidently frivolous and not requiring any serious notice, as one member of a family having been struck by another, or the same occurrence between two inhabitants of the same village, or verbal disputes with abusive language amongst the lower orders, I have been in the habit of referring without any written notice, by a verbal message, to the head man of the village where the parties reside, or to the head of the caste or trade to which they belong, or to the tehsildar, dar, directing him to settle the business according to their own usage; and as such complaints are generally made in a moment of irritation, they are easily and quickly decided by him, in a manner which appears to give entire satisfaction.

"The manner in which punchayets are in general appointed is, for each party, in my presence, to name two members, and to agree in the choice of a sirpunje; and if, as sometimes happens, they cannot agree on this last point, the president is named by me; the parties execute in court a written engagement to abide by the decision of the punchayet, who again, I believe, take another similar one previously to commencing their proceedings.

"The manner in which their proceedings are conducted does not differ from that in use in the other parts of this country, and I require from them either that their decision should be unanimous, or that the grounds of dissent should be fully stated, when I form my own opinion, and either confirm the decision of the majority or order a fresh punchayet, or take the judgment of the case into my own hands, as appears most likely to advance substantial justice."

54. In noticing the advantages and disadvantages of the system, Captain Hardy further remarks, that the disadvantages appear to be the great delay which in general takes place before the punchayets make their award, and the consequent accumulation of suits on the file; the difficulty of quickening the proceedings of courts where the members are not paid, and where the performance of the duty at all is optional with them; the inconvenient frequency of the employment of the few men able and willing to undertake the duty, who live at or near the sudder station, and where the duty is for the most part performed by a limited number; the liability of individuals of this number to become subject to the calumnies and enmity of disappointed suitors, of which instances had been brought to his notice equally vexations to respectable people, and difficult to suppress. Captain Hardy proceeds as follows: "I have found the assistance of punchayets of the greatest utility, and should always wish to refer to them a great number of cases, especially those relating to caste or family, and those which require the examination of shop books or muhajunee accounts. In either of these kinds of cases the members would be from the same class as the parties; and besides the advantage of previous habits and knowledge, they have leisure for the examination of intricate accounts, which from the variety of his duties the assistant can seldom have.

"I think, however, that the employment of punchayets should not be resorted to in ordinary cases, which can be decided equally well or better by the assistant after the examination of evidence; because from their constitution they are necessarily slow; a frequent call on them for the performance of a voluntary and unpaid duty would be found inconvenient to the members, and making it too common would render the character of those courts less respected, and would produce by degrees carelessness and inefficiency."

55. Captain Lowe, the assistant in charge of Baitool, after explaining the form and nature of the proceedings of punchayets, observes: "I must, however, state, that I have not found among any description of people that confidence in, and partiality for punchayets, which all my previous information had led me to expect. On the contrary, there is hardly a question of any kind arising among any description of people, which the parties do not generally prefer having decided by myself; even in cases of expulsion from caste and breaches of contract of marriage between children in consequence of some alleged falling off from the purity of caste in their parents or relations (questions which it would naturally be supposed punchayets are best able to determine, and to which I always refer them if the parties are willing), the people seem generally best satisfied when I decide them myself, on hearing the testimony of a few of the most respectable of their own caste.

"The questions which I am chiefly in the habit of referring to the punchayets are those in which there are disputed village and other accounts, in which it is exceedingly difficult difficult to determine the degree of credit due to those produced by each party ; and also claims of debt of long standing, in which the payment of the whole, with interest, being impossible, there is a hope that some compromise may be effected ; but generally all cases in which there appears any chance of my getting at the truth, I reserve for my own decision."

56. From the foregoing quotations, your Honourable Court will perceive that the punchayet, as it exists in the Saugor and Nerbudda territories, is not a fixed local tribunal, but a system of simple arbitration agreed to by the parties, and encouraged by our European officers.

57. In this form, it is doubtless productive of advantage, and the disposition to agree to a reference to arbitration should be carefully cherished, though we apprehend it will not be permanent, or long available, as an efficient means of adjusting civil controversies regarding real or personal property.

58. Your Honourable Court will observe the reluctance generally felt by our European officers, to allow any charges of a criminal nature to be referred to punchayets or heads of villages, and we think the reluctance a natural and proper one.

59. In several trials for heinous crimes perpetrated within the Saugor and Nerbudda territories, which have been lately submitted for the revision of the Supreme Government, we have seen instances in which heads of villages and village assemblies have pronounced sentences of death, and have caused them to be carried into effect against individuals, in one case against a whole family on the charge of witchcraft and sorcery. Village courts of the same description existed formerly in Ramghur. The principal people in the neighbourhood formed a deliberative assembly, tried, condemned to death, and enforced its sentence on those convicted of witchcraft. It is needless to say that immediate measures were in both instances adopted to repress such practices.

60. Sir Henry Strachey gives a similar instance of a case which was tried by him at Allahabad, and states, that in most cases of this sort the members of the village courts united in their own persons the characters of prosecutor, magistrate, judge, jury, and executioner.

61. We have adverted to these facts, and many more might be adduced, as tending to show that the punchayet or village assembly, viewed as a fixed tribunal for the administration of civil and criminal justice, is the institution of rude and barbarous tribes, rather than of countries with a dense population, and in which trade, commerce, agriculture, and consequent opulence are already widely diffused, and are progressively extending themselves under the protection of a regular and mild government.

62. But whatever opinions may be entertained on the utility of punchayet, as a means for facilitating the satisfactory settlement of civil controversies regarding real or personal property, where the institution is found to exist, we apprehend that it was not in the contemplation of your Honourable Court that it should be established in those tracts of our dominions where it had not existed, or where, though it may have existed at some distant period, it had been long disused and forgotten.

63. Such, we have no hesitation in saying, is the case throughout almost every part of the territories subject to the ordinary regulations of this Presidency.

64. We would refer your Honourable Court to the answers of the respectable civil servants in England to your interrogatories circulated in 1813, who have almost without exception avowed their ignorance of the practical existence of such an institution as a court for the settlement of civil disputes regarding real and personal property. To introduce them now would be to introduce a system unknown to the inhabitants, and very ill-calculated to conciliate their regard or their confidence.

65. In the foregoing remarks we have referred to the punchayet as a court or tribunal for the settlement of claims to real or personal property. As an institution for regulating questions of caste and of religious discipline, of alleged breaches of the conventional rules or bye-laws (if they may be so termed) of trades, professions, societies or classes of people united for civil or religious purposes, we consider the punchayet to be highly useful. Such punchayets, aided by the heads of professions, &c. exercise a species of jurisdiction for which our tribunals are peculiarly ill qualified, and it is highly important that the jurisdiction should remain as long as possible in those hands in which it is placed by the voluntary acquiescence of the parties most deeply interested.

66. The instances in which this kind of jurisdiction has been objected to, or its awards brought into question before our regular courts, are very rare. The jurisdiction relates to matters which the parties would be generally averse to bring under the cognizance of our public courts; and the awards can be carried into effect by those who pass them without other aid, inasmuch as they are sanctioned by the general voice and authority of the members of the caste or brotherhood.

67. But the attempt on our part to regulate the authority and proceedings of such punchayets, or even to recognize them by any formal legislative enactment, would, we fear, destroy their efficiency, and lead to their being abused and ultimately abandoned. Our judicial authorities are aware that these punchayets are the proper tribunals for the satisfactory adjudication of the class of cases which come under their ordinary cognizance, and are sensible that all interference with their awards and proceedings should be studiously avoided, except in very rare instances, where they may involve serious and extensive combinations affecting the public tranquillity.

68. It will be our object to encourage this feeling on every proper opportunity, and to repress any indication of a contrary tendency which may come to our knowledge. It is equally our wish and that of our judicial functionaries (interested as the latter are in the adoption of all proper means of reducing the arrear of business) to encourage a resort to arbitration in cases depending before them. The frequent efforts of our public officers to effect this object, not less by urgent recommendations in open cutcherry than by private advice and influence, are, we regret to state, very rarely successful. Some instances have occurred in which the attempt has been carried so far (amounting almost to compulsion) as to subject the public officer, though avowedly actuated by the most upright and honourable motives, to official animadversion, and we are persuaded that the reluctance of the natives, as well to submit their cases to arbitration as to act as arbitrators themselves, will preclude us from obtaining any material relief in the administration of civil justice by the use of punchayets as a court of arbitration to be voluntarily resorted to.

69. With this impression, we should view the system adopted at Madras, by which the heads of villages and district moonsiffs are empowered to enforce by fine and imprisonment the compulsory attendance of the native inhabitants of their villages or districts, to act as punchayets for the decision of civil claims, as likely to excite dissatisfaction, and to be open to great abuse.

70. The punchayet, unless an entire change should be effected in the present feelings of the inhabitants of this part of India, must, if assembled at all, be generally assembled by compulsion; bribes would be given to avoid the obnoxious duty: and the delegation of the proposed power, especially to the heads of villages, would in practice be the delegation of a power which would most undoubtedly be perverted to purposes of tyranny and extortion.

71. The measure, though adopted at Madras under circumstances infinitely more favourable, appears to have rendered no essential aid in the administration of justice; the number of controversies settled by the village and district punchayets in those territories bearing a very small proportion to the whole number decided by the judicial tribunals.

72. We are on the foregoing grounds decidedly adverse to the introduction of a formal and legalized part of our judicial system for the administration of civil justice at this Presidency, of the village and district punchayet institutions established in the provinces provinces under Fort St. George. The Sudder Dewanny Adawlut, the Board of Commissioners in the Western Provinces, and almost without exception all the public officers who have been consulted on the subject, have expressed a similar opinion; and we would submit to your Honourable Court, that the object which you propose of facilitating the adjustment of civil disputes by punchayets, will be best obtained by permitting the natives to adhere to the customary mode of assembling and conducting them, in all instances in which they may voluntarily desire to submit their cases to that mode of arbitration, and by restricting the interposition of the established courts to cases in which their aid may be applied for.

73. Although we have expressed opinions adverse to the two first measures specifically recommended by your Honourable Court, viz. the employment of heads of villages, and of a regularly organized system of village and district punchayets in the administration of civil justice, we are not the less sensible of the absolute necessity of the extensive employment of the agency of natives in conducting this most important branch of internal regulation.

74. Our European judicial officers are, comparatively speaking, few in number; and deprived as our Zillah judges have in too many instances been for some years past, of the aid of a registrar and assistant, their utmost exertions have been unequal to the despatch of the business devolving upon them under the regulations in force.

75. The local extent of the jurisdiction vested in the Zillah courts at Madras and Bombay is, we have reason to think, generally smaller than at this Presidency. The population also is less numerous, and may be computed in some instances at one-half the amount.

76. The extent of cultivation, of trade and general opulence is at least in an equal proportion. We have no hesitation in saying, that the control of one man, however zealous and intelligent in the exercise of the duties expected to be discharged by the judge and magistrate of our Zillahs, extensive and populous as they are, must necessarily be imperfect; and that if the state of the finances, and of the civil service, admitted of such a measure, the efficiency of the civil administration of the country would be vastly augmented by a large increase in the number of local jurisdictions, and of the officers exercising the functions of judge and magistrate.

77. Such an arrangement appears to have been contemplated by Lord Cornwallis as highly desirable, whenever the state of the finances might admit of it. The extent and population of each district was even then acknowledged to be too large; and the measure has become more essential in proportion to the increase which has since taken place in the cultivation of the country, and the number of its inhabitants. It is unnecessary that we should enter into any details to prove that this increase has been extremely great since the establishment of the permanent settlement in the Lower Provinces, and the date of the acquisition by the British Government of the Ceded and Conquered Provinces: the fact is notorious, and has long been so to those whose local information has given them the best means of judging. We have alluded to it here because we apprehend that it has not been sufficiently adverted to by those who have drawn inferences unfavourable to the system of internal administration of these provinces, from the failure of our judicial officers to accomplish all which that system requires them to perform. In another part of this despatch, we shall advert to the means which would, in our judgment, render the services of the European judicial functionaries more efficacious, without increasing the number of zillahs, or of the judicial officers which the regulations suppose to be employed in conducting the judicial administration of each district.

78. Of the native functionaries now employed in the administration of civil justice, there are two classes, the sudder aumeens and moonsiffs. By Regulation XXIII. 1814, which was passed just at the period when your Honourable Court's despatch was written, the several rules which had from time to time been previously enacted regarding the duties of those officers, were revised, amended and consolidated in one regulation.

79. The powers heretofore granted to the moonsiffs to act as arbitrators, having been found practically useless, were discontinued. The number was increased, so as to correspond with that of the police thannahs; that is, the local extent of their jurisdictions was so arranged, that the most distant villages should not generally be more remote than five coss from the moonsiff's cutcherry.

80. They were vested with original jurisdiction, to enable parties who were before under the necessity of filing their suits at the sudder station of the district, to institute them at a tribunal in the vicinity of their own places of residence. The judges were directed to be careful in the selection of fit persons for the office, and were enjoined to give a preference, when duly qualified, to the pergunnah cauzees, the only permanent native officers in the interior of the country remaining under the institutions of the preceding government.

81. The processes and proceedings of the moonsiffs' courts were carefully defined. The parties were encouraged to employ their own relatives, servants, or dependants, rather than vakeels, in the conduct of their causes. The powers of the moonsiffs were extended so as to admit of their trying suits to a somewhat larger amount than before, and the judges were empowered to employ them in the discharge of various miscellaneous duties connected with the local administration of civil justice. These arrangements were calculated to augment their emoluments, to add to the efficiency and respectability of their offices, to render justice more easily accessible to the great body of the people, and to diminish the pressure of civil business before our European tribunals.

82. These principles have been since extended by Regulation II. 1821, both by increasing the value or amount of suits cognizable by the moonsiffs from 64 to 150 rupees; and by permitting them to try suits, the cause of action in which may have arisen within three years (instead of one year) previously to their institution. It was at the same time explained, that claims for arrears of rent were cognizable in the moonsiff's court; and the Zillah judges were enjoined to encourage that mode of procedure. The provincial courts were, by the same regulation, empowered to increase the number of moonsiffs to such extent as might appear necessary beyond the proportion of one moonsiff in each thannah jurisdiction.

83. The present constitution of the office of moonsiff is chiefly defective, because the amount of their emoluments fluctuates according to the number and nature of the suits decided by them. In some districts their allowances are now such as to form a fair and reasonable compensation for the zealous services of well qualified and respectable men; in others they are so small as to afford no adequate inducement to respectable individuals to undertake the duty; nor can it be a matter of surprise that instances of corruption and abuse should but too frequently occur in a numerous body of public officers, whose fair emoluments are so disproportionate to the responsibility and powers which are vested in them. We entirely concur in the sentiments expressed by the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut on this subject;* and in the conclusion they have drawn, "that no reformation of the present system will be effectual without providing a remedy for this radical defect."

84. Under this impression, we have recently furnished instructions to the court of Sudder Dewanny Adawlut, and on the receipt of their reply we shall be prepared, under the sanction conveyed in the 59th paragraph of your Honourable Court's despatch, to determine the best mode of accomplishing the object above referred to.

85. Our present impression is, that it will be desirable to substitute a fixed salary in lieu of the fees which now constitute the compensation paid to moonsiffs; that such salary should in no case be less than 50 rupees per mensem; and that a certain proportion of moonsiffs in each district, say one-fourth or a fifth of the whole, should be entitled to a larger allowance as the reward for long services, and for the honest and correct discharge of their duties. The hope of attaining the higher allowance might operate as a stimulus to zeal and good conduct, which might be still further encouraged by promoting, from time to time, the most intelligent and respectable of the moonsiffs to the office of sudder aumeen.

86. We see no reason why the powers and emoluments, as well as the number of this class of officers, should not hereafter be gradually increased in proportion to the confidence which they may be found to merit, and to the demands for justice in each district; and we are persuaded, that the established system of local moonsiffs, or native commissioners, while it possesses the chief advantages of the proposed village tribunals, is free from many of the defects necessarily inherent in the latter, is capable of being gradually extended and improved so as to meet every essential object of public utility, and as it has now become familiarized to the people, is preferable to a novel system, which, as being altogether unknown to or long disused by the natives, would be repugnant to their feelings and habits, and would weaken their general confidence in the stability of existing institutions.

87. The principles of gradual improvement above referred to have been recently applied with great success to the establishment of sudder aumeens.

88. By Regulation II. 1821, and Regulation XIII. 1824, the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut have been authorized to invest sudder aumeens, whose character and capacity may be favourably reported upon by the zillah judges, with power to try and decide original suits, not exceeding in value or amount 500 rupees. One or more sudder aumeens may be appointed to hold their cutcherries at places where a register and joint magistrate may be stationed at a distance from a zillah and city court. The sudder aumeens have been authorized, subject to the control of the judge, to execute their own decrees and those of the moonsiffs. They are now paid by a fixed salary in lieu of fees. The amount of their salary, it is true, is less liberal than we think desirable; but in the degree in which it exceeds the amount formerly received by them, it tends to secure the services of abler men, and the more zealous and upright discharge of their duties.

89. A sudder aumeen being the Hindoo or Mahomedan law officer of the court, or the cauzees of the town or city, receives in addition to his fixed allowances in that capacity the sum of 100 rupees per mensem, and 30 rupees for his establishment.

90. Other sudder aumeens, vested with authority to try suits to the amount of 500 rupees, receive a salary of 140 rupees per mensem, besides an allowance for establishment: and the remainder receive a salary of 100 rupees, with a similar allowance for charges.

91. We shall, in a subsequent part of this letter, advert to the aid which these officers are now enabled to render to the magistrates, by investigating and deciding petty offences and misdemeanors, and shall merely observe, that we have every reason to believe that the confidence of the native community, as well as of our own judicial officers, with regard to the proceedings of the sudder aumeens, is daily increasing, and that they form a class of officers on whom may gradually be conferred a still larger share in the administration of civil and criminal justice, with proportionate benefit to the public interests.

92. This question, as well as that of improving the situation of moonsiff, is now under the consideration of the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut, and will be hereafter adverted to when we reply to the instructions contained in your Honourable Court's despatch of the 23d July 1824, paragraph 9 to 14.

93. We proceed to notice such of the suggestions of your Honourable Court, connected with civil justice and included under the second head, as relate to the limitation of the right of appeal; the simplification and abbreviation of the forms, processes and proceedings of our established courts; the reduction of law expenses; the improvement of the office of pleader; and the institution of a new court of Sudder Dewanny Adawlut in the Western Provinces.

94. With regard to the limitation of appeals, we concur with the court of Sudder Dewanny Adawlut Adawlut in opinion, * that no class of our native officers should be vested with powers of final adjudication; more especially on original suits, and where the tribunal is situated at a distance from the station of the zillah or city court. If such powers were vested in the moonsiffs, or even in the sudder aumeens, the chief security we possess for the equity and uprightness of their proceedings would be abandoned; the suitors would consider such a measure as a virtual denial of justice, and our tribunals would cease to command the confidence and good opinion of the community. Whether this restraint may at some future period be safely relaxed or entirely dispensed with, will depend on the change which may be effected in the moral character of the natives; but we are forced to avow our conviction that the final decision of civil controversies cannot yet be left to our native judges without the certainty of a very general and great abuse of such a power.

95. The principle upon which the right of appeal was regulated by the rules enacted in 1814,† was, that the parties should have the right of appealing to a superior tribunal from the decision passed on the original suit, and that the decision passed upon such appeal should be final, except in cases in which the judgment in appeal might appear to be inconsistent with some established judicial precedent, or with some regulation in force, or with the Hindoo or Mahomedan law, or in which such judgment might involve some point of general interest or importance not before decided by the superior courts.

96. In the year 1819, the power of admitting a second or special appeal was extended, as it regarded the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut and provincial courts, to all cases in which from a perusal of the decree there might appear strong probable ground, from whatever cause, to presume a failure of justice.

97. The judges of the Zillah courts were at the same time empowered to certify to the provincial courts, and the provincial courts to the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut, whenever, in their opinion, particular cases (though not regularly open to further appeal) were from their nature and importance such as ought to be reconsidered in a second appeal. The former of these rules, however, has since operated to augment the business of the superior courts to a very inconvenient degree, so much so indeed, that of the number of civil suits depending before the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut, more than one-half were special appeals, and we have found it necessary to revert to the principles formerly established.

98. In the preamble to Regulation II. 1825, the grounds of this measure, as well as of the more strict limitation of the rules regarding petitions for a review of judgments, are fully explained, and we do not consider it advisable to confine the right of appeal within narrower bounds than those now established; nor has it been without regret, and a deep sense of the necessity of the measure, that we have withdrawn from the superior courts the more extensive and general authority vested in them by the second clause of section 2, Regulation IX. 1819, for the admission of special appeals.

99. The existing forms of pleading, proceeding, and process, both in original suits and appeals, were revised and defined by Regulation XXVI. 1814; and we think they are now as simple and summary as is consistent with the ends of substantial justice.

100. In original suits, the fourth pleading or rejoinder is no longer necessary; and supplemental pleadings, which under the former rules might have been filed at the option of the parties, to the same extent in point of number as the regular pleadings, can now be filed only by the express permission of the court for cause shown.

101. In appeals again, there is now no necessity for any pleading being filed beyond that which contains the alleged reasons of appeal, and no pleading can be admitted beyond the respondent's answer to those reasons; whilst under the former rules it was necessary in all regular appeals that four separate pleadings should be filed.

102. It is further provided, that if the points at issue cannot be clearly ascertained from the pleadings, the court shall, on the day on which the suit may first be brought to a hearing hearing (after questioning the parties so as to bring them to an issue) record such of the grounds or points at issue as may appear material for the support or defence of the suit. By this provision it was intended that every thing essential to the complete development of the merits of the case should be recorded, and that the parties should be prevented from unnecessarily filing exhibits or summoning witnesses on points irrelevant to the real matter in dispute.

103. The character of the vakeels and of the native ministerial officers of our courts, combined with the inveterate habits of the natives who may be parties in civil controversies, render it vain to expect that original suits will be brought before our courts in a state ripe for investigation and decision at the first sitting. Our judges are, in fact, under the necessity of personally discharging many functions which in English courts of justice are performed by experienced lawyers and attorneys, and by various ministerial officers liberally rewarded, well educated, and possessed of talents and integrity, which qualify them for their respective duties.

104. Many of the rules adopted in 1814* were framed with express reference to this necessity, and the provisions specifically cited in the margin may be noticed as calculated to save the time of our judges, and to expedite the proceedings of our courts.

105. The two next points included under the second head to which your Honourable Court have directed the attention of this government, are the improvement of the office of vakeel, and the reduction of law expenses.

106. With regard to these questions, we shall content ourselves with expressing our concurrence in the following views and sentiments of the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut, as explained in the 91st and 92d paragraphs of their Report, remarking, however, that as far as regards the office of vakeel, we may reasonably indulge the hope that the progress of the institutions established for the better education of natives, and the operation of the rules recently enacted in Regulation XI. 1826, will gradually supply our civil courts with pleaders better qualified for the discharge of their duties than the generality of those now employed in that capacity.

“It must be admitted that the establishment of authorized pleaders, which was instituted in the Lower Provinces by Regulation VII. 1793, has not yet fulfilled the whole of the beneficial purposes intended by it, as set forth in the preamble to that regulation. It has not been found possible to make the selection in all cases, or in general, from ‘men of character and education versed in the Mahomedan or Hindoo law, and in the regulations passed by the British Government.’ Nor, as far as we are able to judge from our observation, have the diligent endeavours of many of the persons appointed to qualify themselves for their situations and do justice to their employers, been such as might reasonably have been expected. Still, however, we are of opinion, that much facility is given to the administration of civil justice by their constant attendance; and that the practical knowledge which some of them have obtained of the laws and regulations, is not without its use as well to the judicial officers as to the parties in suits. That instances of abuse and misconduct have occurred amongst them, as intimated by the Honourable Court, cannot be denied, but we have no reason to suppose such instances frequent, or that on a general view of the advantages and disadvantages arising from the employment of licensed pleaders, as now regulated, there is any sufficient reason for discontinuing them. On the contrary, we should consider the loss of them a material detriment to the established system of civil judicature; and should apprehend a recurrence of the many serious evils which preceded their institution, as enumerated in the preamble to the regulations already mentioned.

“On the eighth suggestion, under the head Civil Justice,† viz. ‘that the expenses of a trial trial in the zillah and city courts be reduced, if thought too considerable; it appears sufficient to remark, that we have no information or reason to believe that the present authorized stamp duties and fees of pleaders, as they affect the usual costs of suits in the zillah and city courts, are oppressive, or such as to discourage the prosecution of just claims. The stamp duty substituted for the institution fee by section 13, Regulation I. 1814, as well as the pleader's fee in regular suits, fixed by section 25, Regulation XXVII. 1814, must always be proportionate to the cause of action, and the payment of both may be dispensed with in cases of ascertained poverty, under the provisions of Regulation XXVIII. 1814; section 2, Regulation I. 1817, has extended to all original suits and appeals instituted in those courts for an amount or value not exceeding 64 rupees, the exemption from stamp paper for pleadings and durkhasts for witnesses or exhibits, which had been granted to suits for the same amount in the courts of the moonsiffs, by the provisions of Regulation XXIII. 1814; section 3, of the same regulation, has likewise extended to appeals from decisions of the sudder aumcens, which may be referred to the registrars, the lower rates of stamp duty payable on pleadings and durkhasts in the registrar's court, under sections 15, 16, & 17, Regulation I. 1814. And we are not aware that any of the other rules in force on the subject require modification. Some inconvenience attending the deposit of the fees of pleaders, in pursuance of the first clause of section 23, Regulation XXVII. 1814, was indeed noticed in the remarks of the court on the half-yearly reports submitted to government on the 4th June last; but on consideration of the general beneficial tendency of the clause above mentioned, and that an option is given to plead in person when it may not be convenient to deposit the fee of a pleader, the court did not judge it expedient to propose an alteration of the rule for deposits as now established."

107. In the 66th paragraph of your despatch, your Honourable Court have suggested for our consideration, whether it would not be a very desirable measure, and one which could be effected at a small expense, to form a separate Sudder Dewanny Adawlut, for which two judges, a registrar and an assistant, with a proportionate native establishment, would be amply sufficient for getting through with due care and deliberation the important duties of that court. We are not certain, whether it was the intention of your Honourable Court in this paragraph, to suggest that the present Sudder Dewanny and Nizamut Adawlut should be divided into two separate courts at the Presidency, one for the administration of civil justice, and the other for the administration of criminal justice; or whether you might not have had in view the establishment of another sudder court, separate from the one at the Presidency, and fixed at some convenient place in the Western Provinces.

108. In their report, * the court of Sudder Dewanny Adawlut have argued on the former supposition, and we have little to add to their remarks, which show the advantages and disadvantages respectively anticipated from such an arrangement, except that, in our judgment, the advantages of such a plan, supposing each court to consist of three judges, would greatly preponderate over the disadvantages; and that if the arrangement which we are now about to suggest should not meet with the concurrence of your Honourable Court, we would request your authority to adopt the suggestion above alluded to for the establishment of distinct civil and criminal courts at the Presidency, under such rules as might appear most expedient.

109. The measure to which we allude, and which may perhaps have been intended by your Honourable Court, is the establishment of a separate court of Sudder Dewanny Adawlut and Nizamut Adawlut in the Western provinces, vested with the same authority in the divisions of Benares and Bareilly, as is now exercised in those territories by the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut and Nizamut Adawlut at the Presidency.

110. This arrangement was strongly urged by Mr. C. Smith, when second judge of the Benares court of circuit, and the subject was discussed in the proceedings of the Nizamut Adawlut under date the 24th February 1816. †

111. The Marquis of Hastings, in his Minute on the judicial administration, dated the 2d October 1815,* has also adverted to the subject in the following terms :

“ Among other suggestions which have occurred to me for the benefit of those distant parts of our possessions which I have lately visited, the expediency of the establishment of a separate Sudder Dewanny Adawlut for these provinces, impressed itself forcibly on my mind. The distance from the Presidency must in itself be an obstacle almost insurmountable to an appeal from the decisions of the Bareilly provincial court, or if the appellant should possess the means of surmounting this obstacle, the distance must prove a source of great expense and hardship to the opposite party who may not possess the same means. It may also be observed, that the number of causes appealable to the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut, which are instituted in these provinces, does not show the whole of the detriment suffered by the suitors in the several courts of this remote division. The maintenance of right principles and of uniformity of decision in the general administration of justice by the superintending power of the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut, through special appeals, and through interlocutory orders on petitions, is perhaps of more importance to the community than the exercise of its regular appellate jurisdiction.

“ This measure is also suggested by the judge of Etawah, who in his enumeration of the serious hardships now entailed on suitors and others seeking redress from the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut, observes, that they are subject to a journey of more than one thousand miles; to a tedious and ruinous attendance of many months in a climate inimical to a native of these provinces, and where the language, manners, customs, and even food of the people are different from his own.

“ The principal objection to a division of the superior court is, perhaps, that in the result there might happen to be a wide discordance in decisions, and that the uniformity of judgments, which is so important an object of every judicial administration, would be lost sight of. To this it may be replied, that nature, as well as municipal laws and local polity, have for many ages drawn a broad, distinct line between the inhabitants of Bengal and those of the Western Provinces, so that the general rules now applicable to the one are frequently found to be entirely adverse to the circumstances of the other, and that instead of tying down the population of the Western Provinces on the state-bed of Procrustes which was originally made for Bengal, it might be advisable to have a local administration, with the means of observing and the power of improving the actual condition of so large and valuable a portion of the British empire.”

112. In the paper of Remarks by Mr. Stuart on the existing judicial system, which was submitted to Government with a letter from the registrar of the Nizamut Adawlut, dated the 15th November 1815;† the expediency of establishing in the Western Provinces a separate court of Sudder Dewanny Adawlut and Nizamut Adawlut is strongly urged.

113. The measure indeed, as recommended by Mr. Stuart, was connected with other general arrangements proposed by him for the administration of the Western Provinces, but his remarks on the subject are scarcely less applicable to the judicial system as now existing, than if they were combined with the modifications of it which he has advocated.

“ My final proposition is, that the division of Benares court of circuit, and provincial court of appeal, be placed under the new Sudder Dewanny Adawlut, so that this court may be relieved of the whole of the duties of that province, and of the Ceded and Conquered Territory.

“ The main object of the plan being to afford real and substantial relief to this court, the degree in which it will effect that object is the first point for consideration.

“ In the criminal department, the relief would be important. The total number of regular trials received by the court during the year 1814, was 541 (Appendix, No. I.); of that number 205 (Appendix, No. I.), which is nearly two-fifths, came from the Benares and Bareilly courts of circuit.

"In examining the state of the civil file, a very different proportion is observable. The total number of appeals depending in this court on the 31st December 1814; was 415; of this number only 22 came from the Bareilly court of appeal, and 52 from Benares; total 74, out of 415. This is somewhat more than one-sixth of the whole. (Appendix, No. 4.) A statement of appeals admitted during the last six months (Appendix, No. 5) exhibits, however, a higher proportion of causes from those divisions. The total number admitted from all the courts of appeal being 76, from Bareilly 4, from Benares 13, that is from Benares and Bareilly 17, or nearly one-fourth of the whole.

"If these statements be compared with statements of the land revenue of the different territories, the result will appear very singular. The land revenue of the districts included in the Bareilly division, is sicca rupees 1,92,26,356, of the districts included in the Dacca, Calcutta, Moorshedabad, and Patna divisions, 2,88,19,069; yet, as I have shown, the number of depending causes appealed from the first of these territories is only 22; while from the latter it is 341, that is, fifteen to one. The land revenue of the districts under the division of Benares, is 12,25,142, the depending appeals from that division 52, more than double the number of those from the Bareilly division. (Appendix, No. 6.)

"I am sensible that the improvement which must have taken place in the Lower Provinces since the permanent settlement, renders the land revenue no certain criterion of the relative wealth and populousness of these territories. But no reasonable allowance to be made on this account, can be thought to explain the amazing disproportion between the civil business which the different territories contribute to this court. There are, indeed, other obvious causes. The great distance from this court must operate as a discouragement to appeals, more especially as the seat of the board of revenue for the new territory being on the spot, the landholders must be at the expense of a double set of agents for the management of their revenue and judicial concerns; the inhabitants not having yet fully acquired the spirit and habits of litigation, which are the sure growth of our judicial system, is unquestionably another cause.

"Still, however explained, the fact remains, and the actual relief to the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut, in its civil department, from the adoption of the plan, will be proportionably small: but the relief in this respect would notwithstanding be of no slight importance both to the court and the suitors, since, including the growing arrears, I compute that there would be at once transferred to the new court an arrear of about 90 appeals, while the greatest annual number ever decided by the court is only 72; the transfer would then, in the first instance, advance the court one year in this department. It would also relieve it permanently from the growing appeals from those divisions which, as noticed in paragraph 50, approached, during the half-year ending with 1814, to one-fourth of the whole.

"I must at the same time remark, that the preceding calculation is grounded on the actual quantity of business arising from the Upper Provinces; if, as I think there can be no doubt, it must be expected to increase rapidly, the operation of the plan must be in the same degree beneficial.

"The plan has further to take credit for the saving of the miscellaneous business connected with Benares and the new territory. Of this business that which is judicial may be supposed to be nearly in proportion to the appeals, that is, about one-sixth of the whole; the remainder, depending, like the criminal trials, more on the motions and exertions of the officers of the government than on the inclination or ability of the people, may probably bear the same proportion as the criminal trials; on which supposition, it will be more than one-third of our whole business of the same nature.

"If the data above given be at all accurate, I may venture to conclude, that the plan would remove from the court about one-third of its present burthens, and thus render it, if its business should not increase, equal to its duties. If, as I apprehend there is too much cause to anticipate, the business should increase, the necessity for relief will be still more imperious.

"I may

"I may also observe, that the plan will oppose no obstacle to any future improvements in the administration of justice which may be practicable within the jurisdiction which I propose to leave to the court."

114. We shall not add to the length of this despatch by further quotations, but we beg to refer your Honourable Court to the documents marked in the margin,* and which are forwarded as a separate number in the packet, in explanation of the views we entertain on the question; and we will conclude this branch of the subject by soliciting the sanction of your Honourable Court to a measure which, we are persuaded, will add greatly to the efficiency of the judicial administration, and be attended with extensive benefits to the country.

115. We proceed to consider the remaining suggestions of your Honourable Court for the improvement of the administration of civil justice, under the third head, viz. such as relate to the transfer from the judicial to the revenue authorities of claims regarding land, rent, distraint, undue exaction and boundaries; to the improvement of the existing rules on these subjects, as well as regarding the interchange of written engagements between the landholders and the ryots.

116. In a former part of this despatch we have adverted to the fact, that the real pressure of civil business in the courts of the Lower Provinces arises from the mass of litigation directly or indirectly connected with the rights, tenures and interests of the various classes of proprietors and occupiers of land; in detailing, therefore, to your Honourable Court the rules which have been enacted with a view to relieve that pressure since the date of your Honourable Court's despatch, we propose to consider them under the following heads; viz.

1st. Those measures which have for their object the formation and preservation of an accurate record of the rights and interests of the different classes who own or occupy land, with a view to the attainment of greater facility in the adjudication of those rights by the judicial tribunals.

2dly. The rules for investing the revenue officers with the power of determining on rights of the foregoing description, including the adjustment of disputes regarding rents.

3dly. The rules under which all questions relative to the resumption of lands held free of assessment under an illegal or invalid title, are made cognizable by the revenue officers.

4thly. Such rules of a local nature as have for their object the adjustment of special matters connected with revenue administration, without adding to the business of the ordinary courts.

5thly. Rules relative to other branches of revenue unconnected with land, which have for their object to relieve the civil courts from the adjustment of cases of that nature.

117. The first enactment which we shall shortly notice under this head of the subject is Regulation XIX. 1814, by which all the rules before enacted for the partition of estates paying revenue to government, with such modifications and amendments as were considered expedient, were reduced into one regulation.

First. Those measures which have for their object the formation and preservation of an accurate record of the rights and interests of the different classes who own or occupy land, with a view to the attainment of greater facility in the adjudication of those rights by the judicial tribunals.

118. We notice the above regulation, not because new principles were at that period advanced, for in fact the grounds recited in the preamble to the first regulation† made for the partition of estates; viz. "that in dividing landed property, the share or shares should be rendered as compact as circumstances may admit, in order to obviate the disputes regarding boundaries, water, and other matters which necessarily result, where the lands belonging to different estates circumscribe each other, or are intermixed, and which by obstructing the cultivation, and consequently depreciating the value of the property, property, are equally prejudicial to the interests of the proprietors and to those of the public," still continued to be applicable to the state of landed property; but we have alluded to the enactment as one calculated to facilitate the adjudication of claims to land devolving by inheritance to a number of shares, and because in passing it some new rules were found necessary, to give a more effectual operation to those previously in force, so that the original objects of defining the rights of sharers, and preventing injury to the resources of government, might be fully secured.

119. The re-establishment of the offices of canoongo and putwaree is a subject which has already been very amply discussed in the various communications which have been made to your Honourable Court from the Revenue Department; and the orders which have at different times been received by us in reply to those communications, sufficiently evince the deep anxiety entertained by your Honourable Court, that the putwaree and canoongo establishments throughout the provinces should be placed upon the most efficient footing.

120. It seems unnecessary for us, therefore, in this place, to recapitulate the grounds upon which the several regulations noticed in the margin* were formerly enacted, or the considerations, already very fully explained in our revenue despatches, which led to the institution of the several mofussil record committees, and the supervising committee established at the Presidency. The general effects of the regulations above noticed, as well as the proceedings of our record committees, will be brought in a connected and detailed shape to the notice of your Honourable Court, at the earliest possible period, in a separate despatch from the Revenue Department; but we may observe, as connected with the points immediately under consideration, that although the completion of an extensive system of registration and record must be a work of much time, labour, and expense, we have no doubt that even during the progress of it, the civil courts will derive some facility in the investigations and decision of claims connected with land, and the produce thereof, from the operation of the putwaree and canoongo regulations.

121. The period, indeed, when the accounts of the village putwaree shall exhibit a satisfactory statement of the measurement, nature, and produce of the land, the rents payable, and the extent of the interest vested in the several cultivators of the soil, by which the judicial or revenue authorities may safely be guided in the adjustment of disputes brought before them, must be distant; but if the endeavours to attain so desirable an object as the formation of authentic records by the putwarees and canoongoes shall ultimately be successful, and we shall finally be enabled to establish a system of registration and record, susceptible of easy reference, and connected in all its parts, from the details of a village pergunnah or other local division, to the more general and comprehensive records of the superior office at the Presidency, such a result will obviously relieve the courts of justice from the necessity of having recourse to the mass of oral and unsatisfactory testimony, which has hitherto seriously contributed to retard their proceedings.

Secondly. The rules for investing the revenue officers with the power of determining on the rights of the foregoing description, including the adjustment of disputes regarding rents. Reg. VII. 1822, for the Western Provinces Cuttack and Puttaspoor. Reg. IX. 1825, for Benares and the Lower Provinces, sect. 2 and 3.

122. Some of the most important provisions which have been enacted to facilitate the administration of civil justice as connected with the rights, interests, and privileges of the agricultural community, are to be found in the regulations noted in the margin.

123. A particular explanation of the judicial powers in the adjustment of various questions of the foregoing description, which it was deemed expedient to entrust to the collectors of the unsettled provinces by the provisions of Regulation VII. 1822, has already been submitted to your Honourable Court in our despatches from the Revenue Department, of the dates noted in the margin.† In the first of the despatches alluded to, it was especially stated that a great number of the disputes which it was anticipated the collectors might might adjust, related to questions scarcely worth contest, and might be easily settled by the timely intervention of authority; and a belief was then expressed, that in the unsettled provinces the orders which might be passed in such matters by the collectors, under the powers vested in them, would generally be acquiesced in, if passed after full and fair inquiry.

124. The proceedings of collectors in several of the detailed settlements, under the provisions of Regulation VII. 1822, which have fallen under our notice, appear to have been conducted in such a manner as to lead us to think that the above expectation as to the good effects which would arise from the exercise of the judicial powers confided to them, has not been disappointed; we have, indeed, no doubt whatever, that a great number of disputes of various descriptions relative to irrigation, boundaries, crops, and local rights connected with land, have been adjusted under the operation of that regulation, which would otherwise have been added to the files of the ordinary courts; and frequent instances have fallen under our notice wherein the allowances which ancient custom had assigned to the bullaheer, or village watchman, and others who may be called the servants of the village community, have been ascertained and recorded.

125. The provisions of Regulation VII. 1822, except such as were exclusively of a local nature, have since been extended to all lands (including jaghires, moocurreries, and other tenures held free of assessment, or at a quit-rent under special grant), not included within the limits of estates permanently settled, as well as to all estates held khas, while so managed; and to the Sunderbunds, the hill lands of Bhaugulpore, and all other wastes not specifically included within pergunnahs, mouzas, or other revenue divisions specified at the time of the settlement as belonging to the mehals then permanently assessed. This extension, as well as the competency of the Governor-general in Council to vest any collector within the provinces of Bengal, Behar, Orissa, and Benares, with the several powers specified in section 20, Regulation VII. 1822, have been declared by the second and third sections of Regulation IX. 1825; and although the sphere of its operation is necessarily much more limited than that of Regulation VII. 1822, in the unsettled provinces, we nevertheless anticipate much good, and considerable relief to the judicial tribunals, from the exercise of the powers thus proposed to be intrusted to such of our collectors in the settled districts as may possess the leisure as well as the ability and judgment necessary to a discreet and efficient discharge of such duties.

126. It is foreign, however, to the immediate object of this address to enter into any detail of the grounds on which that enactment was passed, as a detailed explanation of them belongs more particularly to the Revenue Department, and will be brought to the special notice of your Honourable Court in the general narrative of our revenue proceedings.

127. We have next to notice to your Honourable Court, that the provisions of the regulations heretofore enacted for the adjustment, by the revenue officers, of disputes relating to arrears and exactions of rent between landholders or farmers and their under-tenants, having been found insufficient to expedite the trial and decision of such cases, a new regulation, containing such modification of the former rules as might lead to the more speedy adjudication of such cases by the revenue officers, was proposed by the court of Sudder Dewanny Adawlut, and has been passed by us, standing on the code as Regulation XIV. 1824.

128. The provisions of the above regulation, as well as our proceedings of the date noted in the margin,* have already been brought under the notice of your Honourable Court in our despatch of the 14th September 1826, paragraphs 70 to 78. On that occasion, indeed, we stated to your Honourable Court that our expectations as to the extent to which that regulation would operate in affording material aid to the judicial authorities were very limited. If, however, it shall be found that those rules have had the effect effect of expediting the trial and decision of summary suits, such an effect must in some degree tend to lighten the labours of our civil judges; and if it appears, on further experience, that the operation of the enactment has been less extensive than was anticipated by the court of Sudder Dewanny Adawlut, we shall be prepared for the adoption of the proposition of referring such cases for the decision of the sudder aumeens, contained in the Minute of Mr. Harrington, then officiating chief judge of the court, or of such other rules as may appear to us best calculated to expedite the adjustment of such suits.

129. It may not be out of place here to notice to your Honourable Court some other regulations enacted since the receipt of your despatch now under reply, which have for their object the correction of various irregularities, arising out of the practice of realizing arrears of revenue due to government, as well as the rents of sudder malgoozars, by the process of public sale, and of correcting erroneous opinions as to the effect which such sales were supposed to have upon under-tenures.

130. The Regulations we allude to are those noted in the margin:* the circumstances which led to the enactment of the two first-mentioned regulations were fully detailed to your Honourable Court in our despatch from this department under date the 3d November 1820, paragraphs 28, and 63 to 72, in reply to which we had the honour to receive the orders conveyed to us in your Honourable Court's despatch of the 13th April 1825, pars. 2 to 9, on the receipt of which your Honourable Court will perceive, by referring to the resolution recorded on our proceedings of the annexed date,† we directed that the judges of the provincial court of Calcutta, and of the several Zillahs in that division in which the putnee tenure chiefly prevailed, should be called upon through the court of Sudder Dewanny Adawlut to furnish the information required by the 9th paragraph of your Honourable Court's despatch above mentioned. The court of Sudder Dewanny Adawlut were at the same time requested to state their own sentiments in regard to the effects which had been produced by the operation of the regulations alluded to. A similar report was required through the territorial department from the board of revenue, and the several collectors of the districts above adverted to.

131. For a detail of the information received by us under the foregoing orders, we beg permission to refer your Honourable Court to our proceedings of the annexed date,‡ from which you will perceive that the authorities who have been consulted concur generally in opinion that very beneficial effects have been experienced throughout the districts immediately affected by the operation of Regulation VIII. 1819. From the reports of the local officers, there appears strong reason to believe that the rules in question have tended to settle and give stability to the landed tenures in those districts; and that this result has been effected without entailing (as apprehended by your Honourable Court) additional evils on the cultivators of the soil; some of the local officers, indeed, appear to be of opinion that this class of your subjects have rather been benefited than injured by the operation of that law; the provisions of the 18th and 19th sections of which have been extended to all the provinces under this Presidency by section 22, Regulation VII. 1822.

132. The most important part of our proceedings above referred to relates to the best means of securing to the ryots their just rights and privileges, a measure which has occupied our most anxious attention, and regarding which we propose to enter on a more detailed consideration, as noticed in a preceding part of this despatch, on receiving the reports which have been called for from the revenue boards as well as from the court of Sudder Dewanny Adawlut. The observations which we have here offered are intended merely to convey to your Honourable Court our impression that the operation of Regulation VIII. 1819, has had a tendency to reduce the extent of litigation in the districts more immediately affected by it.

133. The reasons which induced us to pass Regulation XI. 1822, have been already submitted to your Honourable Court; and in paragraphs 33 to 36 of our Despatch from the Revenue Department under date the 30th July 1823, it was specifically noticed to your Honourable Court that "sales of land for arrears of revenue had been a fertile source of litigation, the regulations containing no specification of the conditions necessary to the validity of such sales; and the decisions of the adawluts, to whom no distinct cognizance of such cases is given by the rules of 1793, being nearly as various as the persons who presided in them. On the one hand, much real injury has remained unremedied, and on the other, sales have frequently been avoided on insignificant points of mere form, though the general propriety of the measure, and the contumacy or fraud of defaulters have been fully established."

134. The most serious evils which had arisen from the abuse of the process of public sales for the recovery of arrears, have been noticed to your Honourable Court in the detail of our proceedings which led to the enactments of Regulation I. 1821, and the institution of the mofussil and the sudder special commissions; that enactment will more properly be referred to in noticing the rules, the operation of which is confined to particular districts; but, independent of cases falling within the provisions of that enactment your Honourable Court will find, in the detailed reports and statements which have been annually furnished to us by the superintendent and remembrancer of legal affairs, and which are recorded in our proceedings of the annexed dates,* ample proofs of the numerous cases connected with sales which have occupied the attention of our civil courts. The evils too can hardly have been confined to the cases detailed in those reports and statements; for it cannot be doubted that numerous disputes between landholders, farmers and under-tenants must have been created by the change of possession, first obtained by the auction purchaser, and subsequently restored under a decree of court to the former malgoozar.

135. We conceive that the provisions of Regulation XI. 1822, for defining more clearly and specifically the rules to be observed in conducting sales, and vesting the revenue authorities with the power of rectifying any errors which may have been committed at the time of sale, must tend materially to obviate the necessity of frequent recurrence to the judicial tribunals for the adjustment of disputes of this nature; and the speedy decision of the revenue boards either to confirm or cancel a sale, will necessarily operate to prevent controversies which would otherwise arise among those possessed of subordinate interests in the mehal sold.

136. We shall next proceed briefly to notice such rules as have been enacted for declaring all claims to hold land free from assessment, or to subject land held under invalid titles to assessments, cognizable by the revenue authorities.

Thirdly. The rules under which all questions relative to the resumption of lands held free of assessment under an illegal or invalid title are made cognizable by the revenue officers.

137. The enactment of Regulation II. 1819, was particularly noticed to your Honourable Court in our revenue despatch, dated 22d August 1822. The several clauses, of the 30th section of that regulation, by which all claims by proprietors, farmers, or malgoozars to subject land to assessment, or of individuals against the foregoing description of persons to hold land exempt from revenue, are directed to be heard and determined by the collectors (a class of suits much more numerous than those in which the demand for rent is on behalf of Government, or in which Government is sued for an exemption from revenue) are calculated to relieve the civil courts from a portion of their business.

Fourthly. Such rules of a local nature as have for their object the adjustment of special matters connected with revenue administration, without adding to the business of the ordinary courts.

138. Under this head of the subject we may notice the provisions of Regulation XXIX. 1814, which were enacted to give stability to the arrangement established for the Ghatwalee tenures in Beerbhoom, and which, by the adjustment of the relative rights of the Rajah of Beerbhoom and the Ghatwals, have necessarily removed a source of dispute which would otherwise have caused the institution of suits in the civil courts of that district.

139. We may likewise advert to the appointment of a separate officer as commissioner in the Sunderbunds, under the provisions of Regulation IX. 1816, as calculated to relieve the civil courts of the districts of Nuddea, Jessore, Backergunge, and the Twenty-four Pergunnahs, from the adjustment of a variety of disputes which would otherwise be entailed upon those tribunals.

140. But the most important regulations of a local nature which we have to notice to your Honourable Court, as affording relief to the civil courts within the sphere of their immediate operation, are those noted in the margin,* which provide for the constitution of the sudder and mofussil special commissions, and define the powers vested in those upon those tribunals in the districts of Cawnpore, Allahabad and Goruckpore.

141. With our revenue despatch of the 30th July 1823, we forwarded, for the information of your Honourable Court, the reports and proceedings of the commissions which had been received up to that period; and in the 89th and following paragraphs of that despatch we informed your Honourable Court that the proceedings of the commissions had generally met with our entire approval.

Fifthly. Rules relative to other branches of Revenue, unconnected with land, which have for their object to relieve the civil courts from the adjustment of cases of that nature.

142. The only further rules which it is necessary for us to notice under this head, as having been enacted subsequently to the receipt of your Honourable Court's despatch now under reply, and which have a tendency to relieve the pressure of business in the courts of civil judicature, are the provisions contained in Regulation XIII. 1816, and Regulation X. 1819.

143. Your Honourable Court are already aware that by the 80th section of the former regulation all suits, complaints, and informations, for the recovery of any fine or penalty, on account of the illicit cultivation of the poppy, the illicit manufacture, sale, purchase, importation, transportation, or possession of opium, are made cognizable exclusively by the collector of land revenue or other officer in charge of the abkaree mehal, from whose decision an appeal lies to the board of customs, salt, and opium. The judicial powers above described, to be vested in the collectors and other officers in charge of the abkaree mehal, have been still farther extended to the opium agents in Behar and Benares, and their respective deputies, by the provisions of section 19, Regulation VII. 1824.

144. By the provisions of the 96th and following sections of Regulation X. 1819, the officers of the Salt Department are vested with judicial powers in all cases of complaints or informations for the recovery of fines and penalties on account of illicit dealings in salt to a limited extent; and the interference of the civil judges in the decision of such cases is only requisite in case the quantity of salt confiscated shall be greater than 20 maunds, or the amount of fine exceed 30 rupees.

145. As far as the proceedings of the officers in both of the departments above alluded to have fallen under our notice in the periodical statements of the cases decided, which is required to be furnished by the board, we have every reason to think that the judicial duties thus entrusted to them are discharged with judgment and discretion: and the instances in which the judicial tribunals have been compelled to interfere by setting aside the decisions of the salt officers, appear to have been much less numerous than might have been expected.

* Reg. I. 1821; I. 1823; IV. 1826.

146. The foregoing review will shew the extent to which we have met or are endeavouring to meet the wishes of your Honourable Court, by rendering the services of the revenue authorities available in ascertaining, recording, and maintaining the rights and interests of the agricultural classes of the community, and in guarding against or remedying those evils and abuses which are considered by your Honourable Court as chiefly reflecting discredit on the administration of civil justice by our tribunals. It will further have its weight in satisfying your Honourable Court of the impracticability of transferring, as a general measure, the duties of a magistrate to the collector, without abandoning the accomplishment of objects (closely connected as they are with the ordinary functions of a collector) which are calculated to facilitate the administration of civil justice, and in our judgment to be far more efficacious in promoting the essential interests and happiness of the community, than the transfer to the collectors of the duties of magistrates.

147. Having concluded our remarks on such of your Honourable Court's suggestions as relate to the administration of civil justice, we propose to bring under your Honourable Court's notice and consideration some arrangements besides those already adverted to, which have been adopted since the date of your letter, or which appear to us calculated to be of benefit.

148. By Regulation IV. 1816, and III. 1826, the judge of circuit has been required to visit the civil gaols at each sessions, and to issue such instructions as may appear necessary for the better treatment and accommodation of the prisoners, or for redressing any grievances or undue restraint to which they may be subjected. He has been authorized to receive from the prisoners petitions relating to such grievances on unstamped paper. The civil gaols have been placed under the control of the magistrates, and such of the rules in force for the management of the criminal gaol as are applicable to civil gaols, have been extended to them.

149. The office of superintendent and remembrancer of legal affairs, which was constituted under Regulation VIII. 1816, has proved of eminent advantage to the Government in the hands of the able officers by whom it has hitherto been filled.

150. The sentiments of the different boards in regard to the practical utility of the office, of the degree in which it has operated to secure the just rights and interests of the Government, and to prevent the public officers from prosecuting or defending untenable claims in the courts of justice, have been brought under your notice in a separate despatch from the Judicial Department.*

151. The provisions of Regulation XV. 1816 have furnished facilities for the adjudication of civil suits in which our native soldiery are parties.

152. The deviation which has been sanctioned by that regulation from some of the ordinary forms of proceeding is not very material, but it is calculated to meet the peculiar difficulties in which, from the nature of the service, the native soldiery are sometimes placed, in the prosecution and defence of their civil interests.

153. By Regulation XIX. of 1817, an option has been given to parties to institute original suits between 5,000 and 10,000 rupees in value or amount, either in the zillah or provincial courts.

154. Heretofore all suits exceeding 5,000 rupees in value or amount were required to be instituted in the provincial courts. The tendency of the new rule is to relieve the superior tribunals, in some degree, from the cognizance of a class of suits which form a great majority of the whole number of suits filed in the first instance in the provincial courts. The same regulation has provided some rules calculated to prevent unnecessary hardships to individuals under summary prosecution for alleged arrears of rent.

155. Regu-

155. Regulation VI. of 1823 has also provided for the summary adjustment of disputes, and the more certain enforcement of contracts entered into between the indigo manufacturers and the cultivators of that plant. The want of rules of this description had been productive of many frauds and abuses on one part, and of acts of violence and irregularity on the other, especially in those districts in which the competition amongst the manufacturers was most active. The same principle may perhaps be hereafter extended with advantage.

156. By Regulation VII. 1825, rules have been enacted to facilitate the execution of decrees, and to enable the judges of the civil courts to obtain the aid of the collectors in the enforcement of decrees relative to the proprietary right or possession of land, whether by giving possession to the parties entitled thereto, or by the adjustment of wasilant accounts or otherwise; and by Regulation XI. of 1825, provision has been made for fixing the principles by which claims to lands gained by alluvion or by dereliction of a river or the sea, are to be determined.

Police.

157. Under this head your Honourable Court have first adverted* to the large establishments of subordinate police officers formerly maintained under the native government as watchmen in each village, gunge, haut, and bazar, who were supported by grants of land held rent free, or at low rents, and by contributions from the inhabitants, and to the separate establishments of pykes or chowkedars, who were of the nature of police militia bands, and were more or less numerous according to the discretion of the ruling authority, or of the amils and zemindars who represented that authority in the interior.

158. You have noticed that in the earlier periods of our administration, the resumption which had been made of the lands allotted to the zemindars and pykes for their services in guarding the villages and larger districts against robbers, was one of the causes of the then defective state of the police, but that though mutilated and deformed, these establishments were still to be found in most parts of the country when the present plan of police was established in 1793; that subsequent resumptions of the allowances granted to zemindars for keeping up thannahs of police establishments, and the discharge of those establishments under Regulation XXII. 1793, aggravated the evil; and that other unauthorized resumptions have been made since the permanent settlement, by the zemindars and others, of lands and allowances appropriated to the maintenance of village police.

159. The facts thus adverted to by your Honourable Court are but too well founded; we conceive, however, that it was neither the intention of the framers of Regulation XXII. 1793, nor of former governments, to authorize the resumption of lands or allowances granted to village watchmen; but that the resumptions in question were meant to apply to the establishments called thannahs, or bands of police officers of the nature described in the 96th paragraph of your Letter; we must especially lament that the omission to record and specify the lands and allowances of the village watchmen, which were intended to have been preserved, has given opportunities to the zemindars of gradually committing abuses of this nature, which it has proved almost impossible to guard against with effect, and which it would be now utterly impracticable to trace out and recover, so as to appropriate them to the purposes to which they were originally applied.

160. We concur with your Honourable Court on the necessity of such village establishments towards an efficient police, in the impracticability by other means of gaining accurate and early intelligence of the commission of crimes, or of apprehending the perpetrators of them, and in the injurious consequences which have arisen from the resumption tion, whether authorized or unauthorized, of the lands appropriated to the maintenance of the village police, and from leaving undefined and insecure what survived of that institution in the year 1793.

161. The foregoing remarks apply to the Lower Provinces. In the districts in which a permanent settlement has not been introduced, we still have it in our power to ascertain and define the allowances, and to secure the rights of the village watchmen; and the attention of the collectors has been specifically directed to this object.

162. The general information before us shows, that in almost all but very small villages, individuals performing the duties of watchmen, whether called chowkeedars, negalbans, pykes, dosauds, or by any other designation, are actually maintained, either by land or money payments, or contributions in grain furnished by the landowners and village communities. We are of opinion that the interests of the zemindars are so directly involved in the maintenance of this class of officers, and that their services are so essential to the villagers themselves, that there is little danger of their being further reduced. They are, however, in general very insufficiently paid; their allowances are uncertain; their number is not always regulated by the extent and population of the village; nor are they remunerated with any careful reference to the degree of labour and responsibility imposed upon them.

163. The allowances themselves, and the manner in which they were paid, were, we apprehend, more matters of local usage and convenience than of legal and recognized right; their original amount could not now be traced in detail; and in any general measure which may hereafter be adopted, their allowances must be viewed as having formed a component part of the deh khurcha, or deduction granted in the assessment on account of village expenses. We are persuaded of the hopelessness of any attempt to fix the exact amount which should be paid to each watchman, or to secure its regular payment by any legislative enactment; our magistrates have been urged (and they feel the importance of the measure too strongly to neglect it) to use their influence and authority towards maintaining these institutions in an efficient state, and to prevent as far as may be in their power, any reduction in the allowances hitherto paid to this class of officers.

164. Amongst the principal measures which have been suggested for the improvement of the chowkeedary institutions, may be mentioned the extension to the towns and more populous villages in the interior of each district, of the system now in force under the provisions of Regulation XXII. 1816, and section 6, Regulation III. 1821, for establishing a subsidiary police at the cities and sudder stations of the magistrates and joint magistrates, to be nominated, appointed, and maintained by the respective communities for whose benefit and protection such establishments may be required.

165. Considering as we do the provisions of those regulations to be equitable and expedient, and satisfied as we are that great practical advantage has resulted from the adoption of the system therein provided, we should have been entirely disposed to sanction the further extension of that system, if past experience had shown that the agency of the punchayets, on whom devolves the task of fixing and applying the rates of assessment, and of selecting the chowkeedars, could be relied on. Unfortunately they have failed to show that public spirit, that good faith towards their fellow-citizens, and that regard to the interests of the community, which we had hoped to find.

166. The members of the punchayet have in too many instances endeavoured to exempt their connections and friends, and the richer classes of the inhabitants, from paying any share of the assessment, and have otherwise neglected or abused the trust reposed in them; nor could we extend the same system to towns remote from the personal control of the magistrates without incurring the obvious risk, that the powers vested in the punchayet would be abused, in proportion to the difficulty which distance would create of checking their proceedings and correcting their irregularities.

167. We shall nevertheless be prepared to encourage, as we have in some instances already encouraged, any arrangement of this nature which the inhabitants of populous villages

(1) Letter from the Bengal
Government,
22d Feb. 1827.

villages and towns may voluntarily desire to adopt; leaving the inhabitants in such cases to select the individuals by whom, and the general manner in which the arrangement is to be superintended.

168. Another measure which has been strongly urged by several of our officers is, that of rendering the village watchmen throughout the country stipendiary servants of the Government, and exclusively subordinate to the magistrates, by commuting all their allowances, whether in land or money or grain, for a fixed salary, to be paid through the darogahs of the thannah in which the villages are situated: the expediency of this arrangement has been more particularly urged by the late Mr. John Shakespear, who in his report, dated the 16th December 1816, paragraphs 59 to 94, has entered into some details of the plan itself, and has endeavoured to diminish the weight of the arguments by which it is opposed.

169. Mr. Shakespear's plan, and that of other officers who concur with him, proceeds upon the principle of establishing a system of police entirely thannahdary. He proposes to exclude the zemindars from all share in its management, and anticipates a very partial inconvenience from thus rendering the village watch independent of those classes in society to which they have been hitherto reckoned subservient: he is of opinion, indeed, that this inconvenience might be guarded against by leaving the election of the chowkeedars in each village to the resident inhabitants, which would obviate all apprehension of improper persons, or of persons adverse to the real interests of the inhabitants, being employed in these duties.

170. Mr. Shakespear views this plan as the first step towards breaking the exorbitant power of the zemindars; and he thinks that the chowkeedars would be more beneficially employed under the control of the darogah and the superintendence of the magistrate, than under that of the zemindar, by whom they are now too frequently employed in acts of extortion and injustice towards the villagers.

171. It does not appear to us, however, that the mere right of choosing their own watchmen, without any other control over them, would protect the villagers from the abuse of authority which might be committed by those officers. The very spirit of the plan consists in establishing a body of police agents, whose only view shall be the maintenance of strict order, and whose only check is the active superintendence of the superior thannah officers. How far such a state of order might consist with the true interests of the community, is a question which could hardly be left with safety to the decision of the inhabitants themselves; and we concur with the board of commissioners in the Western Provinces in opinion, that by the emancipation of the village watch from the authority of the zemindars and higher classes of the inhabitants, an odious and intolerable tyranny would be erected; ancient and most cherished prejudices would be violated; and the gradation of ranks, which has so long subsisted, would be suddenly subverted.

172. With regard to the policy of again employing the zemindars, either exclusively or principally, in the management of the police within the limits of their respective estates, your Honourable Court will find, in the Report of the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut and Nizamut Adawlut,* many extracts from the communications of the judicial officers, explanatory of the reasons which render such a measure in their judgment both unsafe and inexpedient.

173. The court of Sudder Dewanny Adawlut and Nizamut Adawlut are themselves of opinion, that with few exceptions the landholders, farmers, and their agents, cannot be safely trusted with such authority; but that from their situation, influence, and consequent responsibility, they should be held accountable under penalties for the early communication of intelligence respecting the commission of heinous crimes and the resort of notorious criminals within the limits of their estates, and that by those means we shall derive from them them all the useful aid which can be obtained, without investing them with a power which it would be dangerous to grant.

174. The view which has been taken by the Marquess of Hastings, in his Minute of the 2d October 1815, of the foregoing questions, and of the general system of our police establishments, appears to us equally just and perspicuous; and we beg to submit the following quotations from that document, as containing our own sentiments on these important subjects, instead of offering similar remarks in language less clear and forcible :

(1.) Letter from the
Bengal
Government,
22d Feb. 1827.

“ The police establishment of every zillah (or magistrate’s jurisdiction) may be stated to consist of a darogah, with from 10 to 15 burkundases for every thannah or division of country, varying from 100 to 300 square miles. In cities the extent of jurisdiction was regulated with reference to the population; but everywhere these thannahs, with the magistrate’s office, formed the stipendiary police establishments introduced by our government in 1792, and maintained to the present day without any alteration in principle, and with only a late subsidiary addition, to which I shall hereafter have occasion to advert.

“ On the general authority and constitution of the darogah’s office, little need be said but that he was invested with the full control of the police of his jurisdiction, under the orders of the magistrate, and all existing village institutions of watch or patrol were subjected to his authority.

“ The expense incurred in these numerous establishments was undoubtedly extremely heavy; but there is reason to believe that the state of the country at the time was such as to throw considerations of expense out of the scale, so as the object of securing the peace of the interior could in any way be accomplished. Government had already tried in vain every mode that had suggested itself: the large independent jurisdictions of native magistrates, or foudars, though acting under the eye of our own revenue officers, had completely failed: the substitution of European magistrates, with a general responsibility in the landholders who were to act under their authority, had produced no amendment in the police of the country; for notwithstanding the union of the authority of the magistrate with the whole revenue and civil jurisdictions, there was still experienced a want of power to enforce the magistrate’s orders on the landholders, and to secure for him access to the requisite sources for information.

“ It only remained, therefore, for government at the time to devise such an institution as might afford the means of a more active and efficacious control; and as experience had shown that the landholders were not to be trusted with the exclusive management of the police of their own estates, nothing was left but to supply their place by appointing separate officers to be set over them, and imposed upon the country. It was in this view that the thannahdary institution was introduced in Bengal; and although I am aware there is good reason to believe that the wretched state of the country at the time was as much owing to the defective and inefficient condition of the criminal courts, as it was the fault of those intrusted with the administration of the police, still I at present see no reason to doubt that the thannahdary, or some such stipendiary establishment, was at the moment indispensable. An operative mechanism of that sort was required to give weight to the authority of Government and of its officers, as well as to reduce the spirit of violence and lawless rapine which seemed then to prevail under the collusion, if not overt support, of the landholders and farmers in every district.

“ Whether the institution thus introduced was calculated to effect this object, and whether it has proved successful, as well as whether the necessity of its permanent maintenance still exists, are points which we have now to determine. If it be supposed to have been one of the objects in the contemplation of the Government, from the formation of these establishments, to have furnished force adequate to the protection of the community, and capable of undertaking the prevention of crime by its own vigilance, in this respect the institution must be admitted to have failed. The hired force of a thannah is totally insufficient for such purposes. Even in its collective strength it could scarcely venture to resist resist or pursue a gang of armed robbers, and it is numerically inadequate to give individual protection against common theft and burglary beyond its own immediate station.

"But it may safely be asserted that no government ever did or ever can defray the whole expense of a preventive police to this extent; much gratuitous aid, direct or indirect, is afforded in every country. A preventive police must depend not only on the skill and vigilance, as well as promptitude, with which the stipendiary force of the state is directed, but also on the energy of individuals in their respective stations of life. The hired arm of the police must necessarily be limited both in its extent and effect. Its principal support must come from society itself; and the opportunity should not be missed of observing, that hitherto in this country it has had no such aid. I can, however, discover no sufficient reason to presume that protection or prevention, by supplying an adequate guard, was an object in the introduction of the thannahdary system. It appears to me to have been devised exclusively with the view of strengthening the arm of the magistrate, and of introducing an efficient control over the police of the interior by which that duty was to be performed; the landholders had hitherto been entrusted with this control, and undoubtedly if an individual estate could be regarded abstracted from its connection with any other, the propriety of leaving the care of the peace to those whose station gave them influence, and whose interest would ensure a due attention to its preservation, would be a different question, and might perhaps be advisable; but every estate is surrounded by others, and this contiguity gives rise to jealousies and conflicting interests, which, unless there is a strong and vigilant control to keep them down, must soon engender a confusion sufficient to baffle every unsupported effort of a magistrate to unravel.

"The landlord of wealth and influence requires no authority from Government to enable him to protect himself, and to prevent, if willing, the commission of decoity by his own tenantry; he might even be expected to exert himself to restrain them generally from preying on each other. In these respects, therefore, nothing perhaps would either be lost or gained by investing him with special powers; but while we could have no security that the delegation of such authority to the zemindar would induce a greater activity in preventing his tenantry from plundering the inhabitants of neighbouring estates, we might confidently anticipate the frequent misapplication of it to purposes of private revenge. There can be little doubt that, under the system which left to the landholders the management of their own police, its powers had been almost universally perverted in this manner. On that account the thannahdary system was devised. It was the object of that system to disarm them of those powers, and to vest the control in the hands of stipendiary officers of Government, free from all those passions and feelings which had bred the confusion; but it was only the controlling portion of the former system which was then supplanted; the former village institutions of watch and patrol were left untouched, save that they were made subservient to the thannahdars, and a portion of their support commuted from land into money payment. It was to these, therefore, that the community was still to look for its immediate protection, and our Government only undertook to see that they did their duty in that respect. The question of the success or failure of the thannahdary system resolves itself therefore into the following points: Has it broken that spirit of violence, and disposition to take the law into their own hands, which existed on its introduction in every class possessing influence throughout the country? and has it established a more effectual control, or otherwise improved the previous institutions for the protection of the community?

"A reference to the present state of all the Bengal zillahs will perhaps satisfactorily answer the first question. Chicanery and litigiousness appear almost universally to have taken the place of violence; and though the state of the Nuddea and some other districts, at so late a period after the introduction of this system as even the year 1808, might then have almost justified a conclusion that it had altogether failed, still these disorders may be traced to other causes than defects in the system; and the present improved state of those districts, effected merely by the means and agency the plan yielded, combined with the previous general amelioration of the state of other districts, affords satisfactory proofs of the degree in which the system has been efficacious, and shews that it was originally well calculated to effect the object for which it was principally devised. I must confess that I consider it one of the main springs of the present strength of our government, and one of the chief causes why insurrection has been so totally unknown, notwithstanding the frequent recourse that has been had to many very unpopular measures. In the several districts of Bengal, military aid is at present hardly ever called for to support the civil power, and as far as I have yet been able to observe, I really believe that this is greatly owing to the effects of the thannahdary system.

“Though, therefore, it may be objected to this system that it was a sudden and violent innovation on all existing institutions, instead of a cautious and gradual improvement of them, I cannot but believe that such an innovation was necessary to the support of our government, with which, as it did not arise out of the society, the institutions of the society could hardly have been amalgamated. I should accordingly feel inclined strongly to recommend its maintenance, in preference to any other that has been yet suggested, not only in Bengal, but in the Western Provinces also. In these, indeed, I conceive the system to be yet more necessary in order to give effect to the magistrate’s authority, to render the power of our government active and omnipresent, and to wean the population from those habits and notions prejudicial to the peace and well-being of society which they had imbibed under the weakness of former rulers. In all native governments, the frequent detachment of a military force to every quarter of their territory is indispensable to keep the country in subjection, and annually to collect its revenues. Our government experienced at first the same necessity until the introduction of this system, but from that moment the calls for military aid to enforce obedience to the laws have been gradually diminishing. The thannahdar and his establishment are always perfectly informed of every thing that is passing, are at hand to interpose everywhere the authority of Government, and to bring its powers immediately before the eyes of the discontented or disaffected, before a systematic opposition can be organized; and though he can effect little or nothing by direct force, still the certainty that the support behind him is unlimited in extent, must always ensure to a thannahdar respect and obedience as long as he keeps within the line of his duty. The control, too, of the magistrate is ever ready to confine him to this, and to punish any abuse of power, nor is there anything to restrain the community from bringing such transgressions to his notice whenever cases may occur; as far, therefore, as it was desirable to destroy the spirit of violence which subsisted, so far has the thannahdary system been productive of essential benefit to the country; and, from what I have yet observed, this object has been effected with as little harshness or injury to the community as was possible. Its efficiency, however, has been found to extend beyond the immediate enforcement of the authority of Government; it is fully equal to the effectual performance of all the duties of police which follow the actual perpetration of a crime. In its investigation, and in the apprehension of the offenders, it must be acknowledged, where the magistrate’s control is able and active, to fall very little short of the best organized system of Europe. To whatever duties, indeed, a stipendiary police has in any country been found equal, it may safely be asserted that the thannahdary system will not have failed in their performance. Its officers have every incitement to activity which exists in similar establishments elsewhere, while the checks against supineness are perhaps superior; the same exclusive notions of profession prevail among them, and they have all the most thorough conviction that their continuance in office and means of livelihood depend upon the satisfaction they may give to their superiors in the discharge of the duties entrusted to them.

“As far, indeed, as my observation has yet gone, I have seen reason to be perfectly satisfied with the efficiency of the thannahdary system in itself. It remains to be inquired what effect it has had upon the existing police institutions of the country, and upon the community at large.

98 APPENDIX TO REPORT FROM SELECT COMMITTEE.

"I have before stated, that it was a feature of the thannadary system that the native village institutions were placed under its immediate control; the first question therefore is, has this control produced amongst these institutions a greater degree of vigilance and activity?

"It appears to be a general complaint amongst the magistrates, both of the Upper and Lower Provinces, that the village establishments furnish at present even an inefficient class of officers; and they trace this inefficiency to the double capacity in which those individuals serve. That complex character involves a subordination to two authorities; to the established police in matters of that description, and to the zemindar or his local representative in matters of revenue. The magistrates complain, that as they cannot obtain the cordial co-operation of the zemindar, they have but little command over the village police, the officers of which necessarily look up more directly to the person who pays them than to the Government or its officers, from whom they receive no wages.

"If the magistrates ever expected to have the same authority over the village as over the stipendiary police; if they thought that the zemindars would, from public spirit, co-operate with them in establishing such an authority over the village institutions, I must confess that I think they expected too much; more even than it was natural, from the constitution of the system, they should have.

"It would have been unreasonable to look to the landholders for a cordial disposition to further a system, the immediate effect of which was to supplant their own police authority. They would naturally regard it as a sudden and violent innovation, to the prejudice of their rights and consequence in society, and must necessarily have felt a jealousy towards its officers, which would give birth to at least a supine indifference, if not an active disposition to counteract their efforts for the improvement of the police.

"In this view, there is wisdom in the provisions of the legislative enactments of 1792 and 1793, which in depriving the landholders of any police authority, required from them only a negative conduct, leaving them to wear off their jealousy in neutral inactivity, and trusting to the gradual increasing influence of the judicial officers for securing a more effective, because more willing, co-operation than a legislative enactment would obtain. I am indeed not quite satisfied of the expediency of several attempts which have been subsequently made to coerce this co-operation; for I should fear such might have a tendency to exasperate the jealousy that must in the first instance have disjoined the landed interest from the regular police.

"The system, as originally devised, exacted no co-operation from zemindars. It took from them the power of police, declared its own authority paramount over servants hitherto exclusively theirs, and seemed to consider itself above the necessity of resorting to the aid of their influence to establish every requisite control over the mofussil village institutions. Government indeed had in its own hands powerful means of controlling such institutions, nor were there any considerations to restrain the full exercise of them. The village police consisted of special officers who had a special duty to perform, for which they would be held responsible; they were to be taught that inactivity would not pass with impunity, and that collusion, or even a disposition to withhold the most active assistance from the regular police, would infallibly entail punishment. An efficient and watchful control was set over their conduct, and the law enabled the proper authorities to enforce it, by arming them with the power of punishing neglect, even with severity.

"It was not therefore necessary to solicit the co-operation of this class; their assistance could be secured by compulsion; and although this assistance, being constrained, might be in some respects defective, yet it was apparently all that the system originally admitted of, and perhaps all that the essential objects of it required.

"There can be little doubt that village police, controlled upon these principles, has been the main engine of the success which has attended the thannadary system in putting down down great crimes. It is from its officers that all information of the character of individuals, of the haunts and intentions of robbers, and of every thing necessary to forward the objects of police, must ordinarily be obtained. They are the watch and patrol to which the community looks for its immediate protection, while their station in society, general communion of caste with one another, and every circumstance of their situation furnish the means of being useful; nor is there any thing wanting but an active superintendence to keep them to their duty by uniting it with their interests.

"This has been afforded by the system as it stands; whenever a decoity or other heinous crime occurs in a village, the darogah's duty calls him immediately to the spot, and he goes there with only a few burkundauzes, and with no information except of the occurrence of the crime; his only mode of proceeding is to collect the watchmen of all neighbouring villages, and to question them as to all the circumstances, with a view to get from them that information which they only can afford. The activity of these in ascertaining and pointing out the perpetrators is quickened by the fear of being suspected of connivance, or at least of being dismissed and stigmatized as inactive or incapable. Here is the control which, by the influence of the fear of punishment, ensures activity, and forces from the village police the most effectual aid in the performance of all those duties which follow the perpetration of a crime. But the fear of this heavy responsibility makes it as much their interest to be vigilant with a view to prevention. Whenever, indeed, this fear ceases to operate, whenever the control may become lax, the district will soon fall out of order, and the village chowkeedars will generally be the leaders in the confusion. They can only be restrained by the certainty that they will be the first that are called to account.

"It was by the instrumentality of a control fashioned on these principles that the existing important benefits have been acquired for the country, in the suppression of all the most crying offences by which its peace had been so long disturbed.

"There has yet been but little co-operation from the class of landholders, for the inert neutrality enjoined them cannot be regarded as support. Indeed, at the present day, the want of co-operation, notwithstanding the many attempts subsequently made to obtain it, is matter of universal complaint.

"If then the system of control by fear of punishment has shown itself equal to the accomplishment of all the most essential objects which Government had in view in introducing it, whence arises this general notion of the inefficiency of our system, as far as the native police institutions which we found in being form a part of it?

"It arises from our having already reached that stage of improvement, beyond which it is impossible to advance without assistance in the general concurrence of society.

"Hence the constant disappointment of all the efforts of our judicial officers to push their improvements further by the same means. A zealous and intelligent magistrate may suppress decoity, destroy or disperse gangs of robbers, however desperate and firmly rooted in the country; he may prevent affrays, and every violence which materially disturbs the public peace; but if he attempt to carry his improvements farther, his efforts fail, and though he perhaps justly attributes the failure to the inefficiency of his means, it is not so much from the want of physical strength in the establishments, as because his instruments are not of a nature calculated to excite society to a general co-operation with him.

"Every judicial officer appears more or less to have felt that his efforts to go beyond the point which has been reached have not proved successful; most of them attribute the failure to the impossibility of exciting those possessing influence in society to a cordial union of exertion with themselves, for the furtherance of objects connected with the public good; but in the mode of accounting for this circumstance, and in the suggestions and propositions to which their feeling has given rise, there is, as might have been expected, a considerable variety of opinion. Some conceive our police establishments to be inefficient in force and number; others attribute every defect to our inability to make those who should lead the society shake off their supineness and indifference. The greater number of judicial officers indeed seem to be for extending the magistrate's power over all the institutions of police in being; they are for substituting others, or new-modelling those existing, so that they may acknowledge subordination to no other authority but the magistrate; others are for re-admitting the leaders of society to a share of the responsibility and authority of police, in order to secure the co-operation required; and some are for coercing the co-operation by penalties attached to omission, without yielding any share of the power of responsibility.

"The extension of the chowkeedary system, or subsidiary police lately introduced into cities and into the sudder stations of zillahs to the villages generally, is the form in which the new-modelling of existing institutions is usually proposed.

"The principles on which this addition to our former establishments have been devised, are simple and apparently judicious. It is right that the society should provide for its own internal protection in minor cases, beyond what can be provided for by Government from the general resources of the state; and wherever the society may not of itself have already devised a plan for this purpose, Government are of course justified in coming forward to require that it should do so, as well as in pointing out the form in which the object can best be accomplished.

"In the cities and sudder zillah stations, in which alone the chowkeedary system has yet been introduced, there were found no institutions for its protection previously existing in the society; the Government called therefore upon the society to provide for that further and more minute internal protection, which the general institutions could not afford, and ordered its members to elect from amongst themselves a certain number of managers, with an establishment of watch and patrol sufficient to provide for these objects. The most equal and proper mode of defraying the expense was also suggested by Government in the shape of a cess upon each house, varying in amount according to its style, the whole to be arranged and levied by the delegates of the society. Such is the subsidiary police establishment to which I before alluded. It is obviously an institution which, if not abused, yields the promise of great benefit to the society; and though on its first introduction it has been rather unpopular, as I myself witnessed in the course of my tour, it may be presumed that this dislike to it must wear off, when its object is more thoroughly known, and its benefits have been longer experienced. There can be no doubt also, that its introduction so speedily after the abandonment of the house-tax (which in some respects it resembles) must have very largely contributed to the prejudice against it. On the whole, therefore, I can at present see no grounds on which the propriety of this measure can be fairly questioned, and I conceive the cities to have no right to complain against it, unless they can make it appear that the institution was not required in correction of any prevalent inconvenience: if it be only said, that the establishment is sometimes more burthensome than necessary, from the plan having been in the first instance occasionally overdone in its execution, the argument will not affect the general grounds or propriety of the measure, and, like an objection derived from occasional inequality of cess, will be removed by the gradual operation of time and of increased experience. I must confess, however, that I feel an unwillingness to listen to suggestions for the general diffusion of a system of this nature over the smaller towns and villages, in which, or at least the latter of which, it would have to supplant already existing institutions. These institutions are certainly objectionable, inasmuch as their functionaries have at present a double duty, serve several masters, and are only so far subject to the magistrates or other police authorities as the fear of punishment attaching vaguely can render them. I have my doubts, however, of the propriety of making such institutions exclusively the servants of the Government, in the shape of police officers, subject only to the magistrate.

"Constituted as the village community usually is at present, the chowkeedary and servants of the community, and as well from caste as from custom, occupy the river station there. Paeeks, geraeets and duneks, are not exclusively servants of the chowkeedary, dars; besides the trifling allowance they receive for the performance of their duties, which are chiefly distinct from police, they are paid for the protection they afford the society, by an almost discretionary contribution from the villagers, partly in land, partly in grain at the time of harvest, and partly in yearly or monthly presents in money, from residents of a certain degree. It is the interest, therefore, of these functionaries to secure the goodwill of the community they may belong to; indeed, wherever, from the laxity of the general control exercised over them, they may have taken to practices destructive to the general peace, it will always be found that the scene of their crimes is not their own place of residence, nor will their own community have been in any way the sufferers.

"Should, however, a class of officers be introduced in the place of these individuals, calling themselves public servants, or naukars of the sircar, instead of being the servants of the community, they would be masters of the latter, and an authority would be established pregnant with the most odious tyranny.

"I am aware that the chowkeedary system is constituted on the principle that it should arise out of the society, and be subservient to it through the persons of its delegates: undoubtedly, in cities where the population is usually of a better stamp, and persons have a more perfect acquaintance with the principles of our government, where those also possessing influence in society have commonly a ready access to the magistrate either directly or indirectly, the chowkeedary establishments would find it impossible to assume a power beyond what might have been contemplated in their formation.

The case, however, would be otherwise in villages at a distance from the controlling eye of the magistrate, and among people debarred access to him, ignorant of the motives which guide his actions, and unable to comprehend the principles which regulate his conduct. In such communities the chowkeedars might, with the managing committee at their head, conspire against the rest of the inhabitants, and having in their hands the management of an assessment, and the legal power of enforcing it, might eventually become extortioners and oppressors.

"I must confess I see reason to fear that it will be impossible to devise appointments, which, away from the immediate control of European officers, would still be subservient to the legitimate authority of the community. We cannot establish generally a system of free election and representation; whatever establishment might be introduced, there must be a gradation of service to official superiors, the whole looking up only to the Government as their common master; thus each subordinate authority would expect to be supported on his own representation, while the complaints of those unconnected with the whole, were listened to with suspicion and distrust.

"In this view I do not consider it to be desirable that any reform of the village institutions should be attempted with the object of making them servants of Government, and exclusively subordinate to the magistrate. I should fear too that in villages at a distance from the magistrates, even the subsidiary chowkeedary system would degenerate into one of this description, and become at least independent of the community. Indeed, I will almost go so far as to say, that I see little objection to the institutions continuing as they are, since by that means their dependence on the society can best be secured. They have, to be sure, at present, as already remarked, two distinct duties and many masters; but as the establishments are less burthensome to the community in consequence, and as in any other case you could not secure them wages sufficient to afford an independent maintenance without a direct tax (which they would themselves, perhaps, have to collect), even this may not be without its advantages.

"But if the village police institutions are to continue to serve the landholders, and to perform revenue duties as well as those of police, the magistrate will never be able to get from them more than such constrained service as the fear of punishment might enforce; and how are any further improvements of police, or of the moral state of society, to be effected? Certainly, in my opinion, not by imposing new establishments on the society, with which they cannot amalgamate. As far as force can effect the object, it may be done by

by the system as it stands. Whatever cannot be accomplished by those means of control a magistrate at present possesses, can only be done by the society; we must therefore look to obtaining its co-operation by other means than by further strengthening or rendering independent our establishments, for it is not through them that society is to be moved.

"If it be an object with us to win the community to our interests, it must be obvious that the most simple mode in which this can be effected, is to gain over those who possess influence in society; and as far as the zemindars or landed interest are of this description, so far is their co-operation most desirable, and so far they are the class we should first try to gain.

"I have before hinted, that I entertained doubts whether the co-operation of this class was to be acquired by coercive measures. Indeed it would, on general principles, argue ignorance of human nature to suppose it. It is said, however, that the higher orders of society in this country have uniformly evinced that want of public spirit, and that indifference to the promotion of the general good, which has left us at present with no other instrument than coercion for working on the community, and in this view additional penalties have been proposed; besides a further responsibility to the magistrate, still without giving to the landholders any powers of police control. I am not an advocate for any plan of this nature; I conceive that under the existing constitution of our system, a magistrate possesses abundant power of annoyance, inasmuch that where a landholder may be thought to have failed in yielding the support or co-operation required, it would be difficult to draw the line beyond which he could not be made to suffer; he is liable both in person and property to a considerable extent; but he is yet further liable to suffer in character and consequence, from the indignities which a magistrate has it in his power to heap upon him, without passing the limit of his authority.

"Nothing, I am satisfied, would be gained by arming magistrates with further powers of infliction, or by the imposition of further legislative penalties on the class of landholders. Even the obligation to make good the value of property stolen on their estates, although the most moderate additional responsibility suggested, and although sanctioned by the former established usage of the country, appears to me obviously unjust. A zemindar held to be so answerable, would frequently be punished for an act in which he would not be surmised to have anticipated, and against which no human prudence could provide; at the same time, the penalty in extent would be unlimited and undefinable, and he would receive no compensation whatever for the risk. In short, under such a provision, there would be no possibility of proportioning the penalty to the degree of neglect, or to the means of prevention which the zemindar might possess.

"As far indeed as the present state of my inquiries enables me to form a judgment, I must confess myself decidedly of opinion, that nothing can be done by further coercion in any shape. Nor am I disposed to admit the belief that this is our only instrument for working on the native society in order to obtain its co-operation; we must suppose that mankind are influenced in this country by the same passions and feelings which actuate their conduct elsewhere. They are to be excited, therefore, by similar means to the pursuit of similar objects. It is not only from an abstract sense of the propriety of a given line of conduct, that men are led to its pursuit in preference to any other. If there exist in Europe a more general disposition to forward measures having the general good for their object, than has yet been experienced here, it may as much be attributed to the superior inducements individuals have to actuate them to such a course in Europe, as to any radical want of virtue in the society of this country. Public spirit is in itself only a mixed or even a secondary motive, to which individuals are led as much from a knowledge that it has its merit with the public, and yields distinction in society, as from the purely virtuous sense of duty. The love of distinction must surely exist as strongly amongst the natives of this country as it is known to do elsewhere, and there is no reason why it should not be made to have as much influence on their actions.

"Only, therefore, let disinterested efforts to improve the moral condition of society not be without their reward, and the spirit to afford them will not be wanting. I am, indeed, clearly clearly of opinion, that if it be an object with our Government to obtain the co-operation of society, we can only do so by rendering such a course the obvious road through which its leading members may hope to arrive at distinction, or at least to obtain some advantages gratifying to their ambition or vanity. If our system has hitherto failed in obtaining co-operation, it has only been from its not having yet been a part of it to attempt this mode of accomplishing the object.

“ Our Government has had frequent occasions to be sensible that it has itself experienced, even from the class of landholders, a disposition to afford the most active and zealous support, to submit to sacrifices, and even to risk life in its service, whenever adequate occasion has required it, and whenever the individuals have felt convinced that such a line of conduct would not be without an acknowledgment of its merit with us. With the whole power and influence of government at command, our means of gratifying their ambition and vanity are unlimited; so that whenever such conduct has come to our notice, it has always been amply rewarded, and it is in consequence of the hope of obtaining similar flattering remunerations excited by former examples of our gratitude, that on every occasion of foreign invasion, or even of alarm, there will always be found even in the race of landholders, which appears to be almost universally described as wanting in public spirit, individuals who seek to deserve well of us by their activity and voluntary exertions.

“ On such occasions, no one would think of proposing coercion as a means of exciting this spirit in our favour. But the same principles apply to the co-operation we wish to excite in smaller matters; indeed the fear of punishment has as little influence on the minds of this class of our subjects in one case, as in the other, for in neither could the charge of having pursued a contrary course be ever brought to the proof.

“ Since, therefore, it is conceived impossible that any efforts for the further improvement of the police and moral condition of the society should be successful, unless the co-operation and support of the society can be obtained, through the means of those possessing influence in it from their situation; and since we cannot hope to excite such a spirit in this class without holding it forth to them as the means of rising to distinction in the society, and of procuring those objects so gratifying to their ambition and vanity which our government has the means of bestowing; it remains only to inquire what is the nature of the means, and what the mode in which they may be best applied to the attainment of the object.

“ From the peculiar structure of society in this country, and the habits and notions of those who compose it, it happens, perhaps fortunately for our Government, that there is little distinction to be obtained that does not emanate from the Government or from its officers. Either direct power, or that which results from influence with those in power, are almost the only objects of consideration, not the offspring of caste and religious prejudice. These are obviously, in every shape, exclusively at our command, and with the power of pecuniary recompense, and of conferring those other marks of favour and distinction, by which vanity is gratified, form the different means we at present possess of binding the several classes of society to us, by the hope of reward in the acquisition of their respective objects of desire. The several methods in which these might be applied to the purpose of exciting in the society a disposition to forward our views, and the degrees of operation they might be brought to have on every class, have never been sufficiently considered. Indeed, as far as I can see, it has been but very little an object of inquiry. Our magistrates appear scarcely sensible of the force of the engine they possess. I should wish to infuse amongst them the disposition to have more frequent recourse to it, and to endeavour to move the society to co-operate with them by its means.

“ It is quite unnecessary that the name or influence of Government should be brought immediately into operation on the society, in cases of such trivial moment as those, by which the amendments of our police could be effected; must necessarily be; were Government to confer a khilaut, or even to address its thanks direct to every zemindar who might show show activity in aid of the police whenever a theft might occur, it would justly subject itself to ridicule, and lower in the eyes of the society the value of a distinction made the equivalent of so paltry a service. The individual would have been sufficiently gratified by a sense that the magistrate saw his deserts, and he would have been highly flattered by the slightest public testimony of his personal approbation. It is not by regulations, general orders, or other public acts of government, that any thing could be effected in the excitement of the desired spirit of co-operation from the society, with a view to its moral improvement; every thing must be left to the discretion of our public officers; and we can only point out generally the line of conduct we conceive it most expedient for them to pursue.

“No one can doubt the power possessed by our judicial officers of exciting the society to what they may wish, who sees the degree of consideration paid to every one reported to possess influence with them, who observes the avidity with which even access is sought, and remarks the consequence resulting from a personal confidential communication. In nothing which passes, not even in the form of address of a purwannah, or a process of court, is the magistrate without the power of gratifying those with whom he may have dealings. Indeed, his means of gratification are only equalled by his means of annoyance. All that is necessary is, that every thing he does should be done personally by himself, so that no one may suppose he owes a favour to other than the magistrate, or be able to fancy he can trace an ungracious act to the private malice of the umlah, which might be meant to express the magistrate's personal displeasure.

“On the whole, therefore, as far as my observation has yet gone, I conceive the system at present in being to be as complete as any I have yet seen proposed; nor do I think that even in the minor departments of it, the alterations which have been suggested would be attended with substantial advantage. The magistrate, with his thannahdary establishment, is indispensable to the exercise of an adequate control over the zemindars and native police institutions, who without it would, there can be little doubt, begin by suppressing information, and end by introducing the confusion of a state in which every one seeks to right and revenge himself. The subsidiary chowkeedary police is only adapted to cities and large towns, the residence of European officers, in which no similar institutions may have before been in existence. The mofussil police institutions must be left as they are, controlled through the influence of the fear of punishment by the thannahdary establishments, and if it be sought to render them more efficient, it must be through the society of their joint masters.

“We must seek to gain the society, not by coercion or the enactment of further penalties, but through the means of those possessing influence in it, who are to be gained by holding forth to them the ample means of reward in the gratification of their ambition and vanity which Government and its officers have exclusively at command. But for the detailed execution of this, we must depend upon the personal conduct and discretion of our public officers, for Government can only point out to them generally the nature of the object to be gained, and of the means by which it is proposed to effect it, and perhaps suggest the general mode of their application.”

175. Before concluding this branch of the subject, it will be convenient to notice some enactments which have taken place since the receipt of your Honourable Court's despatch connected with the police establishments, and their more efficient superintendence.

176. By Regulation XVII. 1816, provision has been made for the occasional revision of all police and gaol establishments, by the superintendents of police, with a view to such reduction of expenses as might be found practicable, and they were enjoined to furnish an annual statement to Government of all establishments of that description, as well as of the subsidiary police establishments maintained in the cities and principal towns.

177. To enable the magistrates to exercise a more efficient control over the cotwale darogahs, and other officers employed on police duties, or in guarding the gaols, the magistrates have been empowered to nominate, appoint, remove, suspend, or discharge those those officers (subject under certain restrictions to appeal to the courts of circuit) without previous reference to superior authority, and they have been vested with the authority of distributing a proportion of their police establishments at such places as might from time to time appear expedient.

178. The superintendents of police were at the same time directed to perform certain duties hitherto appertaining to the higher courts; they were made the channel of correspondence with the magistrates in regard to the reduction, enlargement and distribution of the police establishments, the site and limits of thannah jurisdictions, the escape of prisoners, the granting rewards for meritorious services in aid of the police, the repairs and construction of roads, bridges, seraces, and kuttras, the employment of convicts, and the state of public works.

179. In Regulation XX. 1817, were embodied, with extensive additions and amendments, the whole of the rules regarding the duties of darogahs and other officers of police: these rules were clearly arranged under proper heads, and the regulation in question has proved eminently useful in directing the conduct of those officers.

180. The same regulation declared the proprietors and farmers of land, their agents, the munduls, putwarries, and other heads of villages responsible, in addition to what was before required from them, for reporting unnatural or suspicious deaths, for affording due information to the police on some other points, and for giving their aid to the processes of the magistrates and police officers.

181. A reference to the details of this regulation, will satisfy your Honourable Court of the care which has been taken to guard against the abuses of most frequent occurrence on the part of the police officers, some of which are noticed in your Honourable Court's despatch; we allude to those especially which refer to the employment of professional goindahs, the holding of inquests, the search for stolen property, the receiving of confessions, the treatment of prisoners, and the registry and superintendence of village watchmen. An abstract of the contents has been annexed to the printed copies of the regulation, and those copies have been widely circulated to enable the community at large to ascertain with facility the powers, duties, and responsibility of the thannah officers, of the landholders, farmers, and their agents, and of the munduls and village watchmen in all matters connected with the police.

182. By section 5, Regulation XVIII. 1805, and section 17, Regulation XIV. 1807, the Government is enabled in all instances to adapt the local police to any circumstances which may appear to require a special deviation from the general rules, and to entrust the charge of it to any landholder, farmer, or manager of land, instead of to police darogahs.

183. The principle is more easily applicable to extensive estates, comprising tracts of hilly or jungly land, thinly populated, and on the frontier of our territories, but its success even in these cases must mainly depend on the character and disposition of the person exercising it.

184. The Government, however, has not hesitated to authorize special deviations from the general system of police, wherever the character and habits of the population, or local peculiarities, or even temporary considerations, render such measures desirable. The arrangement adopted in regard to the Garrows, and other rude tribes on the north-eastern frontier of Rungpore, to the mountaineers of Boglepore, to various estates in the Jungle Mehals, Ramghur, Cuttack, and the north-eastern frontier of Moradabad, might, amongst other instances, be adduced in proof of this disposition on the part of the Government.

185. Without adverting to the arguments urged against the measure of conferring on collectors the powers of magistrates, on the ground of its being a very extensive innovation on a long established system, and a violation of the principle on which the civil administration framed by Lord Cornwallis in 1793, was regulated; we shall notice the practical practical objections which have been most generally urged against it, and which are thus summed up by the court of Sudder Dewanny Adawlut, and Nizamut Adawlut:

"In the first place, it appears impossible that the collectors of the extensive districts in the Ceded and Conquered Provinces, whose time is already entirely occupied by their present duties, and must continue to be so till the formation of a permanent settlement of the land revenue, should undertake the additional functions of magistrate and superintendent of police.

"2dly. The same objection is applicable to the province of Benares, where there is only one collector for the whole province, including the jurisdictions of three magistrates and a joint magistrate stationed at Ghazee pore.

"3dly. It may likewise be applied to several collectorships in the Lower Provinces, which include the jurisdictions of two or more magistrates and joint magistrates.*

"4thly. It may be questioned whether any of the collectors in the Lower Provinces could perform the whole of the additional duties proposed to be transferred to them without neglecting in some degree their present trusts, which extend to various other duties besides the collection of the land revenue; and in the due discharge of which the public interests, as well as those of individuals, are materially concerned.

"5thly. So large an addition of duty and responsibility to the office of a collector could not be consistently made without a proportionate increase of salary, which, with the necessity of some additional collectors, must occasion a considerable annual expense.

"6thly. Many of the present collectors not having been employed in the judicial department, it cannot be expected that the whole of them should be so competent as the present magistrates to maintain a vigorous police, and administer justice in criminal cases.

"7thly. The division of authorities, under the existing system of internal administration, having a tendency to raise the weight and influence of the judge and magistrate above those of the collector, it may be presumed that, as asserted by some of the judicial officers, the zillah and city judges and magistrates now possess more official power to obtain the co-operation of the landholders and other inhabitants of their respective jurisdictions, in promoting the objects of a good police, than would be possessed by the collectors, if invested with the charge of that department.

"8thly. If the collectors were required to perform the whole of the duties of the present magistrates, they would be seldom able to leave their fixed stations, and in this case one of the principal advantages expected from the proposed transfer would be lost; whilst at the same time they might be often prevented by their judicial duties from making local inquiries called for by their proper functions in the revenue department.

"9thly. If to avoid this inconvenience, or with any other view, the police only were placed under the collectors, leaving the judicial duties of the magistrate as they now are, it might be apprehended that, on the one hand, the collector would want authority to maintain an effectual control over the native officers of police, and over those who are required to assist them in preventing the commission of criminal offences, as well as in discovering and apprehending offenders; whilst, on the other hand, the magistrates, if deprived of their present authority over the police officers, would be impeded in following up the traces to guilt, which are often imperfectly indicated by the original inquiry of a police officer; and might also experience many other obstacles to the prompt administration of criminal justice, which is now essentially promoted by the facilities of local inquiry, service of process, and numerous other subsidiary means arising out of the immediate subordination of the police officers to the zillah and city magistrates.

"10thly. In the regulation enacted at Fort St. George, 'for the establishment

a general system of Police,* under the instructions of the Honourable Court of Directors, it has been judged necessary to provide† that ‘no order shall be issued to any police officer, excepting by the magistrate of the zillah (viz. the collector acting in that capacity), or his assistants.’ But we apprehend that a similar provision at this Presidency would operate to a serious hindrance of criminal justice, unless the collectors, as magistrates, could be supposed to make so full an investigation of all criminal cases brought before them, as to preclude the necessity of further evidence, or the issue of any further orders to the police officers, in trials before the judge of the local criminal court. At the same time it must be acknowledged that there would be great risk of collision, and consequent detriment to the public service, if the police officers were made subordinate to two independent authorities, viz. the collector, in his capacity of magistrate, and a distinct judge of the Zillah Criminal Court.

“11thly. The objection last mentioned is applicable, though in a less degree, to the necessary subordination of the collector, as magistrate, to the superior criminal courts; whilst in his principal capacity he must continue subject to the control of the superior authorities in the revenue department.

“12thly. Without supposing that the collectors would personally abuse the powers of magistrate in charge of the police, it may be reasonably doubted whether the tehseldars, and other native officers acting under them, whom it is proposed to employ in the police, would not sometimes pervert the authority vested in them for public purposes, to the means of promoting a private end; or at least to facilitate the collection of rents and revenues by other modes of coercion than those authorized in the regulations.”

186. The force of the second and third of these objections has been diminished by local arrangements adopted since the date of the report from which the foregoing quotation is made; but we feel that great importance is justly ascribed to those which refer to the collector's want of leisure to perform, in addition to his own duties, the whole of those now attached to the office of magistrate; to the inconvenience and mischief likely to result from the separation of the charge of the police from the power now exercised by our magistrates in the administration of criminal justice; and to the comparative unfitness of very many of the revenue officers in the Lower Provinces for the important trust proposed to be conferred upon them.

187. The Board of Commissioners in the Western Provinces have stated, that whatever advantage or facilities may be contemplated in the establishment of an efficient police from vesting the executive duties of it in the revenue authorities, no collector can bestow the necessary attention to its details while the fluctuations of the territorial assessment, under the constant recurrence of short settlements, continue to call for so large a portion of his time. The Board have further remarked, “That if the transfer of the magisterial functions to the collector should imply a re-establishment of the subordinate superintendence of the police in the tehseldars, as the intermediate channels of his communications with the landholders, many objections which were exemplified in the former system of tehseldarree police may be stated against this measure, and if the proposition for vesting the landholders with the charge of the police within their respective estates is intended to supersede the present establishment of police darogahs and thannah burkundauzes, it might be apprehended that such a measure would be at any rate premature, until the village police of the zemindars shall be properly organized, and perhaps injudicious in foregoing an agency, which, however imperfect it may still be, is not wholly inefficient, for an experiment of doubtful result.”

188. The members of the Board of Revenue in the Lower Provinces have stated their sentiments in regard to the proposed transfer of magisterial authority to the collectors, in separate minutes.

189. Mr. Salmon has observed as follows: “It is with hesitation and very considerable deference deference that I should presume to offer my opinion on arrangements connected with police or with criminal justice; but with reference to the question of a collector's competence and superior qualifications to discharge the duties of a magistrate, I do not scruple to aver that neither his habits, his experience, or the nature of his functions, as a revenue officer, would serve to render him a preferable person. The division of the revenue and judicial lines has deprived all the collectors of the present day of the opportunities of learning the duties of a magistrate in the first instance, and of improving in them afterwards by practice; and I imagine it will be admitted that there is no sort of public office where the advantages of experience and practice are more essential. I do not mean that any length of time is absolutely necessary for the purpose, but that to meet by such experience, a man's occupation should not be two-fold, and totally distinct in their nature. If a collector were to become a magistrate, he would either turn out a good police officer and a bad collector, or a bad police officer and a good collector; it is probable he would continue to devote his attention to that branch in which he feels himself best versed. The acts both of a collector in certain cases, and of a magistrate in all, should be prompt; delays would be frequently attended with loss in the one department, and would be irretrievably pernicious in the other; yet I imagine if both offices were united in the same person, delays would certainly occur in one or other. Very deep research or maturity of judgment are not essential qualities in a magistrate; but quickness of intelligence, activity both of mind and body, an aptitude of tracing events and of discerning particular circumstances, and a dexterity of examination of persons (which can only be acquired by practice) are almost indispensable. The habits and routine of a collector's duty are not of such a nature; regularity and accuracy of accounts, a knowledge of the description and validity of landed tenures, and of forms and usages; in short, an intimate acquaintance with landed possessions and their varieties, and with local peculiarities, and numerous other avocations of a miscellaneous nature, form the principal part of a collector's duty. It will be acknowledged that these are totally distinct from the qualities requisite for a magistrate, though they are in very many points closely connected with matters of civil justice. Indeed I have generally been of opinion, that to be a good judge, a man should first have been a collector; and to be a good collector, a man should have had some experience in the mode of cognizance and of judicial investigation, which, under the former system of the service, he would have had as registrar to a zillah judge."

* Regulation XI. 1816.

† Section 43.

190. Mr. Buller is not aware of any other objection to the proposed arrangement, than the want of leisure of the collectors, and the necessity, if the transfer be made, of effecting it gradually, and of putting the office of collector on a more respectable footing.

191. The remarks of the late Mr. John Shakespear, paragraphs 127 to 135 of his report dated the 16th December 1816, are also deserving of your Honourable Court's attention; but we are unwilling to lengthen this letter by extracting them.

192. In the review which we have taken in a preceding part of this despatch, of the nature and extent of the duties devolving upon the collectors, especially in those districts in which a permanent settlement has not yet been effected, your Honourable Court will, we trust, see sufficient reason to satisfy you that such an arrangement is at present absolutely impracticable in those territories; the services too of the revenue authorities have, since the date of your despatch, been generally rendered extensively available in the discharge of various duties which would otherwise devolve upon the judicial officers; and so far therefore as the latter object is concerned, the arrangements already adopted or contemplated by this government will in no inconsiderable degree meet the views of your Honourable Court. Unless we could restore the ancient institutions of the village communities, and could employ the heads of villages, the farmers, landholders or their representatives as officers of police, little would be gained, and much would be sacrificed by making collectors generally magistrates; and your Honourable Court have indeed viewed the adoption of the former as necessary to, or intimately connected with, the success of the latter arrangement. Of the impracticability of accomplishing the former, we have already fully stated our views.

193. But although we are decidedly adverse to any general introduction of such a plan, we are of opinion that considerations connected with local circumstances, the character of individual officers, and the comparative pressure of business on the judicial and revenue officers, may render it expedient in particular instances to invest the collector with the powers of a magistrate.

194. Regulation IV. of 1821, has fully provided for such an arrangement whenever Government may see fit to adopt it. The collectors of Rungpore, Ramghur, and the Jungle Ments, were some time ago empowered to act as magistrates, and the junior officers, who by the character of sub-collectors, have been vested with revenue duties in particular pergunnahs or portions of districts at a distance from the sudder station, have in general been empowered to act as joint magistrates also within such pergunnahs.

195. This united authority is now exercised by the sub-collectors of Khoordah and Balasore in Cuttack, by the sub-collector Pilleebheet in Bareilly, and by other officers in Moradabad, Etawah, Allighur, Meerut, and Bundelcund, and the measure is recommended by various considerations.

196. The local jurisdiction is seldom so extensive as to preclude the efficient discharge of the duties of both departments; the officers themselves are generally selected for such trusts from their activity and intelligence, and have in most instances had some judicial experience.

197. They relieve the zillah magistrate from a portion of his duties; the prosecutors, prisoners, and witnesses are subjected to much less inconvenience than they would suffer if compelled to proceed to the more distant station of the zillah courts; the conduct of the police officers is subjected to more vigilant and close superintendence; and the exertions of the zemindars and village officers in aid of the police can be encouraged or enforced more promptly and effectually.

198. Your Honourable Court is aware that in the Delhi territories, in Ajmere, in the Saugor and Nerbudda territories, in Kumaon, in the zillah of Ramghur, and in the persons of the commissioners of Cuttack and the north-eastern frontier of Rungpore, the superintendence of revenue duties, of the police, and of the civil and criminal justice, is vested in the same hands.

199. Your Honourable Court is also aware that the rules restricting the appointment of individuals to judicial offices, until they should have been previously employed in the judicial departments for a specific period, have been rescinded; that the students in the college of Fort William, so soon as they are pronounced qualified for the public service, and are appointed to zillah stations, are nominated assistants both to the magistrate and collector of such zillah; and that by Regulation V. 1825, the Government is empowered to vest, with certain exceptions, the jurisdiction and powers of a civil judge and of a collector of revenue in the hands of the same officer, whenever and so long as such an arrangement may for special purposes appear expedient.

200. The foregoing explanations will satisfy your Honourable Court that we are not influenced by abstract or theoretical objections in discouraging the transfer to the collectors of the powers of magistrate. In the practical difficulties which oppose any general adoption of the measure, your Honourable Court may be assured that we shall not hesitate to sanction the union of those powers in future instances in which the character of individuals, the nature of public business, and local considerations may show that it is calculated to prove beneficial to the public interest.

201. In our letter to your Honourable Court from this department, dated the 3d July 1823, and in the documents which accompanied it, the grounds on which we had deemed it expedient to appoint separate magistrates to the districts of Hooghly, Jessore, Nuddeah, Purneah, and Tirhoot, and to relieve the civil judges of those districts from all charge of the the police and of the administration of criminal justice, are fully explained; and we are happy to say, that the practical advantages which have resulted from the experiment, have fully realized the expectations which we had formed. The office of judge and magistrate of Hooghly has for some time past been united again in the hands of one individual, not because a continuation of the same system in that district was not exceedingly desirable, but because the improved state of the police and the diminution of arrears in the civil court rendered its further duration less indispensable there than in other districts. Similar results have been obtained in the districts of Nuddea and Jessore, and we hope to dispense with the services of a separate magistrate in those districts in the course of the ensuing year.

202. We solicit the particular attention of your Honourable Court to the measure above adverted to, as one which is, in our judgment, more than any other, calculated to correct the most prominent defects in the management of the police, and in the administration of civil and criminal justice, and which we should earnestly wish to see as generally adopted as possible.

203. The measure comes recommended by the high authority of the Marquess of Hastings, who, in suggesting the separation of the offices of judge and magistrate, has observed, that they appear to be nearly incompatible; that the duties of a judge necessarily confine him to his court-house, while those of a magistrate can never be so properly executed as while he is engaged in a personal visit to every part of his district; that the administration of civil justice requires the patient and cool deliberation of mature age, while the preservation of the peace of a district calls for all the active energy of early youth; that a judge should perhaps be abstracted from all private converse with the natives, but that a magistrate must maintain a most intimate communication with them, and carry his researches into the utmost recesses of their privacy.

204. The court of Sudder Dewanny Adawlut have also adverted to the same subject, in the following terms:

“Without entering upon a full discussion of the general question, whether, if any new division of European authorities in the zillahs and cities be required, a separation of the offices of judge and magistrate, without uniting either to that of collector, would not be the most useful and expedient; we shall here notice only the following advantages, as evidently connected with such an arrangement.

“First, The magistrate and the civil judge respectively having no other duties to call for their time and attention, excepting those of their proper department, the functions of each would naturally be discharged with much greater promptitude and regularity than can be expected when daily and exigent duties press equally for their exclusive occupation in two distinct branches of the public service. Secondly, the judges and registrars of the civil courts, having no other duty to perform, might be expected to keep up the business of those courts without arrear; to maintain an efficient control over the sudder aumeens and moonsiffs acting under them; and to examine personally witnesses whose testimony is required, either by themselves or by the superior courts, instead of employing native agency for that purpose, as now unavoidably permitted by the regulations. Thirdly, the magistrates and their assistants being disengaged from the business of the civil courts, and being consequently able to devote the whole of their time to the duties of police and criminal justice, the most important benefits in each of these departments might be expected to result. The magistrate might occasionally visit the police thanahs within his jurisdiction, or depute his assistant for that purpose. He would also be at liberty to give much of his time to the reports of his police officers, and to an active superintendence and direction of the police in all its details, which could not fail of proving highly beneficial. He would at the same time, with the aid of his assistant, be able to investigate criminal charges of magnitude, as well as those of an inferior degree, to a much greater extent than he can at present, occupied as he is during a large portion of every week in the business of the civil court. A more speedy and satisfactory administration of justice in all cases within the cognizance of the magistrate, would not be the only good consequence. He would further be able to try deliberately, and might be entrusted to determine, with or without the assistance of his law officer, many charges which are now left to the trial and decision of the courts of circuit."

205. The late Mr. Adam's sentiments in favour of this plan are recorded in his minute of the 12th of June 1823, which formed an enclosure in our despatch to your Honourable Court of the 3d July 1823.

206. It would be easy to multiply quotations from others of our public functionaries, both on this establishment and that of Fort St. George, to the same effect; but we shall confine ourselves to the following extract from Mr. Henry Shakespear's police report for the year 1819, recorded on our proceedings of the 24th November 1820.

"I trust I shall be forgiven if I enlarge a little upon this subject. Without asserting it to be the case in every district, I think I may assume the position, generally speaking, as undeniable, that an officer holding the situation of a judge and magistrate is so overwhelmed with business, that, as a judge, he has no leisure to see the greatest part of his own judgments and those of the superior courts duly carried into execution; nor, as a magistrate, has he leisure to control with sufficient energy the conduct of his police officers, or to obtain from the higher orders of the community that aid and co-operation in the performance of his functions which he is legally entitled to expect from them. If this is admitted, and I believe it cannot be denied, such want of leisure in the one case must be fatal to the efficiency of civil justice, and in the other to the efficiency of the police. Other causes of a similar tendency may no doubt be urged; but these appear to me the most prominent, and it will be easy to show that they are fully adequate to produce those effects.

"It is obvious that, unless duly enforced, the decrees of the zillah courts, and also of the inferior and superior tribunals, are nothing more than the grave opinions of respectable individuals, which, so far as redress is afforded, might as well not have been delivered; the party seeking it had better have kept back his claim, and the judge spared himself the trouble of investigating it. It is unnecessary to dwell on this subject: I have given my opinion upon it freely, because I consider the non-execution of decrees as the greatest defect in our civil code; and, as the experience of many years in the judicial line of the service has pressed it upon my attention in the zillahs where I have served, I cannot doubt that it prevails nearly in an equal degree in all. It is not, however, long since the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut required statements from every district of the number of unexecuted decrees, and the result will show how far my opinion upon the subject is correct.

"Under the present constitution of the office, a magistrate cannot be absent from his station (except in the vacations, when the civil court is closed,) without entirely neglecting his duties as a judge. Few therefore can be expected to visit the interior of their districts, or to know any thing of the state of the country and the condition of the people, of the characters of the zemindars, or the conduct of the subordinate officers of police, excepting what they may learn privately or in the public discharge of their official duties; but how polluted the source of such information must often be, and how totally insufficient for any practical purposes of improvement in the one, or control over the other, is self-evident.

"Unless grievously ill used, few in the lower classes will voluntarily come forward, either to complain against their zemindar or the police darogah in whose jurisdiction they reside. The personal inconvenience attending absence from home, the tardiness of proceedings in criminal cases of inferior moment, and the risk of the result, must always operate to discourage them from seeking redress at the zillah stations.

"The case would be different if the magistrate was occasionally in the habit of residing in the interior of his district. He would then see what the actual state of the people was; he would hear and redress their grievances on the spot; the darogah and the zemindar, anticipating his visit, would be guarded in the exercise of their power; they would be instructed in the co-operation expected from them in the management and and aid of the police, which under such supervision could not fail to be more efficient, and far more popular than it is at present. The praise or censure which the magistrate in these visits would frequently find occasion to express of the conduct of the more opulent classes, the marks of distinction, however trifling, which he might bestow on those who appeared to seek the welfare of their tenants, and not merely the utmost farthing that could be exacted from them, and the opportunities thus given of inquiring into their condition, their customs and village institutions, would persuade the people that we were really interested about them, and give to our government a character which at present it certainly does not possess.

"If the zemindars could be compelled to take an active part in support of the police of the country, the most beneficial results might be expected. By the regulations* in force, they and their servants are bound by severe penalties to give information of all crimes of importance, of the resort of all known criminals to their estates, and in short (which added to the above, may be construed to embrace every kind of aid which the police can possibly require from them),† to afford every assistance in their power towards the apprehension of thieves and robbers of all descriptions. It would be difficult to point out what more could be required from them, unless it were to hold local inquiries, and submit the result of them on paper to the magistrate.

"The defect is that these rules are not systematically acted upon, so as to become the known and received law of the land. In some districts (and they are the best managed) they are enforced in all matters connected with crimes of magnitude, such as murder, gang robbery, and serious highway robberies; in other districts a greater laxity is observable; whilst in all, little is required from the zemindars on the occurrence of inferior crimes, which although perhaps of small importance in the eyes of the magistrate, are to the community at large a source of serious grievance, and which, under more active control, a zemindar and his servants might in some measure be able to check. That they do not exert themselves, may, I think, be traced (as I have before observed) to want of leisure on the part of the magistrates to exact from them those aids in the administration of the police which they have a right to demand at their hands.

"The remedy for all these defects is, the separation of the offices of judge and magistrate; exonerating the latter from all concern in civil business, and making it his sole occupation to watch over the police of his district, to administer criminal justice (to a certain extent), and to exercise a prompt and vigilant control over his police officers, the zemindars, and other people of influence in his district, for the suppression of crime and the amelioration of the condition of the lower orders.

"Looking at the state of the different departments in the service, the office of magistrate will perhaps be more efficiently, and with less violence to long-established usage, be filled by those at present holding the situations of registrars, than by any other class of officers in the service. Many might be selected of tried experience, who have on several occasions already exercised, with satisfaction to the government, the powers now proposed to be permanently vested in them. The loss of their services in the administration of civil justice may be easily provided for, and the increase of their salaries, which the arrangement might involve, would be lightly felt when compared with the importance of the objects obtained."

207. If the principle of the arrangement which we are now advocating, and which is supported by the recommendation of so many of your best informed public officers, should, as we earnestly hope it may, meet the sanction of your Honourable Committee, should propose to introduce it at present only in those districts where the pressure of civil and criminal business may render it more particularly necessary, and to extend it gradually as circumstances might suggest."

* Vide Reg. IX. 1808 VI. 1810; I. 1811; III. 1812; VIII. 1814; s. 33, Reg. XII. 1814.

† Vide s. 3, Reg. XXII. 1793.

208. We should select for the office of magistrate those joint magistrates and senior registrars whose experience and talents might point them out as properly qualified for the trust; and we imagine that in the districts in which the offices of judge and magistrate might be vested in distinct hands, the services of a registrar might ordinarily be dispensed with; more especially if it shall be determined to augment, under special circumstances, the amount of suit cognizable by the sudder aumeens.

209. Under this arrangement, the European officers of a zillah would be the judge, the collector, the magistrate, and either a registrar or one assistant, whose services might be rendered available both to the collector, and to the magistrate as at present. The judge would be relieved from the chief burthen of summary suits connected with rent, &c. by their transfer to the collector, and from all business connected with the police and the administration of criminal justice, by its transfer to the magistrate.

210. He would thus be enabled to devote nearly his whole time to the investigation of regular suits and appeals, to the enforcement of decrees, to the vigilant control of the sudder aumeens and moonsiffs, while the powers of the two latter classes of functionaries might safely be extended to the trial of suits of a higher amount or value than those now cognizable by them.

211. The collector, in addition to his ordinary revenue functions and to the various miscellaneous duties devolving upon him, would take cognizance of almost all the summary suits with which our civil courts are now burthened.

212. The magistrate would, in matters of police and criminal justice, exercise the powers now vested in those officers, he would relieve the judge from the trial of summary suits connected with forcible dispossession, he would be able to devote a portion of his time to the visiting of the interior of his district, to the correction of abuses on the part of the police officers, and to the encouragement of the zemindars and others possessing local influence, to render their aid towards the improvement of the police.

213. We feel satisfied that under such a system every branch of internal administration would be invigorated and improved, and that the labour of the European functionaries would, by such a distribution and division of power, be employed with infinitely more benefit to the interests of the community and to the credit of your administration, than by any other plan which could be devised short of the multiplication of that class of officers, and of the extensive subdivision of the large districts now entrusted to them.

214. We apprehend that even at Madras the charge of the police has, in many instances, been practically transferred to one of the collector's assistants, by which in reality a division of authority, nearly similar to that above proposed, is established.

215. We now proceed to that part of your Honourable Court's letter which relates to the Administration of Criminal Justice; and it will be convenient to include under this head, rather than under the head of Police, the remarks made by your Honourable Court in paragraphs 148 to 163 of your despatch, in regard to the inadequacy of the means provided for the cognizance of petty offences and misdemeanors coming under the head of calumny, abusive language, slight trespass, inconsiderable assaults and petty thefts, as well as of complaints regarding adultery, fornication, and rape, which are cognizable in the foudary department.

216. On this subject your Honourable Court has observed as follows:

"The only effectual way of affording redress for such acts, and of restraining the perpetration of them, as well as of discouraging and preventing false and unjustifiable prosecutions in cases of this sort, is by the introduction of a much more numerous and extensive agency than now exists for the trial of such offences, or than can be furnished from the European line of our service. To our native subjects we must look for the supply of the deficiency so severely felt. We have long employed them in the administration of civil justice in its minor concerns; and the reasons are equally cogent why we should in the same manner avail ourselves of their instrumentality in the affairs of criminal judicature.

ture. The reason in both cases are founded in the necessity of things in a foreign dominion like India; but we must, while we rest the principle on that foundation, at the same time express our conviction that, abstracted from this view of the subject, there are considerations of general policy which would strongly recommend a liberal admixture of native with European authority in the magisterial department of police, as in other departments of civil administration.

"We therefore wish you to consider in what manner this can most unexceptionably be accomplished, and particularly whether the native commissioners of a superior order, which we have proposed to establish for the administration of civil justice, might not also be authorized and required to act in the former capacity."

217. It is unnecessary for us to enter on this occasion into any explanation of the motives which induced the government to pass Regulation IX. of 1807, VII. of 1811, and III. of 1812, prohibiting the police darogahs from hearing petty complaints, and imposing restraints on the institution of frivolous, malicious, and unfounded charges of the nature above indicated before the magistrate.

218. We are satisfied that to revive those powers, whether in the hands of the darogahs or of the moonsiffs, would again lead to extensive abuses which could not be corrected by the magistrate, and to disturb rather than to promote the peace and harmony of the village communities.

219. The records of our courts show with what eagerness the most trifling verbal abuse, or the most trivial blow which could be construed into an assault, were made the cause of appeal to judicial interference, and the heart-burnings, enmities and mischief to which such complaints led. It appears to us to be practically wise and expedient to impose restraints on the facility of bringing such cases under judicial cognizance, so as to give time for the subsiding of angry emotions, and to prevent that permanent hostility between parties, which litigation, even on the most petty questions, so generally creates between natives of this country.

220. The inconvenience actually produced by the want of speedy redress for abusive language, calumny and inconsiderable assaults, is, we believe, not seriously felt in this country; and we cannot think it desirable that numerous tribunals should be accessible in every district for the cognizance of such cases. We apprehend that the chief object of your Honourable Court has been already sufficiently provided for by the power vested in the magistrates to refer for trial to the Hindoo and Mahomedan law officers of the courts, and to the higher class of sudder aumeens, complaints or charges for petty offences, such as abusive language, calumny, inconsiderable assaults or affrays, and all charges of petty thefts, when unattended with aggravating circumstances.

221. In regard to these cases, the law officers and sudder aumeens are vested with the same powers as those conferred on assistants to the magistrate. The decisions of the sudder aumeens are open to review by the magistrate, if appealed within the period of one month. The sudder aumeens are also required to submit a monthly statement, showing the manner in which the cases referred to them may have been disposed of, in order that the magistrates may have the means of noticing and correcting any irregularities in their proceedings.

222. The situation of the sudder aumeens has been made more respectable, as well in point of salary as in other respects; their proceedings are carried on under the immediate eye of the magistrate; and as far as past experience enables us to judge, we think there is little danger of any serious or general abuse of the power vested in them, that the services of the sudder aumeens in this department will be useful and efficient, and that such petty complaints as may be brought forward will be disposed of with promptitude.

223. In regard to cases of adultery and fornication, they are very rarely brought forward as criminal complaints by the natives of this country, nor does it appear expedient to encourage the more frequent resort of complainants on these grounds.

224. Such questions (as before noticed) are more properly cognizable by punchayets, or heads of caste, than by our judicial tribunals; and where redress is sought at all, it is generally sought by reference to the institution or individuals above designated.

225. Rape, on the contrary, is a crime of so deep a dye, as to bring it within the cognizance of the highest criminal courts; and we are of opinion, that the provisions of section 6, Regulation XVII. 1817, are sufficient for the purpose.

226. As connected with this subject, we beg in this place to quote the preamble to Regulation VII. of 1819, by which provision has been made for the speedy cognizance and punishment of certain misdemeanors therein indicated:

"It has been represented to government, that in some parts of the country, and especially in cities and large towns, the peace and happiness of families are often destroyed by evil-disposed persons, chiefly women, who are employed to entice and take away the wives or female children of the fixed inhabitants from their respective houses, for the purpose of rendering them prostitutes or concubines, or of otherwise unlawfully disposing of them, to their serious detriment, and to the injury of their husbands and parents. It has also been stated, that great distress to women and children is frequently occasioned by husbands and fathers deserting their families, and neglecting to provide for their support, although possessing the means of maintaining them; as well as from a similar neglect by the fathers of illegitimate offspring, in neither providing for the support of such offspring, or their mothers. The speedy cognizance and punishment of such misdemeanors by the zillah and city magistrates and joint magistrates, subject to the regular control of the courts of circuit, appear to be the most efficient means of preventing or checking the culpable practices above described. It is further judged expedient to empower the magistrates and joint magistrates to take cognizance of certain misdemeanors committed by workmen and domestic servants, in cases not expressly provided for by any existing regulation, at the same time maintaining the just claims of workmen and servants upon their respective employers; the following rules," &c. &c.

227. In paragraphs 167 and 168 of your despatch, after adverting to the prejudicial consequences which result from delay in the administration of criminal justice, your Honourable Court have suggested that the collector, in his future capacity of magistrate, should try and determine all cases now cognizable by the zillah magistrates; that the judge, in his capacity of criminal judge, should be vested with judicial power, in cases of greater magnitude not being of a capital nature; that the zillah judge should be aided by the moulavee and pundit of his court, should proceed invariably on the trial immediately on the magistrate's commitments, and that in cases of a certain magnitude his sentences should undergo the revision of the court of circuit; that in the principal cities the functions of judge and magistrate be continued in the hands of the same person as heretofore, but with the same extended power for the trial of criminal offences as is proposed to be given to the zillah judges.

228. On the question of transferring the functions of magistrate to the collectors, we have already submitted our sentiments, and the following explanations will show the nature and extent of the powers in the administration of criminal justice, which have been vested in the zillah and city magistrates, in addition to those which they were authorized to exercise at the period when your Honourable Court's despatch was written.

229. The most important of those additional powers were conferred upon the magistrates by Regulation III. 1816, and the grounds assigned for its enactment are nearly the same as those which were urged by your Honourable Court:

230. The preamble to the regulation in question is as follows:

"Whereas, under the existing regulations, the magistrates are not empowered to pass any sentence of punishment upon prisoners who may be charged before them with the offence of breaking into, or attempting to break into houses, tents, boats, or other places of habitation, or into warehouses or other places used for the custody of property, with an intent to steal, as defined in section 2, Regulation I. 1811, or with the offence of receiving or buying stolen goods, knowing the same to be stolen: And whereas much of the time of the judges of circuit is occupied in investigating these and some other offences, which from their character, and from the circumstances attending their perpetration, do not very frequently demand any severe or exemplary degree of punishment: And whereas the prosecutors and witnesses in such cases are exposed to great distress and inconvenience, in being compelled to attend, not only during the inquiry into such cases before the magistrates, but subsequently during the trial before the court of circuit: And whereas the prisoners themselves in such cases are sometimes subjected to a prolonged detention in custody previously to their trial at the sessions: And whereas some of the inconveniences above noticed will be obviated, and the ends of criminal justice will be more promptly and effectually obtained, by investing the magistrates with certain powers with regard to the trial and punishment of persons charged with and convicted of such offences; the following rules," &c. &c.

231. Under the detailed provisions of this regulation, and the subsequent amendments contained in Regulation IV. 1820, and VI. 1824, the magistrates are empowered to try all prisoners, whether as principals or accomplices, charged before them with the offence of breaking into or attempting to break into a dwelling-house, tent, boat, or other place of habitation, or into any warehouse, storehouse, or other building or place, used for the custody or preservation of property, either by night or by day, and (except under certain specified circumstances of aggravation, which render it necessary that the prisoners should be committed for trial before the court of circuit), to sentence prisoners clearly convicted of such offences to imprisonment with hard labour for a period not exceeding two years, and to corporal punishment, not exceeding 30 stripes of the rattan.

232. Similar powers are vested in the magistrates* in the trial of all persons charged with cattle-stealing or with thefts, in which the amount stolen may not exceed 300 rupees, and which may be unattended with certain specified circumstances of aggravation, or with the offence of buying or receiving stolen property, knowing it to have been stolen, when not exceeding 300 rupees in amount or value.

233. Convicts or prisoners confined for security, or under examination, who may effect their escape from custody without committing any acts of serious personal violence, may also be tried by the magistrate, and sentenced to imprisonment, extending either to six months or to two years, according to the circumstances of the case. The rules which had before been established by government and the nizamat adawlut, for the management of the public gaols, have been formally recognized by Regulation XIV. 1816, and the powers of the magistrates in maintaining good order and discipline in the gaols have been defined by that regulation.

234. By Regulation I. 1822, the magistrates are empowered to take cognizance of cases of affray unattended with homicide, severe wounding, or other aggravating circumstances, and to sentence prisoners duly convicted before them of such offences to six months' imprisonment, with a fine not exceeding 200 rupees, commutable, if not paid, to a further period of imprisonment not exceeding six months.

235. In these cases the magistrate is precluded from inflicting corporal punishment, and where the affray shall have been attended with homicide, severe wounding, or other aggravating circumstances, he is bound to commit the parties to the court of circuit.

236. By Regulation X. of 1824, the powers of the magistrates have been extended in regard to the offer of conditional pardons to accomplices or accessories, with a view to discovering the principal offenders, of prosecuting criminals to conviction, and of recovering stolen property. Every precaution has been taken to guard against an improper or injudicious exercise of the powers in question.

237. With a view to the better maintenance of the public tranquillity, and to the breaches of the peace, the summary investigation (which by former enactments devolved upon the civil courts) in cases of disputed boundaries or contested claims to the possession of lands, crops, wells, and watercourses, has, by Regulation XV. 1824, been transferred to the magistrates, leaving the parties, if dissatisfied with the award of the magistrate, to institute a regular civil suit for the final determination of their rights.

238. The foregoing recital will show that the powers of the magistrates have been very considerably enlarged of late years, so as to diminish materially the labours of the courts of circuit in the trial of cases of minor importance, and the inconveniences to which prosecutors and witnesses in such cases were exposed by the necessity of attending twice at the sudder station; while, by bringing under the periodical review of the courts of circuit all sentences passed by magistrates in which the punishment may exceed six months' imprisonment, a sufficient precaution has been adopted to guard against the irregular or injudicious exercise of the additional powers above adverted to.

239. Some judgment may be formed of the extent in which the enlarged powers granted to magistrates have tended to relieve the judges of circuit, by the following Statement, exhibiting the number of cases of Burglary on which sentence has been passed by the courts of circuit before and since Regulation XII. 1818, took effect; viz.

Cases of BURGLARY punished by the Courts of Circuit :

1818	1,117
1819	435
1820	394
1821	348
1822	346
1823	323

240. From this statement it appears that in each of the two years first specified, the number of burglaries punished by the courts of circuit averaged 1,100 cases, in each of the two last only 335. Nearly similar results may be assumed in regard to the number of persons charged with theft, and with receiving stolen property, who are now tried by the courts of circuit, compared with those who were tried by the same courts previously to the year 1819.

241. The alterations which have been made in the administration of criminal justice by the regulations enacted since the date of your Honourable Court's despatch, have, we trust, been further beneficial, in better defining, and in extending the powers of judges of circuit.

242. By Regulations XI. 1814, XVII. 1817, XII. 1818, III. XII. and XVI. 1825, the judges of circuit have been empowered, without reference to the nizamut adawlut, to award much less severe sentences than heretofore in cases of robbery, burglary and theft, when unattended with circumstances of aggravation; and the punishment of culpable homicide, of forgery, perjury and other offences connected with them, has been further limited; and the powers to be respectively exercised by the courts of circuit and by the nizamut adawlut more clearly defined.

243. By Regulation II. 1823, the minimum of the punishment in aggravated cases of affray, to be awarded by the courts of circuit, has been fixed; and the cases referrible to the nizamut adawlut, distinctly defined.

244. By Regulations XVII. 1817, and IV. 1823, various defects in the Mahomedan rules of evidence, and in the Mahomedan criminal law itself, which operated to defeat the ends of public justice, have been remedied.

245. By Regulation XII. 1825, the criminal courts have been prohibited from adjudging corporal punishment by stripes in cases of affray, and contempts of court; the use of the corah as an instrument of punishment has been discontinued in all cases; and females females convicted of criminal offences have been altogether exempted from corporal punishment by stripes; and it has been rendered necessary that two judges of the Nizamut Adawlut must concur in all sentences of death passed by that court.

246. By Regulation III. of 1818, provision has been made for bringing periodically under the revision of government the cases of all prisoners confined by the authority of government for reasons of state, and for their being properly and humanely treated so long as they may be detained in custody.

247. By Regulation VI. of the same year, measures have been taken to guard against the prolonged detention of prisoners under examination; and by Regulation VIII. of the same year, the powers of the magistrates and courts of circuit in requiring security for the good behaviour of persons of suspicious livelihood, or of notoriously bad or dangerous character, have been limited and defined. The cases of prisoners of the above description who were detained in confinement at the period when the regulation was passed, have been subjected to a careful revision by commissioners specially appointed for the purpose, and the result of their labour, which was communicated to your Honourable Court in our despatch of the 19th December 1822, paras. 9 and 10, will have met the wishes of your Honourable Court, as expressed in paras. 175, 176, and 177 of your despatch.

248. The total number of prisoners detained in custody in the Lower and Western Provinces, on failure to give security under the existing rules, amounted, on the 1st of January last, to 1,352, as explained in the following Abstract:

249. We trust that the foregoing brief recital of some of the principal rules recently enacted for the improved administration of criminal justice, will show the anxiety which your government has endeavoured to accomplish the objects indicated by your Honourable Court, under the third division of your letter.

250. Various misdemeanors, petty thefts, &c. have been made cognizable by the subaumeens; the magistrates have been empowered to try numerous cases formerly only cognizable by the courts of circuit, and the latter courts have been authorized to pass a final sentence in various classes of cases which were before referable to the nizamat adawlut.

251. The higher European tribunals have been thus relieved of a considerable portion of their business; the administration of criminal justice has been rendered more prompt and efficient; and prosecutors and witnesses in numerous cases relieved from the necessity of a double attendance at the sudder station of the zillah or city.

252. Your government, from the improved state of the police, has been able, without hazard to the public interests, materially to mitigate the extent of the penalties formerly annexed to many serious crimes.

253. Those penalties have been more accurately defined; the respective powers of the higher courts have been distinctly specified; every precaution has been adopted to prevent those abuses of power on the part of the police officers which your Honourable Court has noticed; to secure the proper treatment of prisoners under examination, the fair and impartial investigation of the charges against them, and the most humane attention to their health and proper comforts while in confinement.

254. The chief defects of the Mahomedan law have been now corrected; and our criminal code may claim the merit of great mildness in the nature of its penalties; while the administration of criminal justice is, through all its branches, superintended with a degree of vigilance which precludes the hazard of serious errors or irregularities being long continued without detection.

255. The great cause of failure in the administration of criminal as well as of civil justice, is the habitual disregard for truth which unhappily pervades the bulk of the native community, and the little security which the obligation of an oath adds to the testimony of witnesses.

256. We do not believe that this characteristic vice of the natives of India has been fostered or increased by the establishment of our courts of justice or other institutions. It has been found to prevail to at least as great an extent in Mysore, in the Mahratta country, and in other parts of India to which our authority had not extended, and where our institutions were unknown.

257. False testimony is in certain cases directly encouraged and approved by the sanction of the great lawgiver of the Hindoos, and the offence of perjury can be expiated by very easy penances. Under these circumstances, the inhabitants of India generally must undergo a great moral regeneration, before an evil, which saps the very foundations of justice, and bars all confidence between man and man, can be effectually remedied.

258. This subject has been very fully and ably treated in a presentment made by the grand jury of Calcutta to the supreme court, in the fourth term of 1823, and the expediency of abolishing oaths, as connected with native evidence, has been forcibly urged.

259. We have given every consideration to the remarks offered in the two last paragraphs of your Honourable Court's despatch on this important question, and to the very full discussion of it contained in the Report of the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut, in paragraphs 234 to 243 inclusive.

260. Our own impression is, that, generally speaking, the moral sanction of an oath does not (especially amongst the lower classes) materially add to the value of native testimony, whether of Hindoos or Mahomedans; that the practical restraint on perjury is the dread of the punishment prescribed by law for that offence, and that the fear of consequences in a future state, or the apprehended loss of character and reputation amongst their countrymen, has little effect upon the great majority of the people, in securing true and honest testimony when they may be influenced by the bias of fear, favour, affection or reward.

261. With these considerations, we should have no objection to try the experiment of dispensing with oaths in all civil and criminal cases of minor importance, in the first instance, at our more experienced judicial officers, including the court of Sudder Dewanny Adawlut

120 APPENDIX TO REPORT FROM SELECT COMMITTEE.

Adawlut, entertained the same opinion. Such, however, does not appear to be the case, and as our courts of justice are empowered to admit a solemn declaration in all instances in which, according to the prejudices of the country, it may appear improper to compel a person to take an oath, and as our regulations admit of any other oath than the one now in use being administered to Hindoos, which may be legal and binding on the consciences of the parties, we concur with the court of Sudder Dewanny Adawlut in opinion, that no modification of the existing rules (short of the abolition of oaths altogether) is requisite or desirable.

262. Persons of respectability are aware that they will be exempted from taking an oath in our courts of justice, on subscribing the solemn declaration prescribed by the regulations; and their reluctance to appear as witnesses is more justly ascribable to the little attention paid to the distinction of ranks in taking evidence, to their being liable to be confronted with persons of inferior caste, and to be subjected to cross-examinations as well as to trouble, inconvenience, and probable suspicion of giving false evidence. The rule which required that retrospective oaths should be taken half-yearly by the Mahomedan law officers of our civil and criminal courts, and such parts of the former regulations as directed that the law officers, or ministerial native officers of the courts of judicature, or any other native officers employed in the judicial, revenue, or commercial department, or in any public office whatever, should take and subscribe an oath previously to entering upon the discharge of the duties of the office to which they might be appointed, have been rescinded by Regulation XVIII. 1817, and the native officers are now required only to subscribe a solemn declaration to the same effect as the oath above referred to. The motive assigned for these enactments was the better maintenance of the sanctity and obligation of an oath, by confining the requisition of it to cases in which an oath might be necessary for the validity of evidence and the due administration of justice.

263. We have thus considered the questions specifically noticed by your Honourable Court. It will be allowed us, however, before concluding this despatch, to offer some general observations on the actual state of the country under the system of judicial administration now in force, and on some other points closely connected with it.

264. Independently of the City of Calcutta, and of the territories subject to the civil commissioners at Delhi, Kumaon, Saugor, and the banks of the Nerbudda, and some other tracts of smaller note (besides Lower Assam, Arracan, and other territories lately conquered from the Burmese), the provinces in which the system of police and of judicial administration prescribed by the existing code of regulations has effect, now comprise forty-seven districts (zillahs or cities), each of which, on a general average, may be assumed to contain a population of more than 1,000,000; each of these districts contains, on an average of the whole, an area of 5,000 square miles. The extreme length of twelve of the largest districts is, on an average, 158 miles, and of their breadth, 100 miles.

265. The inconvenience resulting from the extent and population of several of the larger districts would be much more seriously felt, were it not that by stationing a registrar or sub-collector, vested with the powers of joint magistrate and with local jurisdiction over a portion of such districts, remote from the sudder station, the exercise of control by our European functionaries over the native officers is facilitated, and the necessity of parties and witnesses proceeding to a great distance from their homes prevented. The latter object also has been promoted by the Provisions of Regulation XVII. 1823, which provide for sessions of gaol delivery being held at the stations of several of the joint magistrates where the measure could be effected without requiring the Judge of the circuit to undertake a journey of inconvenient length.

266. The local jurisdiction of one of these registrars and joint magistrates (Futtehpoor) has been recently constituted a zillah; and there are several others, such as Azimnagar, Shahjehanpoor, and Boolundshuhur, for instance, in which the same measure has been adopted.

magistrate, though on a very inferior footing in point of salary, performs duties as onerous and responsible as those of many other zillah judges and magistrates. The principle is not one on which it is desirable to act permanently. Motives of economy alone have precluded us from forming those jurisdictions into regular zillahs; and we trust that your Honourable Court will authorize our adopting the latter measure, so soon as the state of the finances may admit of it.

267. We have already stated our conviction, that in the present state of native society we cannot safely entrust the exercise of judicial authority, civil or criminal, to natives, without subjecting them to European control and supervision; and that in the degree in which we can extend that control, by the multiplication of European officers, we shall secure the fair administration of justice, and promote the happiness and interests of the great body of the inhabitants.

268. The periodical returns of the state of civil business for some years past, and the resolutions passed upon them by the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut and by Government, will show how seriously the administration of civil justice has been and still continues to be impeded by the insufficient number of European functionaries employed in that branch; but we trust that the measures which your Honourable Court have recently adopted will gradually operate to remove the embarrassment which we have for some years past experienced in supplying the demands of the public service, especially in the judicial department.

269. Although it is essential that we should at all times have it in our power to employ that number of European functionaries, whose services are required under the prescribed system of judicial administration, it is not less important that the individuals to be employed should possess the requisite qualifications for the proper discharge of the duties entrusted to them.

270. The state of the service, however, precludes our making such a selection as the importance of the offices to be filled demands, and we may be pardoned for remarking, that unless admission to your service in the first instance be made the reward of talents, industry and good conduct, some of the highest offices in the civil administration of this country must occasionally fall into the hands of individuals possessing very moderate qualifications and acquirements.

271. The difficulty of adequately supplying competent officers for the more important situations increases every day, and must continue to increase in proportion to the improvement of the country, and any reference to the state of things formerly existing at periods when the people were just delivered from the misrule of feeble or barbarous governments, must be entirely inapplicable to the present, and we hope future, condition of your administration in India.

272. To secure, therefore, the efficiency of your civil administration, the principle of selection on the first admission of individuals into the civil service should, we conceive, be particularly attended to; and the beneficial operation of this principle would be greatly augmented if your civil servants generally commenced their public career free from pecuniary embarrassments.

273. The various measures which have been adopted by this government with a view to the attainment of the latter object, have been brought under your Honourable Court's notice; and the information which we have lately received from the college council leads us to hope that they have been attended with great practical benefit.

274. Important as the object of supplying a sufficient number of duly qualified and independent European functionaries, it is scarcely less essential to the efficiency of your government that the higher class of native officers employed in the civil administration should be better qualified than at present, by education and habits, for the important trusts devolved upon them, and that they should be entitled to emoluments sufficient to ensure, under all circumstances of no ordinary temptation, the faithful discharge of those trusts.

275. Your Honourable Court has, on several occasions, directed our attention to this object; and you will find from various remarks which we have offered in the course of this despatch, that it has not been lost sight of. For a more full and satisfactory elucidation of our proceedings and views in relation to this object, and to the general improvement of the education of our native subjects, we beg to refer your Honourable Court to our despatches of the 30th July 1823, and the 27th January 1826.

276. Our anxious wish to encourage and promote the general dissemination of a knowledge of our regulations, and of the principles on which the administration of civil and criminal justice is conducted, has been evinced by the numerous works which have of late years been compiled and published both in the English and native languages under our instructions or encouragement. We here annex a memorandum of the principal works above referred to.

26. Ashbahoo Nazayir, or Examples and Illustrations of Mahomedan Law. By Zein Al Abdin } Persian Office : 3 Feb. 1826.

277. We have delayed the conclusion of this despatch, in the expectation of receiving from the Government of Fort St. George information which we called for on the 11th of May 1826, on various points connected with the practical operation of the changes which were introduced in the judicial system of that Presidency in the year 1815-16 ; that information however not having yet reached us, we shall hereafter forward it, with any further remarks which the consideration of it may suggest, to your Honourable Court. In the meantime we may observe, that the tenor of your Honourable Court's despatch to the Government of Fort St. George, dated the 11th of April 1826, warrants the inference that some at least of the important objects contemplated in the establishment of those changes have not been attained, and that the general result of ten years' experience does not encourage the adoption of similar alterations in the territories under this Presidency, in opposition to the almost universal feeling and opinion of your best informed servants.

We have the honour to be, Honourable Sirs,
Your most faithful humble Servants,

COMBERMERE.
J. H. HARRINGTON.

Fort William,

(2.)—COPY of a LETTER from the Bengal Government to the Court of Directors, dated 15th June 1830 : with its Enclosures.

Honourable Sirs :

1. Our last letter in this department was dated the 1st instant.
2. In pursuance of the intention expressed in paragraph 277 of a despatch to your Honourable Court, dated the 22d of February 1827, we have now the honour to transmit copies of documents noted in the margin,* containing the information called for from the Government of Fort St. George on the 11th of May 1826, on various points connected with the practical operation of the changes which were introduced in the Judicial system of that Presidency in the year 1815-16.

* Civil Com., 10th November 1829, Nos. 13 and 14.—Letter from Secretary to Government at Fort St. George ; dated 9th February 1830.—Letter from Registrar Sudder Adawlut to the Secretary to Government at Fort St. George, dated 23d April 1829.—Extract from the Proceedings of the Sudder Adawlut, dated 23d April 1829.—Statements (A. to Z.)—Extract from the Minutes of Consultation at Fort St. George, dated 9th February 1830.

3. In the 4th paragraph of a letter, dated the 30th April 1828, your Honourable Court intimated your intention of awaiting this Report from Madras, previously to your replying fully to the despatch above mentioned.

4. The Right Honourable the Governor in Council having, in the proceedings of the 9th February, recorded his opinion on the Report submitted by the Sudder Court, it is unnecessary that we should enter into any detailed review of it; and we shall confine ourselves to a few remarks suggested by a comparison of the systems in force under the two Presidencies.

5. In regard to the village moonsiffs, we find nothing in the Report of the Sudder Court to encourage the introduction of similar establishments into the Bengal territories. They do not appear to enjoy, to any great extent, the confidence of the people; while the number of suits decided by them have afforded very little relief to the district moonsiffs.

6. The report on the latter class of officers is in the highest degree favourable. In the corresponding tribunals under this Presidency, the moonsiffs are not empowered to try suits in which the value or amount sued for exceeds 150 rupees; nor can they try any suits for real property; whereas the district moonsiffs at Madras are competent to decide suits to the amount of 500 rupees, whether for real or personal property (with the exception of certain cases involving claims to land exempt from the payment of rent).

7. The powers of the sudder aumeens have also, for some years past, been more extensive than those of Bengal; and doubtless much of the reduction shown to have taken place in the civil business in the Madras European courts, since 1816, is to be attributed to that cause.

8. Your Honourable Court will have observed that in 1827 a regulation was passed by this Government (Regulation IV.) for enlarging the powers of the sudder aumeens in special cases; and we have apprized you in a former letter, that we have it in contemplation to increase them still further, as well as to extend the jurisdiction of the zillah moonsiffs.

9. The village and district punchayets are represented as being held in little estimation. So seldom is that mode of settling differences now resorted to, that in the statement marked (K.), referred to in the Report of the Sudder Adawlut, the former disposed of twenty-four cases only, and the latter of thirty-three, during the year 1827. The court observe, "it can now hardly be doubted that its prevalence in former times was a matter of necessity, from the want of other tribunals, rather than the effect of a prepossession in favour of an ancient institution."

10. The same result has been experienced in the territories subject to this Presidency, excepting in those parts where more regular tribunals are not accessible to the people. We are inclined to think that the most useful mode of deriving gratuitous assistance from respectable natives in the administration of justice, both civil and criminal, has been provided in the regulations of the Bombay Government, a transcript from which is given in the margin;* and we have made a reference to the courts of Sudder Dewanny and Nizamut

* Regulation IV. 1827. Section xxiv.—"Clause 1st. In the trial of suits, it shall be competent to every court in which an European authority presides, to avail itself of the assistance of respectable natives, in either of the three following ways:—First, by referring the suit, or any point or points in the same, to a punchayet of such persons who will carry on their inquiries apart from the court, and report to it the result. The reference to the punchayet and its answer shall be in writing, and shall be filed in the suit.

"Clause 2d (or Second). By constituting two or more such persons assessors or members of the court, with a view to the advantages derivable from their observations, particularly in the examination of witnesses. The opinion of each assessor shall be given separately, and discussed; and if any of the assessors, or the authority presiding in the court should desire it, the opinions of the assessors shall be recorded in writing in the suit.

"Clause 3d (or Third). By employing them more nearly as a jury, they will then attend during the trial of the suit will suggest, as it proceeds, such points of inquiry as occur to them; the court, if no objection arises, using every endeavour to procure the required information, and after consultation will deliver in their opinion.

"Clause 4th. It is to be clearly understood, that under all the modes of procedure described in the three preceding clauses, the decision is vested exclusively in the authority presiding in the court."

The foregoing rules are extended to criminal trials, by Clause 5th. Section xxxviii. Regulation II. 1827.

Nizamut Adawlut, to ascertain the sentiments of the court on the expediency of adopting similar provisions, with a view to the gradual introduction of trial by jury, should further experience justify the measure.

11. From the Appendix referred to in the 54th to 57th paragraph of the Sudder Adawlut's letter, a very considerable reduction appears to have taken place in the civil files of the European courts in ten years, from 1816 to 1826, as exhibited in the Abstract given in the margin.* The court have offered no explanation of the cause of this favourable change; our impression is, that it has chiefly resulted from the more extensive employment of native agency, and, in some degree, from the powers exercised by the collectors of land revenue in their magisterial capacity, in the adjudication, summarily, of all disputes regarding lands or crops, as well as in the pecuniary cognizance of suits between the landholders and their ryots for arrears of revenue; besides which, the transfer of the management of the police and of the office of magistrate to the collectors must, in some measure, have enabled the zillah judges to devote a larger portion of their time to the performance of their civil duties. In paragraph 72 of their Report, however, the Sudder Adawlut seem to doubt whether the transfer has in reality had that effect.

(2.) Letter from the Bengal
Government,
15th June 1830.

12. We beg to refer your Honourable Court to the despatch dated the 22d February 1827, paras. 185 to 195, for the reasons which militate against the general employment of collectors as magistrates in the territories of this Presidency. Some instances were pointed out, in which it had been deemed practicable to introduce the plan both in the Lower and Western Provinces. At the same time it may be observed, that the larger judicial powers exercised by magistrates under our regulations, compared with those entrusted to the magistrates of Madras, require perhaps more circumspection in the selection of individuals to fill the joint offices.

13. In the 60th paragraph of their letter, the Sudder Adawlut remark,—

“It seldom happens that the magistrates or their assistants interfere at all with the preliminary investigations in cases in which they have not the power to inflict punishment. In such cases the informations are, for the most part, taken by the native heads of district police, who either release the accused persons, or forward them direct to the criminal judge; and in point of fact, the exercise of magisterial functions by the collectors and their assistants is limited to the trial of petty offences punishable by themselves, without reference to higher authority.”

14. The judicial powers of the collectors, in the administration of criminal justice, do not in fact exceed those of the assistants under the Bengal Code.

15. Notwithstanding the opinion expressed by the Court in paragraph 62, we are disposed to think it advisable that our magistrates, as at Madras, should be relieved from the necessity of recording their proceedings in detail in every petty case that is brought before them; but we doubt the expediency of extending the exemption to subordinate functionaries; and we entirely concur with the Sudder Adawlut in the serious objections which exist to vesting native police officers (so long as they are continued on their present footing in point of emolument) with power to hold proceedings in petty criminal cases, and to inflict punishment by fine, imprisonment, and flogging, as sanctioned by Regulation IV. 1821, of the Madras Code.

16. The gross irregularities practised by the police officers, as noticed by the Sudder Adawlut, forcibly confirm the opinions we have formed of the dangerous tendency of trusting such powers to native officers, of the description of those who are now employed, more especially when allowed to exercise them at a distance from the immediate control of European authorities.

128 APPENDIX TO REPORT FROM SELECT COMMITTEE.

17. Nor is the result of the experiment tried at Madras, of entrusting the police officers with the duty of taking informations, in cases wherein the power of punishment rests with the superior tribunals, such as to encourage the introduction of the practice into these territories.

18. The subject is adverted to in paragraph 66 et seq. of the Sudder Adawlut's Report, from which it is abundantly evident that the plan has failed in the essential point of expediting commitments; that the laxity and irregularity of the preliminary investigation of the police officers has, in many cases, led to the acquittal of delinquents; while the undue means often resorted to by those officers to obtain confessions, as a ground-work of commitment, without further investigation, must frequently have been attended with the most mischievous consequences to the ends of public justice.

19. Above all, the latitude allowed to the police officers in the conduct of these preliminary inquiries, cannot fail to be a source of great oppression. The Court remark (paragraph 73), "There are few of the quarterly reports transmitted to the court of Foujdarry Adawlut, that do not exhibit numerous cases in which prisoners are detained by the police officers for weeks, and in some instances for months, before they are sent to the criminal judge;" and the Court add, "All the superior courts can do, is to bring them to the notice of the magistrates, who, in the exercise of the discretion which must necessarily be left to them, can hardly be expected to visit with much severity the delinquency of a police officer, whose services in the revenue department are perhaps of the highest value."

20. The Court's remarks on the office of criminal judge, and on the general efficiency of the police, suggest very few observations. The powers possessed by that class of officers in the punishment of offenders, appear to correspond with those exercised by magistrates in these territories; Regulation I. of 1825, by which they were extended, having been taken almost verbatim from Regulation XII. 1818, of the Bengal Code.

21. In the opinion of the Sudder Adawlut, there can be no question that relieving the zillah judges from the management of the police has been beneficial; "but whether the transfer of the police to the collectors has been attended with all the benefits expected from it, is extremely doubtful." They are fully occupied with their revenue duties, "and in consequence with most of them the business of police is, as in the nature of things it must be, a matter of secondary consideration;" a remark the Court consider equally applicable to the tihseeldars in their capacity of police officers.

22. Upon the whole, the information elicited by this inquiry is not calculated to excite any regret that this Government has refrained from uniting generally the duties of the collector and magistrate, and from calling in the aid of the native officers of police in the administration of criminal justice. It has indeed served to strengthen the opinions expressed in paragraph 202 to 213, in the despatch before alluded to, dated the 22d February 1827, of the superior advantages of placing the management of the police in the hands of an officer who can devote the whole of his attention to the subject, without being distracted by the duties of the civil court, or of the revenue department.

23. In noticing that despatch, your Honourable Court, in your letter dated the 30th April 1828, paragraphs 18 and 19, have sanctioned this arrangement, when the pressure of business may render some extensive additional assistance absolutely necessary for the due administration of justice; and to such cases of emergency we shall of course continue to restrict it.

We have the honour to be, Honourable Sirs,

Your most faithful humble Servants,

To H. SHAKESPEAR, Esq. Secretary to Government, Fort William.

Sir :

I AM directed by the Right Honourable the Governor in Council to transmit to you, for the information of the Right Honourable the Governor-general in Council, the accompanying copy of a letter from the Register to the court of Sudder Adawlut at this Presidency, explaining the causes of the delay in preparing the Report, which, in consequence of your despatch of 11th May 1826, that court was called upon to furnish, respecting the practical operation of the changes made of late years in the system for the administration of justice and police in the territories subject to this Presidency.

I am further directed to state, that the Right Honourable the Governor in Council has taken this occasion again to urge the judges of the court of Sudder Adawlut to furnish the required Report at the earliest practical period, and that when received, a copy of it will be transmitted without loss of time, for the information of the Right Honourable the Governor-general in Council.

Fort St. George,
26th August 1828.

I have the honour to be, Sir, &c.

(Signed) J. M. MACLEOD,

To the Secretary to Government in the Judicial Department.

Sir :

I AM directed by the judges of the court of Sudder and Foujdaree Adawlut, to acknowledge the receipt of Mr. Chamier's letter, dated 13th May last (No. 301.), desiring the early transmission of the report called for on the 6th June 1826.

2. The preparation of the report referred to has been delayed by various causes. Soon after the receipt of your letter, dated the 6th June 1826, the judges applied themselves to the task required of them; but it was found that, on several points of inquiry, the records of the court did not afford materials for furnishing the information called for by the Supreme Government; and a considerable time elapsed before answers could be procured from the several judicial and revenue officers in the provinces, to the reference made to them on the 7th of August 1826, for statements, &c. which they only had the means of supplying. Some of the returns received appeared to require revision, and a further delay has been occasioned by a second reference for that purpose. Then, in the course of drawing up the report, it occurred to the judges that several statements, in addition to those already prepared, were indispensable for the purpose of conveying to the Bengal Government the full information which they desire; and owing to the defective form of some of the periodical reports furnished by the lower courts, the preparation of these additional statements in the office has been found a matter of difficulty, and has consumed a great deal of time. Some, which the judges consider of the highest importance, are still unfinished, but it is hoped will soon be completed.

3. Considerable progress has been made in the Report, and the judges trust that they shall be able to submit it at an early period. Meanwhile I am directed to express their deep regret at the delay which has occurred in its transmission; and to assure the Right Honourable the Governor in Council, that they have devoted to the preparation of it all the time and attention which they could well spare from the discharge of their ordinary duties.

I have the honour to be, &c.

Government,

3. On the 18th August last, the judges explained to Government that the preparation of the report referred to had been delayed by various causes. Soon after the receipt of their orders, the judges applied themselves to the task required, but it was found that on several points of inquiry the records of this court did not afford materials for furnishing the information called for by the Supreme Government; and a considerable time elapsed before answers could be procured from the several judicial and revenue officers in the provinces, to the reference first made to them for information, which they only had the means of supplying. Some of the returns received required revision, and a further delay was occasioned by a second, and subsequently by a third reference for that purpose. In the course of drawing up the report also, it occurred to the judges that statements, in addition to those already prepared, were indispensable for the purpose of conveying to the Bengal Government the full information they desired; and owing to the defective form of some of the former periodical reports furnished by the lower courts, the preparation of these additional statements in this office was found a matter of difficulty, and consumed a great deal of time.

4. Further time was requisite to condense the information obtained into general abstract statements, and deliberation was necessary to draw thence just and correct conclusions. The severe pressure of numerous trials in the criminal department, the preparation of several important new regulations, and the numerous interruptions occasioned by the miscellaneous duties on the civil side of the court, which have occasionally occupied the judges, have contributed further to delay the report; but they are at length enabled to submit it to Government, in the hope that the delay which has occurred will meet with their indulgent consideration.

5. The judges will proceed to consider separately the several heads under which the Supreme Government have classed the information they were desirous to obtain, noting each in the margin of these proceedings, for the sake of more easy reference.

6. The first six heads refer principally to the civil, the others chiefly to the criminal judicature.

FIRST HEAD.

1st. How far the establishment of village moonsiffs provided for by Regulation IV. 1816, and by any subsequent regulation, has been found efficient and successful in accomplishing the object intended by it? What number of village moonsiffs the existing establishment in the several districts under the Madras Presidency? What number of causes was decided by them, or adjusted before them in the past year, 1825? And what number was depending before them in each district on the 1st January 1826? Also, what is the general character of the village courts, and of the moonsiffs who preside in them? And whether in the institution of suits not exceeding 10 rupees, which are cognizable by the village courts, experience has corroborated the opinion which the court of Sudder Adawlut were induced to express in the 61st paragraph of their Register's Letter of the 21st September 1818, "that a preference has been manifested by the natives towards the courts of the district moonsiffs." The Governor-general in Council would also wish to be informed, whether the curnums and other village servants receive any compensation sation for the duties performed by them under the provisions of Regulation IV. and V. 1816, and whether it has been found practicable to supply every village curnum with translations of those and other Regulations, which may have been subsequently enacted for their guidance, and that of the village moonsiffs.

7. Considerable difficulty has been experienced in ascertaining the number of village moonsiffs. The Returns first transmitted were so obviously imperfect and incorrect, that a second reference was found necessary. From the accompanying Statement,* which is framed from the amended Returns, it appears that the number of village moonsiffs in the several districts under this Presidency is 32,328.†

8. The Supreme Government have required only a statement of the number of causes disposed of by these functionaries in 1825; but in order to give a more complete view of the operations of these courts, it has been thought advisable to prepare a Statement,† showing the number disposed of by them, with the number depending at the beginning of each year from 1817 to 1827. It has been stated, however, that many village moonsiffs exercise their functions without transmitting the reports prescribed by Sections xxxvi. and xxxvii. Regulation IV. of 1816; and if this neglect has prevailed to any great extent, it is obvious that the Statement, owing to the defectiveness and the irregularity in the transmission of the returns from which it has been prepared, does not exhibit a full and correct view of the work performed by these courts, and of course no certain conclusion can be drawn from it. But there is no reason to believe that this omission on the part of the village moonsiffs has prevailed to any considerable extent. It seems improbable that many of those who have undertaken the performance of the duties entrusted to them, should neglect or refuse to perform the most easy and simple of them all; and if they do, it is clear that their claims to credit for a correct or efficient discharge of the higher functions of their office will become very questionable. It is no doubt true, that the number of those who make the prescribed reports is comparatively small; but this may be sufficiently accounted for by causes to be noticed hereafter, without supposing that any of the moonsiffs who actually exercise the functions assigned to them by the regulation, neglect to send the prescribed returns. Upon the whole, therefore, the Statement may be taken to afford a tolerably accurate view of the operations of these tribunals, although the materials from which it has been formed may not be so complete and correct as could have been desired.

9. It was considered proper to refer to the several authorities in the provinces for information respecting the general character of the village courts, and of the moonsiffs who preside in them, and subjoined are the most material passages of the reports received on this subject.

10. The late Mr. Monro, collector of Tinnevely, says: "Whenever the judge has occasion to notice to the collector the conduct of the village moonsiffs, it is to point out their incapacity; and my own observation leads me to believe, that in their capacity of village judges, they are not much resorted to by complainants."

11. The late Mr. Peter, collector of Madura, says: "As few of the latter (village moonsiffs) can read or write, few causes are decided by them, the parties preferring the district moonsiffs."

12. Mr. Saunders, late collector of Trichinopoly, says: "The general character of the village moonsiffs is great ignorance of their duty, and little knowledge of the Regulations."

13. Mr. Cotton, late principal collector of Tanjore, after stating that all the village curnums have been supplied with copies of translations of the Regulations enacted for their guidance, and that of the village moonsiffs, says, "Very few instances have come to my notice, in which they have been efficiently acted upon; and in respect to the lage courts, they are, I believe, in no repute among the people of the district, and are seldom or never resorted to; but of these more correct information may be obtained from the court at Combaconum, to which the village moonsiffs are required to make their returns of all cases decided by them."

14. The late Mr. G. T. Cherry, judge of Combaconum, which zillah comprises the two collectorates of Trichinopoly and Tanjore, says: "With reference to the second paragraph of your letter, desiring me to communicate my opinion of the general character of the village courts, and of the moonsiffs who preside in them, I beg leave to premise, that from the very scanty means possessed for obtaining information, and the little opportunity afforded for personal observation, it can scarcely be expected that a zillah judge should be so well acquainted with the subject as to be enabled to give, in any way, a decided opinion. I have, however, every reason to believe, that the establishment of village moonsiffs' courts has not been accompanied with any injury whatever to the inhabitants; and that, in a few instances, some real benefit has resulted from it, owing to the exertions of those individuals who have chosen to take upon themselves to discharge the functions of their office. The villages in the Tanjore and Trichinopoly districts are 7,493, and the sum total of the decisions made by the village moonsiffs under my jurisdiction, from the year 1818 to 1825 inclusive, amounts to 3,088. These suits were decided by only a few individuals. The reports required to be sent up by the village to the district moonsiffs, are by no means to be depended upon, and are not regularly transmitted by them. There is reason also to believe, that many of the petty suits disposed of by those officers are not inserted in their reports. There have been scarcely any charges of corruption brought before me against any of the village moonsiffs, and I believe such will seldom or ever be preferred, as litigating parties never will go to a village moonsiff whose character does not hold out some hope of their obtaining an impartial award; and such moonsiff as may be known to be open to corruption is never applied to by his own villagers, who prefer proceeding to the district moonsiffs, or even to the zillah courts, for the hearing of their disputes."

15. Mr. Sullivan, collector of Coimbatore, says: "Very little judicial business is ostensibly done in the village courts; neither in what is done is it probable that the Regulations are very strictly adhered to. Before the promulgation of these Regulations, an impression prevailed, that it would have been criminal for heads of villages to exercise those functions which had belonged to their office from time immemorial, and which were interrupted for the first time by the institution of zillah courts. This impression no longer prevails, and there can be little doubt that a vast many petty disputes which were formerly unredressed, or brought before the courts, are now settled by the heads of villages, without being matter of record, and with little or no reference to the Regulations. The heads of villages are usually the most wealthy and most respectable men in the community, and although generally illiterate, are fully capable of discharging in their own way, that is, without attention to form, the duties confided to them by the Regulations. It appears probable, however, that the influence of this class of people will decrease with the increase of wealth and general improvement in the condition of the great mass of people. I am only restrained from saying that this has decidedly been the case in Coimbatore, by the fact, that the office is as much coveted, and as much a subject of contest, as ever it was."

16. Mr. Woodcock, late judge of Salem, in which zillah are comprised the collectorates of Salem and Coimbatore, says: "With regard to the general character of the village moonsiffs and of their courts, I am somewhat at a loss how to report, as no list of them has ever been furnished to the court, nor have I any means of judging of their character and conduct from what takes place judicially before me. By the accompanying Statement (B.), it would appear that upon their first institution, in this zillah at least, they were much more resorted to than they are at present, which perhaps may be accounted for from the district moonsiffs having been, by Regulation II. of 1821, directed to hear and determine suits under 10 rupees, without receiving any fee fee. At the same time, it is satisfactory to know, that during the 10 years these courts have been in operation, only 13 petitions have been preferred against the village moonsiffs' decisions, and that these were principally complaining of the illegality of their proceedings, but in none of them were they accused of bribery or corruption."

17. Mr. Drury, late acting sub-collector in the Southern Division of Arcot, says: "With respect to the individual character of the village moonsiffs, it is satisfactory to state that few instances of abuse of authority appear on the records of this district against them." It would seem, however, that Mr. Drury speaks of these officers more as heads of the village police than as village moonsiffs.

18. Mr. Viveash, late collector of Chingleput, says: "Few cases publicly appear in which the village moonsiffs' courts are regularly resorted to by litigant parties; the Talook moonsiffs' courts are generally preferred by the traders or money-dealers, to whom the cultivators are usually indebted. The moonsiffs, however, as heads of villages, are of very important use in adjusting matters of dispute between cultivator and cultivator: and as arbitrators or composers of differences, the heads of villages are with some exceptions confidently referred to."

19. Mr. Paske, judge of the zillah of Chingleput, which comprises the two collectorates of Chingleput and the Southern Division of Arcot, says that he is "inclined to think, from the small number of decisions by village moonsiffs reported to the court, that they do not generally exercise the authority vested in them by Regulation IV. of 1816."

20. Mr. Nisbet, late principal collector in the Northern Division of Arcot, or the Chittoor zillah, after alluding to an arrangement, long contemplated but only very lately carried into effect, regarding the restoration of the ancient Mannicms and merahs of the village officers, says: "As the village moonsiffs and curnums will now enjoy much larger salaries than they did, and will for the most part be persons who have a natural interest in the welfare of the community under them, there is every reason to hope that the general character of the village courts will greatly improve."

21. In the Report from Mr. Waters, zillah judge of Chittoor, all that is material to the present purpose is, that numbers of the village moonsiffs in that district can neither read nor write, and are therefore entirely dependent upon the curnums in the discharge of their duties; that 10 only send to court the report required by Section xxxviii. Regulation IV. of 1826, and that the establishment altogether is in a very inefficient state.

22. Mr. Haig, the zillah judge of Cuddapah, says: "With regard to the general character of the village courts, and of the moonsiffs who preside in them, the zillah judge can obtain no satisfactory information. Some few of these moonsiffs understand their duty, and send in their reports regularly; but in general they are not only ignorant of the duties of their office, but regardless of any orders or instructions issued to them through the district moonsiffs."

NORTHERN DIVISION.

23. Mr. Smalley, the principal collector of Nellore, says: "No measures were spared for the purpose of rendering the village moonsiffs qualified to perform their duties; but as far as the principal collector and magistrate can learn, it appears that the village moonsiffs (although persons who collect revenue, and under whose authority the village servants act) do not possess much ability, almost the whole of them being incapable of reading and writing. Still, with the aid of the curnum, they transact business; and although in some instances they may deviate from the letter of the Regulations, they do it as correctly as could be expected, and perhaps in the best manner suited to the people."

24. Mr. Whish, the collector of Guntoor, says: "With respect to the general character of the village courts, it appears to the collector and magistrate that the persons who preside in them, excepting in a few villages, are persons not educated, and whose talents are unequal to the conducting the inquiries they are authorized to make."

formal and necessary manner required, either in civil or police cases. It is, however, obvious that many of them have, by degrees, become better qualified for the performance of their duties as heads of village police, as regularly as essential, under the instructions of the heads of district police. Some heads of villages, who are seemingly possessed of talent, even endeavour to avoid filling the office of moonsiff, from the fear of their being thereby prevented from bestowing sufficient time on their own affairs, while there are no emoluments attached to the office to remunerate them for the trouble. Secondly, they are fearful of falling into error in the execution of the business. It does not appear proper to enforce upon them at once the business they so much dread, and it is hoped that they will gradually fall into the way of it, and qualify themselves to perform every part connected with their duty."

25. Mr. Saunders, the zillah judge of Nellore, which zillah at the time of his report comprized the collectorates of Nellore and Guntoor, says: "It is also evident from the information that has been collected, that the village moonsiffs are in general illiterate and ignorant of the provisions of the Regulations that have been enacted for their observance in the discharge of their duty; and that very few of them are employed in investigating and deciding civil suits, is shown by the monthly and half-yearly reports, by which it appears that the average yearly number of suits disposed of by them, during the five years that have elapsed since the zillah of Guntoor has been united with that of Nellore, or from the 1st July 1821 to the 30th June 1826, has been only 233."

26. Mr. Roberts, late collector of Masulipatam, says: "That so far as absence of all complaint may lead to the inference that the conduct and character of the village courts are respectable, he has every reason to be satisfied, having in no instance received a complaint or insinuation of a contrary tendency."

27. Mr. Gardiner, the collector of Vizagapatam, says: "The village moonsiffs (with the exception of one at Ankapelly, who is an intelligent person, and performs his duty regularly and correctly) are unable to read and write, and are generally so ignorant as to be quite incapable of giving effect to the Regulations that have been framed for their guidance."

28. Mr. Cazalet, late collector of Ganjam, says: "It does not appear that the heads of villages in the Wodia Hill zumeendaries are acquainted with the contents of the Regulations; or have acted on them. Most of the naidoos of the villages in the low lands are only a very little acquainted with these regulations, but are performing their duties as village police, to the best of their abilities."

29. Mr. Monk, late judge in the zillah of Chicacole, including the collectorates of Vizagapatam and Ganjam, says: "With regard to the general character of the men who are ex officio village moonsiffs, the zillah judge is sorry to be obliged to report that in this zillah there are but very few indeed that are capable of reading and writing, which perhaps, as much as prejudice and disinclination to comply with the forms and rules laid down in the Regulations for their observance, has been the cause of so few assuming the office. It might reasonably be calculated, that from the influence the sanction of Government may be supposed to give to this office, would induce the naidoos readily to undertake the proffered distinction; but it must be recollected that in the Northern Circars we have to deal with an extensive and lawless set of hill people, different perhaps to those to be found in other parts of India. They do indeed regularly pay their small stipend to the Circar, but for no other object than to prevent any opening for our interference in their rule of authority. In every other respect they are perfectly independent, tenacious of power, prejudiced to their ancient habits and customs, studiously shutting up all roads to civilization, and looking down upon our institutions and authority with distrust and abhorrence, and not unfrequently setting them at naught. Of the seven village moonsiffs entered in the accompanying Statement, four are of the Vizagapatam district, and three of the district of Ganjam; of whom the four in the Vizagapatam district are incapable of reading and writing. Of the three in the Ganjam district, district, two are Brahmins, of course capable; the other was a Woodia, or bill person. The report of one of the Brahmins in August last, shows one cause decided; and one instituted; the other Brahmin and Woodia have ceased to make any reports to the court ever since it was stationed at Chicacole. The reports of the other village moonsiffs in Vizagapatam jointly show an average from about three to five causes instituted and decided monthly. It is however generally said, and believed to be the case, that the naidoo on the plains, to avoid the required forms and reports of causes before them to be made to the court, institute a summary and verbal inquiry; and if the defendant admits the justice of the claim made, they settle it amicably, and no more is heard of it; but if not, the parties are referred to the district moonsiff by the naidoo, and he declines any further interference: but of this mode of proceeding I have not been able to obtain any correct information. It is however remarkable, that although no more reports have been received from the persons who as naidoo must form a very extensive number of village moonsiffs, I am not aware of a single complaint having been made to the court, of a naidoo having refused to hear any complaint that might have been brought before him. The conclusion, therefore, to be drawn therefrom, I regret to say must be, that the desirable object of the enactment has totally failed in the zillah of Chicacole, by the concurrent dispositions of its inhabitants."

136 APPENDIX TO REPORT FROM SELECT COMMITTEE.

30. Mr. Lewin, late acting judge of Seringapatam, says: "There is nothing very remarkable in the character of the village moonsiffs' courts. They decide a great many causes in their respective villages, in some zillahs more than in others, according to the forms laid down in Regulation IV. of 1816. They would decide more if there was any emolument attached to the exercise of this authority, of course, which there is not; and in the time of cultivation, when they have but little leisure on account of their revenue duties as heads of villages, they are perhaps unnecessarily impeded in the discharge of their judicial functions, by the delays of forms laid down in a long Regulation of 30 sections, although the matter in dispute is limited to 10 rupees; and they are generally acquainted with all the circumstances of each suit before they enter on the disposal of it."

31. Mr. Sheffield, the principal collector of Malabar, says: "The persons who have been appointed village moonsiffs appear, generally speaking, to be qualified to preside in the village courts; but as yet I am not prepared to offer an opinion regarding the character of those courts, for although the dashadakars were long ago furnished with the prescribed surmuds, and duly empowered in every respect to receive and determine civil suits, they commenced entering upon their respective duties so very recently, that until about four or five months ago, scarcely a single suit was preferred to any one of the village courts throughout the province."

32. Mr. Babington, the late principal collector of Canara, very fully details the measures which have been adopted in that district for giving effect to Regulation IV. of 1816, and he assigns the following as the principal causes of the difficulty which has been found in procuring the duties of the village moonsiffs to be regularly performed. 1st. Their ignorance of reading and writing. In another part of his letter he says: "Of the above 1,367 moonsiffs, there are very few that can read or write and carry on the business themselves; some can sign their names, and understand nothing more, but the majority of them are men who cannot read nor write, nor even sign their names." 2dly. Their getting no allowance of stationery, absolutely required in the preparation of the memorandum usually sent for the attendance of individuals, for decrees, for examinations of the parties, of the monthly accounts, &c. to be transmitted to the court, and other public reports. 3dly. Their getting no fees, nor any remuneration whatever for the trouble of passing decrees and settling disputes. 4thly. Their liability to a fine, in the event of the accounts of cases decided, and of those remaining to be decided, not being regularly transmitted to the judge. It is right however to observe, that the levy of any fine in these cases is altogether unauthorized. 5thly. The difficulties experienced by the shanbagues in rendering the moonsiffs due assistance, from the

cumstance of the former's appointment, which was originally confined to the revenue duties of his mogamy, having been considerably increased of late years by the addition of police duties, which are too extensive to allow of his conveniently attending to every village moonsiff who requires his assistance; the number of shanbogues, as appears in another part of his letter, being only 273. 6thly. The difficulty of securing the attendance of the aogranée at the moonsiffs' cutcherry, to execute his orders for the attendance of individuals before him, because the former has other avocations which occupy all his time, such as the business of collections, &c. in the revenue department, the duty for which he was in the beginning exclusively appointed. It appears from another part of his letter, that there are only 420 aogranées. Mr. Babington then observes, that "although the salary of the village moonsiff is trifling, and no sort of fee is allowed him, yet the responsibility and influence of the situation are such as to induce many individuals to hold it who can afford to dedicate their time gratuitously to the office. By far the greater number, however, consider the duty to be a hardship upon them, and would willingly give it up; many tender their resignation of the potailship, which they have long held, in order to get rid of the duty of moonsiff, and the expense and loss of time which attend that duty." Mr. Babington then suggests several modifications of the establishment, among which is that of decreasing the number of village moonsiffs to one-third of the present number; by which means, he adds, "we should be able to retain those in general who can read and write, and thereby diminish the existing impediments to the proper discharge of the duty. The frauds practised by intriguing shanbogues on this class of native officers, in consequence of their ignorance of writing, are more extensive than any one not daily in the habit of witnessing it could conceive, and every measure that tends to check this system must be an improvement."

33. Mr. John Vaughan, zillah judge of Canara, after noticing the inadequacy of the shanbogue establishment in point of numbers, and the impossibility of their performing the duties required of them by Regulation IV. of 1816, in addition to their revenue duties, says, "As such is the case, I need hardly add, that the village moonsiffs being, in a considerable degree, deprived of the aid which the Regulations prescribed that they should receive, do not regularly transmit the required reports; those sent are frequently erroneous; decisions are passed by them without that check or assistance which the prescribed presence of the curnum (with copies of the Regulations for their guidance) is intended to effect; and, in short, I believe that irregularity so naturally to be expected as the consequence, is the general characteristic of their proceedings. Five or six decrees, without the counter signature of shanbogues, have lately come under my notice. In some of the northern talooks, many of the potails being brahmins, some are able to write their own decrees; and there can be little doubt that in such cases their labour is not gratuitous; but when they are unable to write, they are said to employ writers, who receive a remuneration from the persons in whose favour the decree may be passed. This information is not before me in an official shape, and of course is not likely to be so; but it appears to be not in the least contrary to probability; and the source from which I received it entitles it to credit. The statement in the margin* exhibits the extraordinary fact of suits of many years' (no less than 208 of nine years) standing being still pending before the village moonsiffs; although I conceive that when Regulation IV. of 1816 was framed, it was never contemplated that suits would remain undecided for as many months, or even weeks. It seems useless for the court to attempt to take notice of any such irregularities, while clause 3, section iv. Regulation IV. of 1816 protects the moonsiff even in contempt of its authority. Complaints of their disregard of the orders of the district moonsiffs have been repeatedly made to the court, but there appears to be no remedy while that section exists. The proved actual receipt of money, or their exceeding their powers of fine and imprisonment, alone appear to subject them to the interference of the court, according to the above provision provision and section xxxv." Mr. Vaughan then specifies several instances in which the village moonsiffs have evaded the restriction upon the amount of claims cognizable by them; and he remarks upon the inadequacy of the remedy provided in these cases and others, in which the Regulations are infringed. He observes, that the local peculiarities of Canara and Malabar oppose a great obstacle to the beneficial operation of the village moonsiffs' Regulation; and points out several abuses which may be successfully practised in those districts. He then submits a plan for remedying the defects of the system as applicable to Canara, the merits of which it is not necessary to be discussed on the present occasion; but the benefits which, as he expects, would result from it, are thus enumerated in the concluding paragraph of his letter: "Be it considered that I propose to substitute 209 judicatories for 2,128, which ought to exist, according to Regulation IV. of 1816. If the places of holding them are carefully fixed in the centre of each mogamy, no inconvenience can be felt by parties in suits; the court having to deal with such a considerably smaller number of responsible persons (the shanbognes being answerable for regular proceedings) must be proportionably relieved of trivial though troublesome duty; general regularity is most likely to be maintained, publicity of proceedings secured, the capricious delay of moonsiffs annihilated, promptitude of decision systematically provided for, the corrupt influence of shanbognes materially checked, and the probability of honest decisions considerably promoted."

34. The information afforded by the foregoing extracts is not in general, perhaps, so full nor so satisfactory as could have been wished, but it is the best that the judges have been able to procure. It will be seen that those officers in the provinces who are inclined to represent the character of the village moonsiffs in the most favourable light, still allow that they are for the most part very illiterate, and that in the disposal of the lawsuits brought before them, they attend but little to the provisions of the Regulations. The prevailing opinion, however, seems to be, that these functionaries are generally unfit to discharge the duties assigned to them as village judges, and that their courts are not held in much estimation, are but little resorted to; an opinion which appears to be confirmed by a comparison of the number of causes disposed of in the village courts with the number of similar causes decided by the district moonsiffs.

35. In the years 1825, 1826 and 1827, the number of causes disposed of by the village moonsiffs amounted in the aggregate only to 14,457,* while the number of suits for 10 rupees and under decided in the same years by the district moonsiffs was 44,768.† The disproportion, however, will appear much greater, if the Western division, in which the decisions by the village moonsiffs very considerably exceeded those of the same description by the district moonsiffs, is thrown out of the account. In the three other divisions, the decisions by the district moonsiffs amounted to 41,807, while those of village moonsiffs were only 9,385. It is to be presumed, however, that as the village moonsiffs are restricted to suits for sums of money or other personal property, some of the suits brought before the district moonsiffs, which from their amount appear cognizable by the village tribunals, were for real property, but the number cannot be large, nor materially affect the comparison.

36. It would be going too far to say that the disproportion between the work brought before the village and that brought before the district moonsiffs, is attributable solely and exclusively to the preference manifested by the natives to the courts of the latter; because from the information before the court, it would appear, that a disinclination to undertake the office of moonsiff prevails to a great extent among the heads of villages, and that, in point of fact, comparatively few willingly perform, and many have positively refused to perform, the duties assigned to them. This, of course, may be supposed to have contributed largely to the institution of so many petty suits before the district moonsiffs; and in the provinces, most of the petty suits which come before a legal tribunal, arise from which the monied interest, or the village and district bankers, sue the proprietors of

* See Statement (C).

† See Statement (D).

vators, who are usually the defendants. In such suits the village judge, however just, must be liable to a bias in favour of his fellow cultivators. It is, therefore, natural that the opposite party should prefer the district to the village court; more especially as the very distance of the former, by increasing the inconvenience of litigation to the party sued, may be held out by the suitor in terrorem to his other debtors, in order to induce payment of their just debts without recourse to law. Whilst, therefore, the village moonsiff may compose many village feuds, and allay many disputes between ryot and ryot before they ripen into a lawsuit, the judges are of opinion, that when recourse to law is determined on, the suitor, from a knowledge of his bias in favour of his fellow cultivators, or from his influence having already been exercised against the suit, is inclined to prefer another tribunal; and that this has operated very extensively in influencing the resort to the district in preference to the village courts. In respect to one zillah, there is on the records of the sudder court clear and indisputable evidence of this fact; the more remarkable, because it is at variance with the conclusion which might otherwise be formed from the collector's favourable report on the village moonsiffs in that district. In a letter to the Provincial Court, dated the 6th October 1823, Mr. Bird, then zillah judge of Salem, says, "Out of 1,788 causes depending before the Dharapooram and Yatapoor moonsiffs on the 31st August, no less than 1,215 were suits for the recovery of trifling debts under 10 rupees, all of which should be preferred to the village moonsiffs; but it appears, that not only in the Dharapooram and Yatapoor, but also generally throughout Salem and Coimbatore, the people will not carry their suits to the village moonsiffs; and having the option of preferring them in the courts of the district moonsiffs, those of Dharapooram and Yatapoor, in particular, have become overwhelmed with trifling cases, almost to the total obstruction of important business; and I see no way of remedying the evil, unless Regulation VI. of 1816 can be modified, and the moonsiffs be restricted from trying suits for any amount under 10 rupees." And in a subsequent letter, dated 10th June 1824, Mr. Bird alludes again to "the apparent determination of the people not to have recourse to the village moonsiffs." Here then is decisive proof of a strong preference shown for the courts of the district moonsiffs, and the judges think it may fairly be presumed, that a similar preference has been more or less manifested in all the other zillahs. Upon the whole, therefore, they are justified in saying, that experience has confirmed the correctness of the opinion expressed by the sudder court in 1818.

37. Neither the curnums nor other village servants receive any compensation for the duties performed by them under Regulations IV. and V. of 1816. The privileges and allowances which they possess were originally granted as a remuneration for their services generally, which, until the enactment of the Regulations above mentioned, were chiefly confined to the revenue department.

38. On the promulgation of Regulations IV. and V. of 1816, a translation was sent to the tehsildar of each district, with directions to summon the curnums of all the villages within his jurisdiction, and to cause them to take a copy. It would appear, however, that in some districts these orders were not fully carried into effect, and that in others the copies taken by the curnums have been lost or destroyed. Measures would appear to have been adopted to supply copies where they have been found wanting.

39. Upon the whole, it seems pretty clear that the objects contemplated in the establishment of the village tribunals have been but imperfectly accomplished. That they have operated at all to lessen the business of the zillah courts, is extremely questionable. Very few, if any, of the causes which they have disposed of would have found their way into the zillah courts. Most, if not all, of these would have been brought before the district moonsiffs; and the result must have been transferred to the courts of the latter without serving, in any manner, to abate their operations. The average decisions by village moonsiffs, from 1822 to 1827 inclusive, is something less than 4,000 per annum; and it is obvious that the addition of this number to the files of the district moonsiffs, the average of whose decisions, for the same time, is 52,570 per annum, could hardly have been felt, supposing them equally divided; each district moonsiff, 95 in number, would not have received an addition of more than 43 per annum; a mere trifle compared with the average yearly decisions of each, one with another, viz. 553; and if they had been unequally divided, as no doubt they would have been, the increase to the file of most of them would still have been comparatively light. The instances in which it could have had the effect of delaying the decisions of the district moonsiffs to such an extent as to induce litigants to resort to the zillah courts in preference, would not have been many; and the appointment of a few additional district moonsiffs would have offered an easy and simple remedy.

40. Then in consequence of the comparatively small extent to which the village courts have been resorted to, their operation in diminishing the expense of litigation in petty suits has been very limited, and has fallen far short of what at first must have been anticipated. It matters little whether this object of the institution has been defeated partially, at least, by the neglect or refusal of the village moonsiffs to perform the duties assigned to them, or by the repugnance of suitors to have recourse to these tribunals. It is to these two causes chiefly that the apparent inaction of these courts is to be ascribed; and any attempt to counteract the effect would meet with little success, and would perhaps be attended with an appearance at least of injustice. Looking, on the other hand, to the readiness and confidence with which the natives generally have had recourse to the district moonsiffs for the settlement of their petty controversies, the judges think that every object proposed by the establishment of the village courts might be attained without trying to exact from heads of villages what they, at least, consider a service purely gratuitous, or to compel suitors to resort to courts which they hold in little estimation.

41. Neither would it appear that the causes brought before the village moonsiffs are in general very speedily disposed of. Of the 304 causes depending in the Southern division on the 1st January 1827, 2 were filed in 1820; 11 in 1821; 13 in 1822; 21 in 1823; 35 in 1824; 54 in 1825; and 168 in 1826. The returns from the other divisions are not so specific on this head: but if the number depending in each be compared with the number disposed of in the year preceding, the arrear will appear much larger than it could possibly be if the suits were generally disposed of with any thing like the expedition which, considering the nature of them, might reasonably be expected.

SECOND HEAD.

2d. Similar information is desired respecting the courts of the district moonsiffs provided for by Regulation VI. 1816 (and by any subsequent regulation), with special reference to the enlarged powers vested in the district moonsiffs by Section iv. Regulation II. 1821.

42. It was not considered necessary to make any reference to the authorities in the provinces respecting the general character of the district courts and of the moonsiffs who preside in them. The high estimation in which they are held by the natives, and by those public officers who have the best means of judging of their character and efficiency is abundantly attested by the quantity of work brought before them, and by the applications which have been made, from time to time, for additions to their number. The accompanying Statements * show that the number of district moonsiffs in the four divisions under this Presidency is 95. They have been selected principally from the most intelligent and meritorious servants of the zillah and other courts; and their proceedings and general conduct are so open to the observation of the collectors and their subordinates, and of the zillah judges, that no serious malpractices on the part of any of them can long escape detection. Some instances of incapacity and misconduct have occurred among them, but not more than was to be expected, nor of a nature to affect their character as a body.

43. The accompanying Statement † exhibits the number of suits disposed of by these functionaries, with the number depending before them at the beginning of each year from 1817 to 1827 inclusive; and the accompanying Statement* shows the years in which the suits depending on the 1st January 1828, were instituted.

* See Statement (E).

† See Statement (F).

44. The judges were desirous of making a comparison between the number of decisions by these officers in appealable suits, and the number of appeals actually preferred from them; but the defective form of the returns compels them to confine the comparison to suits between 200 and 500 rupees. The form of the reports, which has since been altered, was originally framed for the purpose of showing the number of suits which, though cognizable by the village courts, were brought before the district moonsiffs, and the number cognizable by the latter officers under Regulations VI. of 1816, and II. of 1821, respectively. Their decisions, therefore, are classed under three heads, viz. suits for 10 rupees and under, suits between 10 and 200 rupees, and suits between 200 and 500 rupees; and the present Statements afford no means of ascertaining the number of their decisions in suits for 20 rupees and under, from which there is no appeal except in claims for real property. But, limited as the comparison is, it appears to be satisfactory in the highest degree. On reference to the accompanying two Statements,† it will be seen that in the years 1825, 1826, and 1827, the district moonsiffs disposed of 4,572 suits between 200 and 500 rupees; and that in the same years 627 appeals from their decisions in suits of that description were disposed of in the zillah courts. It must be observed, that in these years the number of appeals disposed of exactly corresponded with the number preferred; for from another Statement‡ which has been prepared, it appears that the number of appeals of this description depending on the 1st January 1825 and 1828 respectively, was the same, viz. 142.

45. Another Statement§ which has been prepared, and which is considered also satisfactory, shows that in the years 1825, 1826, and 1827, the aggregate number of appeals from the decisions of the district moonsiffs disposed of in the zillah courts, was 4,009; that in 2,031 appeals, the original decisions were confirmed, and in 1,490 reversed; the remainder, amounting to 488, having been dismissed for default, or adjusted by razeenamah.

46. It appears then, as far as respects the years above mentioned, that the appeals preferred from the decisions of the district moonsiffs, in suits between 200 and 500 rupees, were nearly in the proportion of one to seven; or, if the number of suits adjusted by razeenamah, viz. 1,062, be deducted from the total number disposed of, the appeals will be in the proportion of one to about five and a-half, and that the original decisions were confirmed in more than one-half of the aggregate number of appeals disposed of in those years.

47. It seems unquestionable that every object proposed by the appointment of these functionaries, and by the subsequent enlargement of their jurisdiction in 1821, has been fully attained; but it is impossible to estimate the extent of the relief which they have afforded to the zillah courts, because it is probable that many of the causes which have appeared on their files would never have been referred for judicial determination at all, had the district tribunals not existed.

THIRD HEAD.

3d. Similar information respecting the village punchayets provided for by Regulation V. 1816, and district punchayets provided for by Regulation VII. 1816; and the subsequent Regulations.

48. From the accompanying Statements of causes disposed of by village and district punchayets from 1817 to 1827 inclusive, it will be seen that this mode of settling disputes has been very little resorted to by the natives. In the first five years after the promulgation of Regulations V. and VII. of 1816, village punchayets disposed of 738 causes, and in the last six years, of 199 only. In the first five years 290 causes were disposed of by the district punchayets, and 215 in the last six years. The accompanying Statement* shows the years in which the causes depending before village and district punchayets on the 1st January 1827 were referred to them.

49. Under Regulations V. and VII. of 1816, the assent of both parties is requisite for the reference of a suit to a punchayet; and no doubt, in refusing his assent, a party may often be influenced by motives distinct from a general distrust of a punchayet's impartiality and integrity; but considering that parties in suits referred to village punchayets are not chargeable with any costs whatever, and that the costs chargeable in suits referred to district punchayets are very considerably less than when they are decided by district moonsiffs, it was natural to expect that with these advantages, arbitration would be more generally resorted to. The result of the experiment seems to warrant the conclusion, that with the great mass of the people, this mode of settling lawsuits is held in little estimation; and it can now hardly be doubted that its prevalence in former times was a matter of necessity, from the want of other tribunals, rather than the effect of a prepossession in favour of an ancient institution. But be that as it may, it is clear that the practical operation of these enactments has been extremely limited; and looking to the fact, that in the first years the references to punchayets were much more numerous than they have been since, it seems very probable that if the numbers of district moonsiffs were increased so as to make their courts more easily accessible to the people generally, village punchayets, as well as the village courts, would fall into disuse altogether; and as the division of labour would enable the district moonsiffs to dispose more promptly of the causes brought before them, an additional motive would be supplied for resorting to them in preference to arbitration, and it is likely that the references to district punchayets would be greatly reduced in number.

FOURTH HEAD.

4th. Similar information respecting the courts of sudder ameens, provided for by Regulation VIII. 1816, and any Regulations subsequently enacted, including Section iii. Regulation II. 1821.

50. The accompanying Statement† shows the number of sudder ameens attached to the different courts in the four divisions under this Presidency, as they stood on the 1st January 1827.

51. The accompanying Statement‡ shows the number of original suits and appeals disposed of by the sudder ameens, with the number depending before them at the beginning of each year from 1817 to 1827 inclusive; and the accompanying Statement§ shows the years in which the suits depending before them on the 1st January 1828, were referred to them.

52. It appears, that in the years 1825, 1826, and 1827, the sudder ameens disposed of 20,272 original suits and appeals; and another Statement|| which has been prepared shows, that during the same years the appeals from their decisions amounted in the aggregate to 2,085; that in the appeals actually disposed of in those years, amounting in the aggregate to 1,749, the original decisions were confirmed in 877, and reversed in 543; the remainder, amounting to 329, having been dismissed for default, or adjusted by razeenamah.

53. The result of this comparison appears extremely satisfactory. It is perhaps to be regretted, that the Statements do not enable the court to distinguish between the regular and the special appeals; but supposing the appeals preferred to have been all regular appeals from decisions in original suits, the comparison will still be satisfactory.

would show only one appeal in eight decisions; the original suits disposed of amounting to 17,510, and the appeals, as stated before, being 2,085, in one-half of which the original decisions were confirmed.

FIFTH and SIXTH HEADS.

5th. His Lordship in Council requests to be furnished with a general statement of civil suits determined by or adjusted before the European courts (viz. those of the zillah judges and registers, the provincial courts, and the court of sudder adawlut), in the year 1825, and the number of suits depending in each of these courts respectively on the 1st of January 1826.

6th. Also with a comparative statement showing the number of suits decided in each of the courts above mentioned in the year 1815, and the number depending on the 1st January 1816.

54. Accompanying are the Statements* called for under these two heads.

55. It will be observed, that in the year 1815, there were 22 zillah courts, to four of which assistant judges were attached. In that year the total number of causes disposed of by the European officers of those courts amounted to 7,928; viz. 1,355 appeals, and 6,573 original suits; and on the 1st January 1816, there were depending before them 2,088 appeals and 4,402 original suits, making a total of 6,490. In the year 1825 there were 13 zillah courts only, the European officers of which disposed of 3,065 causes, viz. 1,082 appeals, and 1,983 original suits; and on the 1st January 1826 there were depending before them 1,499 appeals and 1,161 original suits, making a total of 2,660.

56. It would appear that notwithstanding the vast quantity of litigation disposed of in the courts of the district moonsiffs, numerous causes cognizable by them find their way to the zillah courts. Of the 1,983 original suits disposed of by the zillah judges and registers in 1825, no less than 1,390 were for an amount or value not exceeding 500 rupees,† and of the 6,199 original suits disposed of by the sudder ameens in that year, no less than 6,033 were, in like manner, for an amount or value cognizable by the district moonsiffs. The zillah courts, in which the greatest number of causes of this description were thus disposed of, are those of Bellaree, Cuddapah, Masulipatam, Chicacole, Salem, Canara, and Malabar; but it appears that the arrears depending before the district moonsiffs of those zillahs on the 1st January 1825, were much heavier than those of the others, although their decisions are generally more numerous; and perhaps the loaded state of the district moonsiffs' files operated, in some degree at least, to induce the litigants in the cases above mentioned to resort to the zillah courts.

57. No observations suggest themselves upon the other Statement.

SEVENTH HEAD.

7th. The Governor-general in Council wishes to be informed how far the rules contained in Regulation IX. 1816, and in any subsequent regulation for transferring the office of zillah magistrate to the collector, have proved efficient, and free of objection or otherwise, especially of maintaining a good police, in facilitating the apprehension and expediting the trial of persons charged with criminal offences. Under this head, his Lordship in Council wishes to know to what extent the assistants to the collectors are employed in magisterial duties; and whether those duties in particular districts and at particular seasons, are not chiefly entrusted to the assistants.

58. The superintendence of the police and the office of zillah magistrate were transferred to the collector with the view of facilitating the administration both of civil and criminal justice. It was thought that the police in their hands would be more efficiently

ently administered, and that the zillah judges, being relieved from that charge and from the cognizance of petty offences, would be enabled to devote a larger portion of their time to the performance of their civil duties.

59. The subject of police, as administered by the collectors, will be more conveniently considered under the Ninth Head of Inquiry; and the judges will now confine themselves to the effects of the measure of transferring to them the office of zillah magistrate.

60. It seldom happens that the magistrates or their assistants interfere at all with the preliminary investigation in cases in which they have not the power to inflict punishment. In such cases the informations are, for the most part, taken by the native heads of district police, who either release the accused persons, or forward them direct to the criminal judge; and, in point of fact, the exercise of magisterial functions by the collectors and their assistants, is limited to the trial of petty offences punishable by themselves, without reference to higher authority, except in cases where the graver crimes may be committed by the same persons in different talooks of the same zillah, or in several distinct zillahs, over which the jurisdiction of a single native does not extend.

61. It appears proper to consider the operation of this part of the system, as it regards, 1st. the punishment of petty offences; and, 2dly, the taking of informations in cases wherein the power of punishment rests with the superior tribunals.

62. Open to objection as the measure of vesting collectors with the power of punishment undoubtedly is, on many accounts, the judges are still inclined to think that upon the whole it has operated beneficially in practice, notwithstanding the abuses to which it is confessedly liable, and the instances of abuse which have been brought forward to public notice. It has increased in each district the number of tribunals for the redress of petty wrongs; and though these tribunals are not equally distributed over the several zillahs, they are easily accessible to a large portion of the population, and have thus far served to afford greater facility to individuals complaining of petty offences committed on their persons or property. Under the former system, offences of this description were punishable only at the sudder station of the zillah; and the sufferers must often have been induced to submit in silence to petty injuries, rather than aggravate them by the expense and inconvenience of a long journey. It must not be disguised, however, that the higher courts have very imperfect means of judging of the manner in which the magistrates and their assistants exercise this power. It is true that under Section 21 Regulation IX. of 1816, calendars of the persons released and punished by them, accompanied with all the original proceedings in each case, are required to be laid before the judges on circuit, at the several sessions of gaol delivery; but this provision has been rendered almost, if not entirely, nugatory, by the enactment of Sections vii. and viii. Regulation IV. of 1821, whereby the magistrates are relieved from recording the evidence taken in the investigation of complaints preferred to them, under Sections xxvii. and xxxiii. Regulation IX. of 1816, and from including in their calendars returns of any punishment adjudged by them under Section xxxii, or of any adjudged under Section xxxiii, which may not exceed imprisonment for ten days, or six strokes with a rattan. All that a bare list of this sort enables a judge on circuit to do, is to see whether a magistrate has punished for offences not punishable by him, and whether any of the punishments inserted in the list are greater than a magistrate is authorised to inflict under the Regulations; but if, on the complaint of a party, it becomes a question whether punishment has been adjudged on insufficient evidence, or without any evidence at all, it is obvious that a satisfactory investigation of the complaint is thereby precluded, there being no record of the evidence on which the magistrate proceeded.

63. Complaints of the proceedings of the magistrates are not unfrequently made to the collective court of circuit; but the collective court has no power to interfere, and the parties are referred to the judge actually on circuit. Some instances have occurred of the personal observation of one of the judges, when formerly in the circuit, of the manner in which these rejected complaints have not been brought to the notice of the circuit; and perhaps the reason is, that in many of these cases, such as when a man has been unjustly sentenced to imprisonment, or required to find security, redress to be effectual must be immediate; and the act complained of having ceased to operate before the arrival of the circuit judge at the zillah station, the party thinks it useless to give himself any further trouble. The Court of Circuit and the Foujdarry Adawlut, in the exercise of their controlling authority over the criminal judges, have often occasion to interfere for the purpose of correcting mistakes; and it is no disparagement to the present magistrates to suppose that if their proceedings were subjected to the same supervision as those of the criminal judges, and the same facility of complaint were afforded to persons conceiving themselves aggrieved by their acts, occasions for the interposition of the controlling power would be equally frequent. Indeed the judges decidedly think, that the existence of such a controlling power in the superior courts is indispensable to the due administration of justice.

64. The punishments inflicted by district police officers are subject to revision and control only by the magistrates; and if a judgment may be formed from the manner in which they exercise other functions entrusted to them, there cannot be a rational doubt that the authority of fining, imprisoning, and flogging petty offenders is greatly abused. In point of fact, it is not going too far to say, that their proceedings as petty magistrates are subject to little effective revision or control, for by Section x. Regulation IV. of 1821 they are exempted from the necessity of recording the evidence in cases wherein they are competent to punish; and without such a record any inquiry into the propriety of their proceeding must be utterly useless. The futility of any attempt of this sort, and the little reliance that can be placed on any reports furnished by these officers, are strikingly illustrated by a case which occurred in the Southern Division in 1825. From the half-yearly statement transmitted by a magistrate in that division, it appeared, that although 217 persons had been convicted and flogged, or imprisoned, by the district police officers, not a single person had been acquitted by them. Concluding that the statement must have been erroneous in this particular, the provincial court called upon the magistrate for explanation, and his answer was, that having again attentively examined the police reports, he found the abstract statement to be correct. Another abstract statement, transmitted by the same magistrate at the same time, which seemed to have escaped the notice of the provincial court, exhibited 685 persons convicted and fined by the district police officers, while there was only one acquitted by them. There is no room to doubt that the abstract statements in question were correctly prepared from the reports furnished by the police officers; but no man can be found credulous enough to believe that of the 903 persons brought before the district police officers on charges cognizable by them, all but one were properly convicted and punished, and that during six months there was only one complaint preferred to them which was false, or unsupported by sufficient proof.

65. The court of Foujdarry Adawlut have, in numerous instances, had occasion to notice the gross falsification of dates made by police officers in order to conceal their violations of the Regulations in respect to the time during which they are allowed to detain an accused person in custody before forwarding him to the criminal judge; and it is impossible, in most instances, to place any reliance on the reports furnished by them, as prescribed by Section xxviii. Regulation XI. of 1816. There is, in fact, scarcely a trial that comes under the consideration of the Foujdarry Adawlut, which does not exhibit gross irregularities on the part of the police officers, and gross violations of the rules laid down for their guidance; and as these irregularities are persisted in, notwithstanding the repeated animadversions of the superior courts, it is surely not too much to infer, that their malpractices are not confined to cases wherein their conduct is comparatively much less subject to scrutiny.

66. It has been observed, that the duty of taking informations in cases wherein the power of punishment rests with the superior tribunals, is for the most part performed by the district police officers; and the efficiency or otherwise of this branch of the magisterial functions is next to be considered.

146 APPENDIX TO REPORT FROM SELECT COMMITTEE.

67. By the accompanying statements * which have been prepared, showing the number of persons brought before the several courts of circuit on charges of murder, robbery and murder, robbery, housebreaking and theft, in the years 1813, 1814, and 1815, and in the years 1825, 1826, and 1827 respectively, it appears that the acquittals by the courts of circuit during the first period amounted only to 1,353, while the convictions amounted to 2,698. In the second period, however, the acquittals amounted to 2,522, while the convictions were only 1,004. In the court of Foujdarry Adawlut the convictions and acquittals bore nearly the same proportion to each other in the two periods; the acquittals in the first period amounting to 355, while the convictions were 409; and in the second period the acquittals being 566, while the convictions were 726.

68. The extraordinary difference between the result of the trials before the courts of circuit in the two periods above mentioned, appears to be chiefly attributable to the lax and irregular manner in which the preliminary investigations are but too often conducted by the native district police officers, upon whom, in practice, this important duty for the most part devolves under the present system.

69. It is very probable that the proceedings of the former native police officers were as defective and irregular as those of the present; but it must be borne in mind that in the due preparation of a case for trial much less depended upon them, and that the errors and defects of their proceedings, whatever they might be, admitted of easy and immediate correction by the committing magistrate, who himself went into the first regular investigation of the offence charged, and could, of his own authority, procure the immediate attendance of all the witnesses whose evidence he might think desirable. Under the present system the course of proceeding is different. The district police officer is required to enter into a full investigation of the case in the first instance, and to take the examinations, but not on oath, of all who may be able to give material evidence. In theory this appears calculated to save a great deal of time, and to facilitate and expedite the commitment of offenders for trial, but in practice it has been found that these desirable objects have not been fully attained.

70. In the majority of trials that are referred to the Foujdarry Adawlut, an alleged confession before the district police officers appears; and, of course, it is the same in the majority of cases disposed of by the courts of circuit. That these alleged confessions are often obtained by undue means, and that many are mere fabrications, there is not the smallest room to doubt. But the evil does not stop here. Where there is a confession, or pretended confession, almost always the examinations before the police officer contain very little direct or circumstantial evidence. The instances in which police officers neglect to examine the most material witnesses are very numerous; and whether this happens through ignorance or design on their part, the consequences are the same. On these occasions the committing officer is obliged to call for further evidence before he can dispose of the case, and his requisition for this evidence must usually be made, not immediately to the police officer who held the preliminary inquiry, but to the magistrate, who is perhaps at the end of the district; for though, under Regulation I. of 1824, he can issue direct a summons for any witness in a case sent in by the police, he has not a sufficient establishment to issue summons to all required to attend from remote parts of an extensive zillah; and it is the local police only (with whom he is prohibited from communicating, except through the channel of the magistrate) that can in general point out the person on whom the citation should be served. A great deal of time is thus unnecessarily lost. Besides this, when a case has been imperfectly investigated in the first instance, when there has been neglect in taking evidence to material facts, it rarely happens that the deficiencies can be supplied by subsequent proceedings. The attempts of the committing officer to procure the additional evidence required are often altogether unavailing, or are only partially successful; and the consequences that numerous commitments take place on evidence barely sufficient to warrant them, and trials often terminate in the acquittal of persons who, but for the irregularities and defectiveness of the primary investigations by the police officers, would probably have been convicted.

* See Statements (T) and (U).

71. That the actual convictions should bear so small a proportion to the commitments, is an evil upon the consequences of which it is quite unnecessary to expatiate. The judges apprehend that it is mainly attributable to the causes which have been stated, and that this important branch of the administration of criminal justice requires to be placed on a better footing, by the adoption of measures to ensure more efficient preliminary inquiry by the district police. It is probable that the defect here pointed out would in some degree be diminished if the preliminary investigation of heinous offences were more frequently conducted by the magistrates and their assistants; but there are very few who could give more time than they now do to the discharge of their magisterial functions, without serious interruption to their revenue duties; and, after all, their direct interference could never extend beyond the talook in which they might happen to be, without considerable inconvenience to prosecutors and witnesses.

72. It seems very questionable whether, in point of fact, the transfer of the police and of the office of zillah magistrate has enabled the zillah judges generally to devote a larger portion of their time to the discharge of their civil duties. The reduction in the number of courts which immediately followed, tended to defeat this object in the consolidated zillahs; and in the others, where the extent of local jurisdiction remained the same, it is very probable that the difficulties and embarrassments produced by the loose and irregular proceedings of the police officers, have in general compelled the zillah judges to give as much of their time and attention to the performance of criminal business as they did before. At all events it is certain, that there has been a remarkable decrease in the average number of civil suits disposed of annually by the respective zillah judges; a fact which is not sufficiently accounted for by the general reduction of their files, because, with two or three exceptions, the files are not reduced so low as to produce this effect. It is also certain, that a press of criminal business is almost always assigned as one of the causes which have prevented a greater number of decisions; and as far as the information of this court extends, they have no reason to doubt that the zillah judges are fully as assiduous in the discharge of their duty as they were formerly.

73. Another point of great importance connected with this subject, is the time that elapses between the apprehension of supposed offenders, and the disposal of them. The long detention of prisoners by the police officers was particularly noticed in the report of the Sudder Adawlut, dated 21st September 1818; and the evil, if it has not increased, has certainly not diminished within the last ten years. There are few of the quarterly reports transmitted to the court of Foujdarry Adawlut that do not exhibit numerous cases in which prisoners are detained by the police officers for weeks, and in some instances for months, before they are sent to the criminal judge; and it very seldom happens that the reasons assigned for the delay are by any means satisfactory. They are often frivolous in the highest degree, or such as have been repeatedly denounced as insufficient and inadmissible, and the exertions of the courts of circuit and the Foujdarry Adawlut to correct these irregularities, have been attended with little if any success. The cause is, no doubt, mainly attributable to the want of power in the superior courts to punish the police officers for these irregularities. All that the superior courts can do, is to bring them to the notice of the magistrates, who, in the exercise of the discretion which must necessarily be left to them, can hardly be expected to visit with much severity the negligence of a police officer, whose services in the revenue department are of the highest value.

148 APPENDIX TO REPORT FROM SELECT COMMITTEE.

before the criminal judges on the 1st January 1825, 1826, and 1827 respectively. Owing to the scarcity in 1824, the number of persons brought before the criminal judges in that year was unusually large, amounting altogether to 16,886; in 1825 the number was reduced to 9,718; and in 1826, to 6,228; and this appears to account sufficiently for the decrease in the number under examination in the years 1826 and 1827.

75. For the purpose of ascertaining to what extent the assistants to the collectors are employed in magisterial duties in the several districts, the magistrates were respectively called upon for statements, from which the accompanying general Statement * has been prepared. The returns were obviously incorrect in several particulars, or at least cannot be reconciled with other statements furnished through the provincial courts; but it is sufficiently correct to answer the purpose for which it was principally required.

76. It appears that in 1825 the whole of the magisterial duties in the Cuddapah and Tanjore districts were performed by the assistants; and that in the Bellaree, Chittoor, Masulipatam, Rajahmundry, and Canara districts, by far the largest portion was assigned to them. By Regulation IX. of 1818, magistrates are empowered to delegate to their assistants the whole or any part of their duty; and if the power is exercised with discretion and caution, no harm seems likely to result from it. It appears, however, that in the districts above specified, the measure has been too largely resorted to.

EIGHTH HEAD.

8th. How far the provisions made by Regulation X. 1816, and by any subsequent Regulation, for constituting the judges of the zillah civil courts to be also criminal judges in their respective zillahs, have answered the purpose intended by them, and have been found by experience to promote the general administration of criminal justice.

77. When the zillah judges were first constituted criminal judges of their respective zillahs, no enlarged powers were given to them. They were simply relieved from the superintendence of the police and the cognizance of the petty offences, which under the provisions of Regulation VI. of 1802, was originally vested in the magistrates; and their functions were limited to the duty of committing for trial before the courts of circuit, and the exercise of the additional powers of punishment which had previously been granted to them by Section xiv. Regulation IV. of 1811. Their powers have since been enlarged by the enactment of Regulation VI. of 1822, and I. of 1825, by which they are authorized to take final cognizance of all unaggravated cases of housebreaking, where the property stolen does not exceed 100 rupees, and of all cases of simple theft not exceeding 300 rupees, together with some other minor offences which were before cognizable only by the courts of circuit.

78. How far the objects originally contemplated in constituting the zillah judges to be criminal judges of their respective zillahs have, in the opinion of the judges, been accomplished, will be seen from the observations which have been made under the Seventh and Ninth Heads of inquiry; but there can be no doubt that the subsequent enlargement of their powers has been attended with all the advantages expected from it, and that it has operated very materially to promote the general administration of criminal justice.

NINTH HEAD.

9th. How far the rules contained in Regulation II. 1816, or in any subsequent Regulation, for the establishment of a general system of police throughout the territories subject to the Government of Port St. George, have been found efficient and successful in accomplishing the objects intended by them.

* See Statement (W).

79. Upon the expediency of relieving the zillah judges from the superintendence of the police, there cannot be any question. Their duty requires them to remain at the sadder station of the zillah; and of course they cannot exercise that active vigilance over the subordinate officers of the department which is indispensably necessary to ensure a correct and efficient discharge of their functions. But whether the transfer of the police to the collectors has been attended with all the benefits expected from it, is extremely doubtful. In most of the districts under this Presidency, the business of settling and collecting the revenue, under the detailed system of management which generally prevails, is amply sufficient to occupy the whole time and attention of the collectors; and in consequence, with most of them, the business of police is, as in the nature of things it must be, a matter of secondary consideration. It is not intended to impute the slightest degree of blame to these officers; on the contrary, in general they bring to the discharge of their police functions all the zeal and activity which, under the circumstances in which they are placed, can reasonably be expected from them.

80. The discussion of this subject, however, is attended with considerable difficulties. The judges of circuit in their Reports seldom touch upon it at all, or confine themselves to a few insulated facts, from which it is impossible to form any conclusion on the general effect of the system. The court of Foujdarry Adawlut have long been satisfied that hardly any reliance is to be placed on the periodical returns made by the magistrates under the provisions of Section xix. Regulation II. of 1811. These Returns are prepared from the loose and inaccurate, and perhaps, in some instances, fictitious reports of the police officers; and though new forms have been prepared, no reports or statements yet exist which enable them to ascertain, with any degree of correctness, whether crime is on the increase or decrease generally, or in particular districts. The Statements, showing the number of persons brought before the magistrates and the superior tribunals on criminal charges within a given period, are all that can be rationally depended on; but these statements convey little of the information requisite to a correct judgment upon the efficiency, or otherwise, of the police, inasmuch as they do not show, and there are as yet no means of ascertaining, how many crimes were actually committed of which none of the perpetrators are known or have been apprehended, or what proportion the number of persons apprehended bears to the number of the known or supposed perpetrators.

81. From the materials in their possession, therefore, it is impossible for the judges to institute any satisfactory comparison between the former and the present system of police, or to furnish certain data upon which an opinion may be formed in respect to the positive efficiency, or otherwise, of the present system. It may be useful, however, to compare the effects of the two systems, so far as they are manifested by the number and nature of the criminal charges actually brought to trial before the courts of circuit; and it was for this purpose that the Statements referred to under the Seventh Head of inquiry* were originally prepared.

82. On reference to these Statements, it will be seen that in the years 1813, 1814, and 1815, there were 280 cases of murder brought before the several courts of circuit; and 285 cases in the years 1825, 1826, and 1827. For the first period, the total number of persons convicted of this crime, which includes homicide of all descriptions, was 157, and for the second 163. Under the head of robbery and murder there were 153 cases, and 180 persons convicted for the first, and only 81 cases and 58 persons convicted for the second period. During the first period, however, the calendars under this head were swelled, more particularly in the Southern division, by the commitment of numerous persons for phurash, a crime which this atrocious crime has hardly been heard of in the provinces subject to this Presidency, although there is some reason to fear that it is not altogether altogether suppressed, because, in the year 1827, a respectable Mussulman, on his journey from Calcutta to Madras, was totally lost sight of about twenty miles on this side of Chincacole, under circumstances which left little doubt that he and his attendants fell victims to this crime. Under the head of robbery there were, in the first instance, 539 cases, and 1,074 persons convicted; and in the second 770 cases, and 1,092 persons convicted. But the scarcity that prevailed in 1824 and 1825 served to swell the calendars under this head in the first and second years of the last period to an unusual degree. For the first period there were 507 cases and 759 persons convicted of housebreaking; and for the second 351 cases, and 294 persons convicted. For the first period there were 886 cases, and 937 persons convicted of theft; and for the second period 183 cases, and 128 persons convicted. The apparent decrease under the last two heads is referrible, in some degree, to the enlarged powers granted to the criminal judges by Regulations V. of 1822 and I. of 1825, which, of course, have operated to diminish the number of cases exhibited on the calendars of the circuit courts under these heads.

150 APPENDIX TO REPORT FROM SELECT COMMITTEE.

83. It will be observed, that during the first period, as far as is shown by the calendars, there was little variation in the number of offences under each separate head; but during the second period the heinous offence of robbery attended with murder, gradually declined from 39 cases in 1825, to 17 in 1827. Housebreaking, also, and theft above 800 rupees, or attended with aggravating circumstances, were reduced in nearly the same proportion, there being 159 cases of housebreaking in 1825, and only 71 in 1827; and 75 cases of theft in 1825, and only 39 in 1827.

84. It has been already stated, that little reliance can be placed upon the periodical returns of crimes ascertained to have been committed; but accompanying is an Abstract of those Returns from 1825 to 1827 inclusive, arranged under the five heads above-mentioned, and showing the number of cases reported, and the number of persons apprehended.* It is to be regretted, that the Returns from 1813 to 1815 inclusive are imperfect; and a similar Abstract for those three years could not be prepared.

85. From this Abstract it appears, that in 1825 there were 221 cases of murder reported, and that 451 persons were apprehended for this crime. In 1826 the number of cases was reduced to 184, and the number of persons apprehended to 436. In 1827 a further reduction took place, the cases reported being 177, and the persons apprehended being 384.

86. In 1825 the number of robberies, attended with murder, was reported to be 36, and 122 persons were apprehended. In 1826 the number reported was 25, and the persons apprehended were 71. In 1827 the number reported amounted to 56, while the persons apprehended were 89.

87. The number of robberies reported in 1825 was 812, and the persons apprehended were 1,410. In 1826 the number reported was reduced to 613, and 871 persons were apprehended. In 1827 the cases reported were 644, and the persons apprehended were 863.

88. In 1825 there were 1,662 cases of housebreaking reported, and 1,260 persons were apprehended. In 1826 the number reported was 1,628, and the persons apprehended were 794. In 1827 the number reported amounted to 1,767, while the number of persons apprehended was reduced to 756.

89. In 1825 the number of thefts above 50 rupees, or attended with aggravating circumstances, was 1,901, and the persons apprehended were 2,963. In 1826 the number reported was 1,572, and the persons apprehended were 1,514. In 1827 the number reported was 1,568, and the persons apprehended were 1,457.

90. In the three years above mentioned, the number of cases reported under the heads of murder, robbery and murder, robbery and housebreaking, alone amounted to 7,835, on account of which 7,507 persons only were apprehended; while in 1813, 1814, and 1815, the total number of robberies and other heinous crimes amounted only to 7,506, while the total number of persons apprehended amounted to 9,822.

* See Statement (X).

91. Accompanying is another Statement, showing the total number of offences of all descriptions reported to have been committed in 1825, 1826, and 1827, the number of persons apprehended, and the number acquitted or convicted by the police officers, the magistrates, the criminal judges, the courts of circuit, and the Foujdarry Adawlut.

92. It will be seen that the number of offences reported in 1825, was 16,928; in 1826 it was reduced to 13,881; and in 1827 it was further reduced to 13,301. The number of persons apprehended also was reduced in the same manner, viz. from 29,869 in 1825, to 23,104 in 1826, and to 21,472 in 1827.

93. The total number of persons apprehended in these three years amounted to 74,445.* Of that number, 16,206 were released on examination, or acquitted on trial by the police officers, and 9,890 by the magistrates, making a total of 26,096, or more than one-third of the number apprehended. By the police officers 20,506 were convicted, and by the magistrates, 5,815, making a total of 26,321; while the number sent to the criminal judges by the police officers and the magistrates, amounted to 21,820.

94. During the same three years, there were 12,637 persons released on examination, or acquitted on trial by the criminal judges; 4,814 were convicted, and 4,825 were committed for trial before the courts of circuit. It appears, therefore, that considerably more than one-half of the persons brought before the criminal judges within this period were released. The commitments during this period fall considerably short of the commitments made in 1813, 1814, and 1815, which amounted to 7,272. It must be observed, however, that the decrease is attributable, in some measure at least, to the enlarged powers of punishment granted to the criminal judges by Regulations VI. of 1822, and I. of 1825.

95. During the same three years, the acquittals before the courts of circuit amounted to 3,059, and the convictions to 1,201; while the acquittals by the court of Foujdarry Adawlut were 975, and the convictions 922.

96. That more petty offences are reported, and that more petty offenders are subject to punishment under the present system than under the former, is quite plain; but it does not appear that either an increase of crime, or a greater efficiency of the present system, considered strictly as a system of police, can safely be inferred from this fact. Complaints of petty offences are more numerous, because, under the present system of magistracy, the punishment of the offenders is attended with infinitely less difficulty and inconvenience to the parties injured. It is probable, also, that this cause operates to increase the complaints of housebreaking and theft, which to a certain extent are now made finally cognizable by the criminal judges instead of the courts of circuit. So that the result above-mentioned seems attributable rather to the increased facility of punishment, than to an increase of crime, or to superior vigilance in the police.

97. But if it should be considered that the reports of offences ascertained to have been committed are entitled to more confidence than the judges are inclined to give them, it is clear that the statements afford evidence not only of an increase of crime, but of relaxed state of vigilance and efficiency in the police. Almost all robberies, with or without murder, are committed in pairs; and it seldom happens that less than two or three are concerned in a case of housebreaking. The total number of cases reported under under these three heads in 1825, 1826, and 1827,* amounted to 7,253, while the total number of persons apprehended was only 6,236. Under the head of housebreaking alone, there were 5,067 cases reported, and the number of persons apprehended was only 2,810. Supposing all the convictions which took place before the criminal judges in the three years above mentioned were for housebreaking and theft, and adding to them the number of persons convicted of those two offences in the same years by the courts of circuit and the Foujdarry Adawlut, the total is only 5,236;† while, according to the reports, there were no less than 10,108 offences of this description committed during the same period.

98. It has been asserted, that under the former system numerous crimes were committed which were never disclosed, and the judges have no doubt that this is true to a certain extent: but it is obviously to little purpose that crimes are now less concealed than formerly, if fewer of the perpetrators are apprehended, and still fewer brought to conviction and punishment. And that this is the case at present in respect to the higher classes of crimes, is clearly established by the foregoing Statements, so far as reliance can be placed upon them.

99. It very seldom happens that the same crime appears for a second time on the calendars, although comparatively few of the perpetrators are brought up for trial in the first instance. In the trials referred to the Foujdarry Adawlut, indeed, it is no uncommon thing to find accomplices implicated by name, who have not been apprehended; and though their persons are well known, they are rarely apprehended and brought upon the subsequent calendars. It is probable that for a time at least they take refuge in other districts, but they could hardly escape detection under a vigilant and combined system of police; and it is but too evident that after the first attempt to secure offenders, the exertions of the police officers are relaxed or altogether discontinued; and that if a criminal is fortunate enough to escape detection in the first instance, he is in little danger afterwards. It seems difficult to account otherwise for the extreme paucity of cases in which offenders are committed for crimes, of which some of the perpetrators have been tried before.

100. Upon the whole, the conclusion must be, that the police possesses but a small portion of the efficiency which its transfer to the collectors was intended to secure. It has already been intimated that, with most of the collectors, in consequence of their other avocations, the business of the police is a matter of secondary consideration; and the same remark is applicable to the tehseeldars, and perhaps, in some districts, to the village officers also. But were it otherwise, the judges are by no means satisfied that the system would generally be much more efficient than it is now. It seems to them that it requires a further superintending power to combine, regulate, and control its exertions; and unless some expedient can be devised for stimulating the subordinate native officers of the establishment to energy, and for subjecting acts of misconduct, on their part, to certain and adequate punishment, without hazarding the efficiency of the revenue department, little improvement in the general character of the police can be expected.

TENTH HEAD.

10th. mined by punchayets, have been found useful and unobjectionable, or otherwise. It is desirable that the information on this head should be accompanied by a statement showing the number of claims of this description determined or adjusted in 1825, and the number depending before punchayets in each district on the 1st of January 1826.

101. The accompanying Statement* exhibits the number of causes brought before the collectors under Section iv. Regulation XII. of 1816, and Section xviii. Regulation V. of 1822, and referred by them to punchayets from 1816 to 1826 inclusive. It also exhibits the number depending at the beginning of each year from 1825 to 1828 inclusive, with the number disposed of in 1825, 1826, and 1827.

102. The Statement is prepared from the returns transmitted by the collectors, to whom a special reference was found necessary, in consequence of the apparent omission of the village and district moonsiffs to include, or at least to distinguish in their reports, the decisions of punchayets in suits of this description.

103. By Section xviii. Regulation V. of 1822, the provisions of Section iv. Regulation XII. of 1816, which were limited to disputes between proprietors or renters and their ryots, were extended to disputes between ryot and ryot; and it seemed desirable to ascertain to what extent suits of the latter description had been referred to punchayets. For this purpose a second reference was made to the collectors; and the accompanying Statement is prepared from their amended returns, which, however, differ very materially in the totals from those first transmitted. It is probable that the first returns included all claims preferred to the collectors, whether referred to punchayets or not.

104. It appears that in the Cuddapah, Gunttoor, Tanjore, and Canara districts, no references of suits of this description have ever been made to punchayets. It is stated, that in the Bellary district references have been made, but no registry of them has been kept; and it will be seen that it is in the Coimbatore and Malabar districts only that this mode of decision has been much resorted to. In Coimbatore, however, as well as in some other districts, no disputes between ryot and ryot have been thus disposed of.

105. It is obviously of the highest importance that disputes of this description should be speedily adjusted; but on an examination of the Statement, it will be seen that of the 154 causes between proprietors or renters and their ryots depending on the 1st January 1825, no less than 57 were still pending at the beginning of 1828; the total number of decisions under that head in the three years being only 97.

Ordered, That Extracts from these proceedings be forwarded for the consideration of the Right Honourable the Governor in Council.

212 APPENDIX TO REPORT FROM SELECT COMMITTEE.

EXTRACT from the MINUTES of CONSULTATION, under date 9th February 1829.

READ Letter from the Register to the Court of Sudder Adawlut, dated 23d April 1829.

The proceedings which accompanied the foregoing letter have been prepared in consequence of an application from the Supreme Government, under date the 11th May 1828, for information as to the practical operation of the changes made of late years in the system for the administration of justice and police under this presidency.

A copy of the letter from the Supreme Government of the date above mentioned was forwarded to the Court of Sudder Adawlut, on the 6th of the following month (June 1826), and the attention of the court was drawn to that communication on the 13th May 1828. In their register's letter of the 18th August 1828, the court explained the causes of the delay in furnishing the report required by the Supreme Government, and in the third and fourth paragraphs of the Proceedings now under consideration, these causes are again noticed. The subject is one of considerable importance, involving the examination of a great mass of statements and reports, and requiring a deliberate consideration of their contents. The Right Honourable the Governor in Council, therefore, considers the delay in submitting the proceedings under review to be satisfactorily accounted for.

The Sudder Adawlut, in the paragraphs noted in the margin,* give an abstract of the reports of the local officers on the subject of the village moonsiffs, and then state their own conclusions. It appears to the Right Honourable the Governor in Council that those conclusions are somewhat more unfavourable to the institution than is warranted by the grounds on which they rest. The judges state that "on the whole it seems pretty clear that the objects contemplated in the establishment of the village tribunals have been but imperfectly accomplished." Now it is to be remembered that the objects for which village moonsiffs and those for which district moonsiffs were appointed were the same. It certainly never was expected that those objects would be accomplished by the village moonsiffs alone, otherwise than very imperfectly. If this institution, without producing any evils, or without producing evils of such magnitude as to counterbalance the benefit, has contributed in any degree to the accomplishment of those objects, it must be regarded as so far attended with success. It is certainly to be regretted that the village moonsiffs are in general so un instructed as they appear to be. It seems also to be established that a preference is generally given by suitors to the district moonsiffs. This appears to the Government to be just what was to be wished; but the number of suits tried by the village moonsiffs clearly shows that the preference, though general, is by no means universal; and the importance of the work actually done by the village moonsiffs is perhaps underrated by the Sudder Adawlut. The decision of four thousand suits every year seems not so very trifling a matter as they regard it; nor does a comparison even with the vast annual number of decisions by the district moonsiffs, exceeding fifty thousand, sink it in the estimation of Government, as it does in the minds of the judges, into utter insignificance. The Right Honourable the Governor in Council still thinks it no small advantage to have four thousand suits annually decided in a mode which, as regards those suits, is preferred by the suitors to any which they could have recourse to if there were no village moonsiffs. That the number of village moonsiffs who never exercise their functions is much greater than that of those who do, ought not, in the opinion of Government, to be regretted in instances where they are unfit for the office, or to be considered as detracting from the utility which there is ground to ascribe to the institution in cases where parties properly qualified willingly undertake the office. There seems reason to believe that the persons best qualified to perform the duty are those who alone are generally resorted to as village judges; and this is precisely what was to be desired.

It should be remembered, that though a general preference is shown to the district moonsiffs siffs, the extent of this preference is by no means in proportion to the whole number of causes brought before those officers and the village moonsiffs respectively; for the greater part of those causes were, from the value of the matter in dispute, beyond the jurisdiction of the latter class of judicatories. It appears that in the years 1825, 1826, and 1827, the number of suits decided by the village moonsiffs was 14,457; and the number of suits cognizable by the village moonsiffs, which were decided by district moonsiffs, was 41,768. The former number is nearly one-third of the latter; and even in the three divisions in which fewest causes were decided by the village moonsiffs, the number of their decisions was to that of the decisions of the district moonsiffs, in cases cognizable by both tribunals, nearly as one to four. These proportions appear to the Government to be very considerable.

Government,

But the number of reported decisions by the village moonsiffs is not the only circumstance to be looked to in estimating the utility of the institution. If, as there seems reason to believe, the possession of the judicial authority vested in them by Government has raised the respectability of their situation as heads of villages in the eyes of the people, and has introduced the practice of their adjusting disputes between the villagers, and composing their differences before they have arisen into regular law-suits, the good which it does in this way may be much greater than that which attends the decision of the suits entered in the returns.

On the whole, although there is not perhaps reason to think very highly of the village moonsiffs, in their present condition, as instruments for administering justice, and although they may never become a very good body of judges, the Right Honourable the Governor in Council cannot but regard the information furnished by the Sudder Adawlut as warranting conclusions much more favourable to the institution than those which they have drawn from it, and the statements of the local officers, as showing that the village tribunals are of advantage to the country. The absence of complaints against their integrity is indeed very remarkable and highly creditable to them, and every single suit thus honestly settled is a great gain to the little community where it takes place.

The extraordinary delay in the disposal of certain causes before the village moonsiffs, which is noticed in the forty-first paragraph of the proceedings under consideration, appears to require explanation, and the Sudder Adawlut will be pleased to call for it, and submit it for the information of Government.

Every object contemplated in the appointment of district moonsiffs is justly considered by the Sudder Adawlut to have been fully attained; and with reference to the remark of the judges in the forty-seventh paragraph of their proceedings, that it is impossible to estimate the extent of the relief which they have afforded to the zillah courts, as it is probable that many of the causes which have appeared on their files would never have been referred for judicial determination at all, had the district tribunals not existed, the Right Honourable the Governor-general in Council would observe, that although no relief may on these cases have been afforded to the zillah courts, the benefit done to the country is not less manifest in the administration of justice where formerly it was not administered at all.

With regard to punchayets, the Right Honourable the Governor in Council is disposed to concur in the opinion of the judges, that this mode of settling differences is held in little estimation with the great mass of the people; but as arbitration has every where the advantages which in the forty-ninth paragraph of the court's proceedings are ascribed to it in these territories, it does not appear why parties should not resort to it rather than go to law in this more than in any other country.

In the fifty-eighth and following paragraphs, the Sudder Adawlut have submitted observations on various points connected with the management of the police, and the administration of criminal justice under the present system, and upon the whole have come to the conclusion "that the police possesses but a small portion of the efficiency which its transfer to the collectors was intended to secure;" but they admit that "under the present system of magistracy the punishment of offenders is attended with infinitely less difficulty and inconvenience to the parties injured" than formerly, and that the enlargement of the powers of the the criminal judges has been attended with all the advantages expected from it, and has operated very materially to promote the general administration of criminal justice.*

The Right Honourable the Governor in Council is anxious that the judges of the Sudder and Foujdaree Adawlut should have this important subject fully under their consideration, and where the present system admits of and urgently requires amendment, that they may at an early period submit their sentiments as to the specific remedies which should be applied to the existing evils, and it will then be for the Government, after mature deliberation, to recommend to the Honourable the Court of Directors, the adoption of such of them as in their opinion may be best calculated to ensure the effectual superintendence and control of the police, and to improve the administration of criminal justice.

Abolition of Zillah Courts.

Para. 1. OUR last letter to you in this department was dated the 4th instant.

2. In our Revenue Despatch of the 18th August 1824, we intimated our intention of communicating to you our sentiments on the abolition of Zillah Courts under your presidency, a subject which we deemed of the highest importance; we stated that we felt the necessity of great caution in reducing the number of tribunals, and that we thought it necessary, at our earliest notice of the measures referred to, to apprise you that we should require the fullest assurance, that in those instances in which you had incorporated two original jurisdictions into one, the natives were not prevented by the great extension of the jurisdiction of the new courts from procuring justice in those courts.

3. In pursuance of the intention so expressed, we now proceed to reply to the paragraphs noticed in the margin.†

4. We remark, that at various times, from the 9th February 1821 to the 7th March 1823, the zillah courts at the several stations of Ganjam, Vizagapatam, Rajahmundry, Verda-chellum, Coimbatore, Trichinopoly, Tinnevely, and North Malabar, were abolished; that the zillah court of Guntoor, which was abolished in May 1818, has not been restored as was proposed; that in lieu of the courts of Ganjam and Vizagapatam, one new court was established at Chicacole, and that the jurisdictions of the others were added to those of Nellore, Masulipatam, Chingleput, Salem, Combaconum, Madura, and South Malabar respectively.

5. The superficial extent of these districts is not accurately known to us, but their population, according to your latest Returns, are as follows:

6. From the Governor's Minute, recorded on the Consultations of the 9th February 1821, it appears that certain improvements in the Revenue department having been resolved on, it was deemed expedient to provide for them by abolishing some of the zillah courts which had least business, and paying the newly appointed officers out of the savings resulting from the measure. In the same Minute the following passage occurs: "I should have regarded as an idle waste of public money the keeping up of a court, when the reduction of its business enabled us to do it away, without the smallest inconvenience to the country." And in a Minute recorded on the Consultations of the 16th March 1821, speaking of the institution of district moonsiffs, Sir Thomas Munro says, "The extension of its jurisdiction will, by relieving the zillah judge from a great portion of his present business, enable us to enlarge the zillahs, and to lessen the judicial expenditure." In another passage in the Minute first quoted, the objections which it was supposed might be advanced were thus answered: "It may be objected to the proposed measure, that the enlargement of the zillahs will throw too much business upon the zillah judge, and will cause considerable inconvenience to parties and witnesses by increasing the distance of the court from their homes; but in answer to this, it may be said that the distance will not be more than it is at present in several of the more extensive zillahs; that the business will not be more than it now is in the more populous zillahs; that the civil business is every day diminishing, and will still be greatly diminished, by extending the jurisdiction of the district moonsiffs, by which more time will be left for attending to the dispatch of criminal business, and that the proceedings of the circuit judges will be much facilitated by having fewer stations to visit."

7. Before measures of such extreme importance were decided on, we think that the local and superior judicial officers should have been required to report their opinion of the probable results which would be produced by uniting adjacent zillahs. No such inquiry however was made: it was stated that the business was much diminished, and that it would be diminished diminished still more; and on the general views contained in the Governor's Minute, courts, the jurisdiction of which was before confined to a tract of country containing a population of between five and six millions, have been charged with a population of between nine and ten millions, spread over a surface more extensive by many thousand square miles than that which formerly belonged to them.

8. We cannot recognize the propriety of considering the question of retaining or abolishing any of the zillah courts, in connexion with the proposed alterations in the Revenue department. The salaries and official rank of the judges and judicial officers may reasonably be fixed with some reference to other departments, but the existence of a court in any particular district ought to depend solely upon its necessity or expedience for the due administration of justice. The existence of zillah courts, as the principal part of the judiciary establishments at all the presidencies, is a proof that the utility of such courts is recognized by the highest authorities to which British India is subject; and with reference to the presidency of Madras especially, we observe that a certain number of courts of this description was declared by the late judicial commission, in their Report of 15th October 1815, to be not only salutary and useful, but even indispensably necessary.

9. At different times petitions have been presented by great numbers of the natives (from Nellore, Guntoor, Rajahmundry, Masulipatam, and Tellicherry, and other places in Malabar), deprecating the removal of the zillah courts, and the notion of their utility is confirmed by the reports of the local officers and of the superior courts. The following extract from the proceedings of the provincial court in the Western Division, dated 30th May 1823, contains an account of the petitions which were presented on the occasion of the zillah court of North Malabar being abolished:

“ Read a petition presented by certain of the principal merchants and other residents of Tellicherry, and many of the inhabitants of the Kartinaad, Cherikal, Kavay, and Koteyam Talooks, wherein, after adverting to the former petition of the merchants of Tellicherry, which set forth the grievous consequences that would ensue from the two zillahs of Malabar being consolidated, and the station of the zillah court fixed at Calicut, they proceed at considerable length to notice the extreme hardships, inconvenience, and loss to which the whole community of the Northern Division must be exposed by the absence of those tribunals of civil and criminal justice, which have hitherto always existed at Tellicherry, and the inadequacy of the moonsiffs' courts for the wants of the country.” A corresponding petition was afterwards presented to the Government, in which the petitioners say that their former application was signed by all the principal persons of each caste residing at Tellicherry and the other places mentioned. To the petition from Masulipatam were attached upwards of 1,700 signatures, each having a description of the person signing, under various designations of merchants, bankers, tradesmen, zemindars, potails, curnums, gomastahs, including relations of nabobs, and the nabob of Masulipatam. The collector of the district, referring to this petition, says he was on the spot when the question regarding the removal of the court was agitated, and he knew the sensation that it excited.

10. The great extent of the zillahs was complained of in our despatch of the 29th of April 1814, as one of the evils attendant on the judicial system, and notwithstanding the relief which has been afforded to the zillah judges by the Regulations of 1816, and those of subsequent years, we regret to observe that abundant proof of the miserable consequences of zillahs being too extensive is to be found on your Consultations.

11. The following remarks of the Foujdarry Adawlut, on a report of one of the judges of circuit, relate to a district in which a zillah court was abolished several years ago. “ The third judge adverts to the hardships to which the inhabitants of the northern part of Canara are exposed from the distance of the seat of the zillah court, and in the concluding part of the paragraph, declares his firm conviction ‘ that many crimes are committed which do not come to light, from having been compounded between the parties or concealed altogether, through the dread of the inconvenience and loss consequent on a public prosecution.’ The court of Foujdarry Adawlut consider the observations recorded by the third judge in this this part of the report to be particularly deserving of the attention of Government. It is obvious to remark, that the remoteness of the zillah criminal court must operate as an impediment to the administration of criminal justice, tending, as remarked by the third judge, to the impunity, and of course the consequent increase of crimes, to the general vexation of the community, and to the serious injury of the accused in cases of acquittal. The report of prisoners received on the 13th ultimo from the acting criminal judge in the zillah of Canara, affords instances of delay and individual hardship in the prosecution of criminal cases arising from the situation of the zillah court. In eleven cases, comprizing thirty-four prisoners, it is stated that the court is awaiting the arrival of witnesses who, 'owing to the district where they reside being distant 200 miles, have not yet reached the zillah station;' and, in another case similarly postponed, the distance of the residence of the witnesses is stated to be 260 miles."

12. With reference to this same district, and to the province of Malabar, many remarks corresponding with the above are contained in Mr. Graemes' Report on Malabar; from these we extract the following: "Both in Canara and in Malabar robberies and thefts are carried on to a very great extent, but the distance of the magistrates' and criminal judges' courts are much too often an insurmountable obstacle to redress. The hardship to which parties must be subjected before they can prosecute robberies and thefts to conviction, deter them from complaint. If the crime is of an aggravated nature, which requires to be brought before the criminal court, there are many who must travel from three to six hundred miles, and lose a month on the journey, and another in the inquiry, before they can run the gauntlet of the magistrates, the criminal judges and the circuit courts, not to mention that the occasional postponement of trials at the circuit court, from the non-attendance of any material witness, from neglect or sickness, may oblige the parties to attend a second time at that court, who may be residing at a distance of a hundred and fifty miles. Attendance on the courts in civil causes is also productive of serious inconveniences, and it is difficult to calculate their effects upon the profit of agriculture, commerce, and the other various pursuits of life. They are considered as vexatious in the extreme."

13. When this Report was written, there were two zillah courts in Malabar, now there is but one.

14. The following extracts from a late Report of a judge of circuit in the Northern Division, refer especially to two of the recently consolidated zillahs, which were formerly divided into four.

"The annexed Statement will show the number of cases submitted to the court of circuit in the zillahs of Nellore and Chicacole. The first contains thirty-one, and the other forty-three. When the magnitude of the district over which the courts have jurisdiction is considered, the numbers may appear insignificant, but this circumstance cannot be taken as a criterion either of the efficiency of the police or of the diminution of crime. Many cases escape their utmost vigilance, and many are never brought to their notice by the suffering party, who would rather submit to the first loss than undergo the further loss of time and labour which a journey to the court in search of redress would subject him to. A ryot residing at the extremity of either of the above districts would be obliged to travel 400 miles to and from the court, and if the case were committed for trial before the court of circuit, double the distance. He knows the batta allowed him is inadequate to his expenses; he knows he must be a long time absent from his family; that in the mean time his farm will be neglected, and that the collector will press him if his kist be not paid; he, therefore, does not complain. I was told on the last circuit by a very intelligent native, that many cases had occurred wherein property had been discovered, and the owners of it known, but he denied that it belonged to them, because they dreaded the length of the journey to the court. If the great distance should deter an injured person from seeking redress, who is the motive for bringing offenders to punishment, it must press much harder on those who are compelled to attend the court as witnesses. They have nothing to gain, and are exposed to all the loss and inconvenience I have above enumerated. The consequence is, that they are not only withheld the information in their power, but obstinately plead ignorance ignorance of the transaction; this becomes soon known to the different gangs of plunderers, who extend their depredations, convinced of the little risk they run of being punished. In No. 1, of the Chicacole Calendar, 129 ryots made three different journies from Aska and Goomsoor to the zillah court; the total of which, at a very moderate compensation, would amount to nearly 1,000 miles."

15. In the correspondence respecting the zillah court of Guntoor, which was abolished in 1808, restored in 1814, again abolished in 1818, and recommended to be again restored, the extreme inconvenience suffered by the people from the distance of the zillah court from their homes was repeatedly brought to the notice of Government by the collector, the Board of Revenue, and the Foudarry Adawlut. Similar representations were made to the Government in 1822 and 1823, by the magistrate of the district, and by the circuit judges.

16. The extension of the jurisdiction of the district moonsiffs (under Regulation II. of 1821) will doubtless send to the moonziffs' courts, in the first instance, some suits which must otherwise have gone first to the zillah judge. But we conceive that in proportion as this measure may diminish the business of the zillah judge, it will add to the importance of his court, as the only available resource against the evils of undue partiality or error in the decisions of the inferior courts. It was indeed observed by the judicial commissioners in their Report, dated 15th October 1818, that, "if not a single suit were to come before the zillah courts, they would still be of most essential use to the country as courts of appeal and criminal courts, and still more perhaps by the salutary check which they would maintain over the district and village moonsiffs, by which they would compel them to perform properly those subordinate judicial duties which can by no other agents be so conveniently discharged."

17. Although by the extension of the register's jurisdiction from cases of 500 rupees to those of 1,000, a farther relief appears to be given to the zillah judges, it is to be observed that cases of this description were not numerous. The whole of the original suits decided by the zillah judges in 1820, amounted to no more than 977, in which the value of the property disposed of was rupees 6,16,290; the average of the suits, therefore, must have been about rupees 641; and as the jurisdiction of the judges extended as far as rupees 5,000, it is plain that there must have been among the 977 suits, many of a value below 500 rupees. But, whatever their numbers might have been, the remainder certainly did not occupy much of the judges' time, for on referring to a return of the original suits decided on trial (excluding those settled by razeenamah, or dismissed for default), it is seen, that in the said year, eighteen of the twenty zillah judges decided fewer suits than five in a month, and ten of these decided fewer than two in a month. An examination of the returns of other years will give a similar result of the suits instituted in a zillah court; the judge reserves but few to himself, the rest he refers to the register and sudder ameens; and the time devoted by him to the trial of causes, inconsiderable as it was, might no doubt at any time have been still further reduced by referring more of those suits. It may be inferred that most of the suits brought into the zillah courts might, if the applicants had thought fit, have been taken at once to the district moonsiffs, for although the jurisdiction of these officers extended to suits of the value of 200 rupees, and has latterly been enlarged to those of 500, the average amount of the suits instituted in the zillah courts scarcely exceeds rupees 175, and of these more than two-thirds, the average amount of which is about sixty-five rupees, are referred to the sudder ameens. The abolition of a zillah court carries with it of course the abolition of the courts of the register and sudder ameens.

18. The persons who suffer directly from the business of these tribunals being increased, or from the station of them being removed farther from their homes, are, in criminal matters, those who as parties or witnesses must attend the criminal judge at his station, whether in cases subject to his own cognizance, or in those belonging to the court of circuit, the former including all cases in which the offender may, in the estimation of the magistrate and his subordinates, be deserving of more severe punishment than they are authorized to inflict. In the latter, those in which the offender is to be tried by the court of circuit, and in which the court have required the attendance of individuals, whether on matters matters connected with cases of persons punished or discharged by the magistrates, or on account of other business, regarding which application may have been made to the court.

19. In the department of civil justice, the persons who suffer directly are those who are obliged to resort to the courts of the sudder ameen, register or zillah judge, whether as applicants, defendants, or witnesses, and those who (not being compelled to go in person) have the alternative of employing vakeels or other agents. The suitors in many cases, and the witnesses in almost all, must attend personally in original suits in which the property sued for is from 500 to 5,000 rupees value, in appeals or complaints against the decisions of village moonsiffs, district moonsiffs, village punchayets, district punchayets, sudder ameens, and registers, in all applications for enforcing decrees passed by the zillah judge, register, or sudder ameen, in all miscellaneous petitions, in all pauper cases where the amount sued for exceeds ten rupees value of personal property, in all pauper cases whatever of real property, and in those cases in which the plaintiff has chosen to make his application to the zillah judge in preference to any other competent authority; in criminal cases the attendants on the courts may not be so numerous as they would have been under the old Regulations, but in civil cases their numbers must be very great. In the last seven years more than 60,000 suits, original and appealed, have been disposed of in the courts of the zillah judges, registers, and sudder ameens. Of the total number of miscellaneous petitions presented to the zillah judges, we have no information; but we know that in one zillah 588 of them were presented in six months; in another, 782; in another, 1,037. The proceedings to which these references give rise must in many cases be important, and must require the attendance of many individuals.

20. Besides the direct operation of this measure upon individuals, it is a severe hardship on the members of a great community to be deprived of the protection of their chief established court of justice, and to be made over to another court which is, perhaps, from fifty to 100 miles farther from the homes of many of them, and already charged with a jurisdiction of several thousand square miles, and a population of half a million of souls. When, in consequence of a change like this, access to justice becomes very difficult, crimes are winked at or compromised, prosecutions are prevented, information is suppressed, and acts of fraud and violence, scarcely less terrible to the community in their commission than in their discovery and its consequences, must necessarily increase, although the Government may not be aware of the sufferings of the people.

21. Nor is the usefulness of the courts to be measured by mere files of cases; it can only be estimated from the effects they produce, by the silent and unseen operation of the law which they are believed to administer. The number of suits in a district may be diminished, and the necessity of a court for the protection of the people be more urgent than ever. The mere presence of an effective court of justice places a restraint upon the evil dispositions of men. Remove that restraint, and all sorts of bad passions and propensities, the fertile sources of violence and fraud, of crimes and of law suits, are let loose upon the community, and generate disorder to an extent far beyond the reach of calculation. It is for the prevention of such disorder that courts are instituted; and every new cause of grievance existing in a country is an additional reason for making justice more accessible to the people for multiplying and improving courts, certainly not for destroying them.

22. The importance of zillah courts as a salutary check upon the village and district moonsiffs was, as has already been remarked, recognised by the late Judicial Commission, in their Report of 15th October 1818. The village moonsiffs, who are appointed without selection, and are judges only because they are collectors of revenue, receive and decide suits of small amount without appeal, and without recording the evidence: they are subject to great temptations, which too many of their class are unable to resist; they are vested with almost uncontrolled power in the criminal as well as in the civil department; and, their numbers being estimated at 50,000, they may practise injustice very extensively. The fear of exposure and of prosecution in the zillah court must serve as a useful check upon them, and their opportunities of abusing their power must be materially increased by the abolition of their courts. The presence of a zillah court is also of great importance for superintending the district moonsiffs. It has been before remarked, that in 1821 Government extended their jurisdiction from 200 to 500 rupees. As a ground for this measure, the propriety of their proceedings was asserted; it was said that they had decided a great number of suits, and that very few appeals had been made against their decisions. We find that in 1820 the district moonsiffs decided 45,584 suits. In the same year, 837 appeals were instituted against their decisions. That is at the rate of one appeal for 53,114 suits decided. But this view is delusive. A small proportion of appeals affords no adequate test of the goodness of the original decisions: 1st. Because many suitors who have a right of appeal are precluded by expense and other obstacles from using it; and, 2d. Because a vast number of the suits which come before the district moonsiffs are absolutely excluded from appeal. In 1820, there were instituted before the district moonsiffs 45,815 suits; in which the property litigated amounted to rupees 13,60,465, the average being only rupees 294,114, although their jurisdiction extended as far as 200. Hence it is evident that a large proportion of the suits must have been for property not exceeding twenty rupees value, and such suits are by the Regulations not appealable. Referring, however, to the number of their decisions in cases above twenty rupees, which are reversed in appeal, it may be apprehended that their proceedings are defective, and if such be the character of the controlled part of their proceedings, it is to be feared that the uncontrolled part may be much worse. The mass of the litigation of the country is in their hands. In seven years from the time of their institution they have decided above 370,000 suits, the chief part of which must have been for property of small amount. When men are permitted to exercise such extensive judicial functions without appeal, without recording the evidence, and in the absence of every effective security of publicity or superintendence of whatever description, it is evident that every obstacle opposed to appeals from their decisions and to the complaints of persons aggrieved by their negligence or misconduct, serves to encourage such misconduct, and to debase their proceedings; and it is of the utmost consequence, therefore, for the superintendence and control of the district moonsiffs, that the efficiency of the zillah courts should be maintained.

23. The revenue officers under the Madras Government are vested with very extensive unchecked authority in the department of the magistracy, including a considerable part of the administration of the penal law. They alone are competent to receive criminal charges against natives in the first instance, and many of their proceedings are unrecorded, and exempt from control. Acts of great atrocity may be practised by the native officers, and the proceedings of magistrates and assistants may be arbitrary and injurious, without any probability of their authors being called to account. Instances of such misconduct may be occasionally brought to light, and orders suited to the occasion may, in consequence, be given. But it is essential to good government that the people should not be left to a casual and uncertain protection. Against a power so dangerous, and so liable to abuse, the best attainable safeguards should be established. The only way in which any abuse of power on the part of the officers of police can be subjected to exposure, and the evidence of their misconduct placed on record, is by a civil action in the zillah court, unless the party aggrieved should submit his complaint to the magistrate, who has the power of inflicting a punishment in such cases, under Regulation XI. of 1816, section 44.

24. He who can exercise any sort of uncontrolled authority, however small its amount may be in any particular case, if he can inflict one stripe, or one day's imprisonment, or one rupee, without being accountable for his proceedings, has in effect a power almost despotic over those persons who are subject to him. Moreover, the exclusive privilege of receiving criminal charges carries with it a power not less dangerous than that of inflicting punishment; namely, a power to exempt individuals from the penalties of the law.

25. The abolition of zillah courts increases the probability of abuse, not only by removing to a distance those tribunals, which by their power to award damages to the injured party must have afforded some check upon the illegal acts of the officers of police, but also by extending the degree of oppression, which, in the exercise of their judicial authority, the officers are enabled to inflict; an illustration of this remark may be seen in a Report of the Government by the Foudarry Adawlut, when the Rajahmundry Court was abolished, and the Foudarry

Foujdarry Adawlut objected to the removal of the prisoners from Rajahmundry to Masulipatam, on the ground of the opinion of a medical officer, which was as follows: "It is an incontrovertible fact that persons of whatever description being suddenly removed from the vicinity of the hills to a coast situation, would be very generally attacked with fever, flux, or dyspepsy, either of which complaints must be considered as threatening to life." The report concluded as follows: "This medical opinion, corroborated as it is by the experience of the court of Foujdarry Adawlut on the occasion referred to in my letter of the 5th ultimo, induces the judges respectfully to bring under the notice of the honourable the Governor in Council, the situation of those persons who are now sent by the police officers from the hilly parts of Rajahmundry, to the criminal judge at Masulipatam. When the cases of such persons may be disposed of by the criminal judge, their imprisonment at Masulipatam may frequently be tantamount to a sentence of death, while the shortness of the term would render their removal to the nearest inland zillah station a severe aggravation of their punishment; and in cases of commitment for trial before the court or quarterly sessions, the lives of many may be forfeited before they are convicted of any crimes." The power thus indirectly vested in these officers seems sufficient to subject the whole community to their will; although the full extent to which this power is exercised is not known to us, remarkable instances of it are sometimes brought to our notice. "I perfectly recollect (says a circuit judge) a case transmitted to Masulipatam by the police officer at Toonypyharenpettah, a distance of 200 miles, wherein two cultivators were actually taken from their plough to latest confessions made in the presence of a number of Brahmmins, and others who had interest enough to escape the journey."

"26. The urgent necessity which exists for providing some efficient protection to the people against the police officers, may be seen from many of the reports of the judges of circuit, and of the Foujdarry Adawlut. From one of the former we have extracted the following statement: "Most of the acquittals were of persons against whom there was no direct or circumstantial evidence, or any other than their alleged confessions before the police officers; and those either not attested according to law, or, I regret to say, obtained by means the most unjustifiable. One prisoner still bore on his person marks of great violence he had received from the peshcar of Kulleah; another had died since his committal, who, there was every reason to suppose, had met with similar ill-treatment, and both had been kept in confinement for a period of nearly three months before being forwarded to the criminal judge."

"Of the two prisoners in the two cases of highway robbery accompanied with violence, one had died, and the other was acquitted in consequence of his confessional declaration having been extorted by violence, and in the absence of any collateral evidence whatever in support of the allegations contained in that document."

"In three of the cases of theft containing ten prisoners, the only evidence forthcoming was also their alleged confessions before the police officer, but which had been so irregularly taken, as to be undeserving of the smallest weight against the prisoners, who were released accordingly. One of these confessional declarations contained two examinations; in the first of which, the prisoner denied the charge; in the second, he appears to have acknowledged his guilt; but the former only bore the signature of the attesting witnesses, one of whom had died, and the other in his evidence before the court declared he was not present during either of those examinations." On these cases the remarks of the Foujdarry Adawlut were as follows: "The endeavours of the court of Foujdarry Adawlut have long been faithfully directed to the enforcement of the provision contained in section 27, Regulation XI. of 1816, which requires that prisoners shall be forwarded by the heads of district police to the criminal judge within forty-eight hours, if possible. The practice which the court regret to find so universally prevalent, of detaining persons in custody for weeks, and even months, before their transmission to the criminal court, offers opportunity, which might not otherwise be found, of resorting to the atrocious abuses of authority here referred to; and the court of Foujdarry Adawlut do not see any probability of an amelioration of the conduct of the police officers in these respects, unless the exertions of the magistrates are more strenuously directed to the enforcement of the provisions of the law, and abuses of authority, when discovered, discovered, are invariably visited with adequate punishment. In the case to which the third judge more particularly refers in paragraph 10, the court of Foujdarry Adawlut was of opinion, that the peshcar and his abettors should have been brought to trial before the court of circuit, under the provisions of Regulation III. of 1819."

27. In another Circuit Report, the judge, after remarking on the execution of a police officer for murdering a man in endeavouring to extort from him a confession of robbery, says: "At the late sessions, in cases of confessions alleged to have been given before the police officers, there was scarcely one in which the prisoners did not declare that they had been beaten and compelled to confess; and in several cases there appeared too much reason to believe that compulsion had actually been used for the purpose alluded to." From the proceedings of the Foujdarry Adawlut on many cases brought to their notice by the judges of circuit, it is apparent that abuses like these are very general. Their remarks on one of the Reports are as follows: "It is manifest, as was observed by the third judge, on his reference of the case alluded to in this part of the Report, that the inadequate supply of food may be made the means of extorting confession; and cases have been brought before the court in which there is too much reason to believe that such had been the fact. The court would willingly hope that the instances of such flagrant abuse of power on the part of native officers are very rare; but they deem it proper to call the attention of the magistrates generally to the importance of taking the most effectual measures for ascertaining that prisoners, who, by the periodical reports laid before the court of Foujdarry Adawlut, are shown to be universally detained in the custody of these officers for weeks, and even months; previously to their transmission to the criminal judge, are adequately supplied with food; and, in order to this, it is manifestly necessary that the falsification of dates of apprehension should by the most vigorous measures be suppressed; since, when the time of a prisoner's detention is incorrectly reported, correct returns of the allowance for his subsistence must be out of the question."

28. It is also stated by the Foujdarry Adawlut that the imposition of false dates of apprehension and examination upon the criminal courts by the native heads of police has become a general practice, and that the attention of the magistrates has in vain been directed by circular orders and orders on particular cases to the necessity of using every means in their power for its suppression. On another occasion the Foujdarry Adawlut advert to the leniency of the magistrates towards native police officers in cases of misconduct, even when frequently repeated by the same officer; and they add, "its effects are universally perceptible." In a Circuit report before quoted, the frequency of abuses by native officers of police and some of peculiar atrocity are noticed as follows:

"The case of severe ill-treatment (No. 10) was fully brought home to the prisoners. They were both men of property and consideration, and one of them was the potail of that part of the country. They were both sentenced to two years' imprisonment and hard labour, and to pay a fine of 200 rupees each; and on failure thereof, to two years' further imprisonment. The case was as follows: The prosecutor, Dassoo, was attending a fair at the Sooral Devastan, when he was taken up by the tehsildar's orders, on suspicion of being implicated in four robberies, recently committed in the Barkoor Talook; but protesting his innocence, he was made over to the potail, with orders to take him with him, and endeavour to make him confess. Dassoo was accordingly taken to the potail's place of abode, and there detained eight days; during which every species of torture familiar to the natives of Canara was resorted to; but Dassoo persisted in his innocence, and at length was sent back to the tehsildar, who, after detaining him a period of twenty days, forwarded him to the criminal judge.

"The following extract from the Report of the zillah surgeon will give a correct idea of what this unfortunate man's condition was on his arrival at the zillah station, and of the irreparable injury he had sustained in his person. He says Dassoo was admitted into hospital on the 16th May 1822, with two very deep, foul, and extensive wounds on the arms and hands, and a great many smaller ones extending from the wrists to near the fingers in a spiral direction, attended with high inflammatory symptoms; he had also a good deal of fever from about him, caused by the acute pain he suffered from the state of the ulcers, and also complained of severe pain in his lower extremities from bruises which he had received. On inquiry into how the ulcers were caused, he stated that his wrists were placed between two pieces of wood, which were repeatedly squeezed together with great force, and that a rough rope, charged with powdered chillies and mustard seed, and moistened with a solution of salt, was very tightly bound round his arms, and which were kept on until his arms had swollen to about four times their natural size; and that, after the ropes were taken off, the ulcers broke out in the state I then saw them. He remained under my charge from the above date throughout the month of June, and until the 5th of July, during which period he suffered at times the most excruciating pain; and I was fearful at one time that amputation of the right fore-arm would have been necessary, from the deep-seated sloughing and great prostration of strength that took place; he, however, fortunately escaped the operation, and was discharged from the hospital in a crippled state, without any prospect of ever recovering the full use of his hands.

(3.)—Letter to the Madras
Government,
11th April 1826.

“The first judge has in his report of his last circuit noticed six cases of torturing and using violence to extort confessions; and expressed his opinion, that it was a crime of too common occurrence in Canara, even on the part of the officers of Government, though extremely difficult to procure evidence for their conviction. The present case furnishes a striking example of the justice of these observations; and in my paragraph 10, I have mentioned that I had been obliged to punish five police officers for prevarication in their evidence, regarding some confession they had attested. As a proof of the difficulty in getting at the truth where police officers abuse their authority, one of these peons, in the course of his examination, stated, that though he had put his signature to the paper, in point of fact he was not present at the time the prisoner gave his deposition, nor did he know when it was taken; and that the peshcar had threatened to dismiss him if he refused to sign it, and go and give his evidence before the court of circuit.

“I am concerned to report also that the employment of police peons as attesting witnesses, were not the only instances I had occasion to observe of the little regard paid by the head police officers to the orders passed from time to time for their guidance by the court of Foujdarry Adawlut.

In the course of this Report, I have mentioned several instances of oppressions and irregularities on the part of the police officers, and especially the disregard shown by them to orders issued for their guidance by the court of Foujdarry Adawlut; there is not a session that the attention of the magistrate, both in Canara and Malabar, is not called to abuses of authority on the part of their servants; and it is not uncommon that the same police officer is the subject of the court's animadversions; all which I see no other mode of accounting for than in the leniency with which such aberrations of public duty are noticed by their immediate superiors.” The torturing of prisoners for the purpose of extorting from them confessions of crimes appears to be common in Canara; it is spoken of by the Foujdarry Adawlut as an offence of acknowledged prevalence in that zillah. Extreme cruelties have been practised on prisoners in Malabar, as detailed in the following extract from a Report of one of the circuit judges. “The various acts of oppression and abuses of power similar to, and indeed, in many instances, equal in atrocity to the acts charged against the parbutty and kolkars of the wattun hobity which have come to light during the late circuit, as well in the course of the trials (one of which is the prosecution of the parbutty and kolkars of the euroaangoor hobity in Koormnad Talook, for the murder of the nephew of a revenue defaulter); as in the magistrates' and assistant magistrates' calendars of persons punished and discharged by them, show the prevalence of this practice to an extent as to call for the interposition of the court of circuit, since there is hardly a case wherein the sufferers who have had cause to complain in circumstances to enable them to complain against their oppressors have not the redress of their grievances; and the accused have not been sent to the gallows, or have been so greatly abused, and thereby encouraged to renew their crimes, as the magistrates' and assistant magistrates' calendars in extreme justice. The charges set forth in these calendars are, in many instances, of a nature which would bring the inhabitants from their homes to the parbutty parbatty sherishtodar or other revenue officer, either at their houses or cutcherries, and there confining them in stocks without food, tying, by means of ropes, or the fibres of cocoas and trees, or of the adomba vine, their neck and feet together, and in this posture laying them upon their backs, flogging, kicking, and beating them with their fists; making them stand in water or mud, exposed to the heat or the clemency of the weather; making them stand upon one leg, and in that position placing upon their heads a large log of wood; and breaking open their houses and carrying off and selling their property, and even slaves, without due proclamation being made thereof; and all these acts of torture and personal violence to exact payment of alleged revenue arrears, and in some instances of presents of money under the head of kooré kallyanam and chittanam, and alleged debts from one individual to another, without authority from any local tribunal. In most of these complaints, the judge on circuit has, after much labour, read through the magistrate's or his assistant's proceedings, and has been truly concerned to find that all, with hardly an exception, have been dismissed as not proved or groundless, although the evidence in most has been such as to leave not a doubt that considerable personal violence had been done by the parbutties and their kolkars to the complainants, and in most cases to an extent to require that the accused should have been sent to the criminal judge for him to try or to commit for trial before the court of circuit, according as the facts deposed before him might seem to render necessary."

29. Although we are satisfied that considerable progress has been made by your Government in fixing and equalizing the rates of the public assessment, with the view of conferring upon the ryots a permanent interest in their lands; yet we are induced to draw your attention to the state of the people under the Madras presidency, as described by the Board of Revenue in their proceedings, dated 27th November 1820, in order that you may call upon the revenue authorities to show in what degree and to what part of your territories the opinion of the Board can still be considered to apply. In that Report the Board observe that they are assured, "not only from the reports from officers deputed to inquire into complaints in the provinces, but from other unquestionable sources of information, that the great body of the ryots is not in that state of ease and security in which the justice and policy of the British Government mean to place them. In general the ryots submit to oppression, and pay what is demanded from them by any person in power, rather than have recourse to the tedious, expensive, and uncertain process of a law-suit; the cases in which they are sufferers are so numerous, various, intricate, and technical; they and their witnesses are so far from the seats of the courts of judicature; delays are so ruinous to them; they are so poor, so averse to forms, new institutions, and intricate modes of procedure; they are so timid and so simple a race, that it is necessary for the Government to endeavour to protect them by a summary and efficacious judicial process." This statement has produced on our minds a strong impression of disappointment and regret. The alterations which, in 1814, we directed to be made in the judicial system, were certainly intended to divest the judicature of all useless forms, charges, and other inconveniences to suitors and witnesses, and to bring justice to the doors of the people; but it seems that, up to the end of 1820, our endeavours to afford protection against oppression had not been successful.

30. The account given by the Board of Revenue appears to be confirmed to some extent by the circumstances referred to in the Minutes of the Governor and Mr. Fullerton, respecting the affairs of Salem and Coimbatore; and from some of the results of the operation of the criminal law, as exhibited in the half-yearly reports of the Foujdary Adawlut, to 30th June 1823, another confirmation of the account must, we fear, be inferred.

31. Having thus adverted to the very unfavourable representations which we have found on your records with respect to the practical operation of the judicial and police system, as modified by the Regulations of 1816, and of subsequent years, and to the effects likely to result from the abolition of zillah courts, on the administration of criminal justice, we have to call your attention to some suggestions which appear to us to remove the inconveniences which have been experienced.

32. On Mr. Gregory's appointment to the new zillah of Chittoor, we have to state that that the duties which would be thrown upon the zillah court would be so heavy as to create great delay in the decision of suits; and he suggested that two extra registers (besides the register stationed at the zillah court) should be attached to the new zillah, and placed at stations to the north and south of the zillah court station; you did not, however, think it expedient to enter into a consideration of Mr. Gregory's plan, but informed him that it was your intention to extend the jurisdiction of the sudder ameens and district muddiffs, and in other respects to relieve the zillah judges from a part of the duties with which they were then charged.

(3.)—Letter to the
Madras
Government,
11th April 1826.

33. We appreciate highly that part of the arrangement which, in his Minute of 22d January 1821, Sir Thomas Munro recommended for improving the efficiency of the revenue branch of the service, by employing principal and sub-collectors, increasing the rank and emoluments of the former class of functionaries, so as to secure their continuance in that line of the service, and affording them the aid of sub-collectors, with the view of enabling the experienced superior to attend more closely to the general affairs of his district, and of securing a regular succession of qualified revenue officers. We find that under this arrangement, six collectors have been promoted to the rank of principal collector, with allowances averaging in amount what is assigned to a second and to a third provincial judge, and that eight sub-collectors have been attached to the largest districts with salaries of rupees 14,000 each per annum.

34. In the judicial branch of the service, the number of important situations still greatly exceeds that in the revenue branch; and it may be apprehended that the civil servants will still endeavour to procure employment in the judicial department; but as it may not be practicable to equalize the advantages in the two branches, we must be satisfied with such an arrangement as may secure a fair share of the general talent to be found in our civil service to both departments.

35. We fear that the efficiency of the zillah courts must have been greatly weakened by the large extension of their jurisdiction; and it is obvious that many of the evils and inconveniences which led us in 1814 to provide methods of obtaining justice without a resort to these courts, are greatly aggravated by the reduction of those courts in number. These evils might be removed by their entire abolition under some new arrangement for the administration of justice, or by a great increase in their number; but the intermediate course of leaving the jurisdiction, and weakening the judicatory, is precisely that which tends most to the difficulties and delays, and consequent denial of justice, which we deplored in 1814.

36. It is worthy of consideration, whether Mr. Gregory's suggestion may not be adopted, with the double view of bringing the European judicatory nearer to the homes of the people, and introducing a class of functionaries into the judicial department, similar to that appointed to the revenue department. It cannot be doubted that a system of training is as necessary in the one line of the service as in the other; and that a judicial officer may, under the directions of the zillah judge, be successfully employed in a district of moderate extent, and thus gradually qualify himself for the duties of the largest. It might therefore be proper that, in every large zillah, an assistant civil and criminal judge should be appointed, under such powers and such limitations as may be deemed advisable, and stationed at such part of the zillah as is most remote from the zillah court, or, on account of the natural difficulties of the country, is least under the control of the zillah judge. All vacancies in the zillah courts would be supplied from the list of assistant judges, and thus a regular succession of experienced functionaries would be secured in the judicial as well as revenue departments.

37. If you should see no practical objection to the adoption of this arrangement, you will afford the assistant judge every necessary facility for conducting the business of his court, by allowing to him the establishment of native judicial officers. These, in the first instance, should be selected from the most deserving of the native officers, who have been deprived of employment by the reduction of the zillah courts in those parts of the country where assistant judges are stationed. But we think that all future vacancies in the principal courts should be supplied from the list of district district moonsiffs in the zillah where the vacancy may occur. The rank of the assistant judge's principal native officers should be below that of the principal native officers of the zillah judge, and their allowances should range between those of the latter officers and those of the district moonsiffs; our object being to secure a regular line of promotion to the native as well as the European officers employed in the internal administration of the country, with a clear understanding, however, that meritorious conduct should alone entitle any individual to succeed to the superior situation.

38. Another mode has occurred to us of lessening the inconvenience which must arise from the reduction of the number of zillah courts. If the zillah judges, instead of holding their courts always at the sudder station, were to hold alternate sessions at different places within their zillahs, justice might be brought still nearer to the people than before the reduction of the courts. The judges would moreover be enabled to exercise a much more effectual control over the proceedings, and acquire a more intimate knowledge of the characters and conduct of the district moonsiffs than is possible while they remain stationary. It also occurs to us, that the judges might assemble the moonsiffs attached to the districts, included in the portion of the zillah in which the session is held, and that they might select one or more of the more respectable and intelligent members of that body to officiate in the character of ameens of the court during the continuance of the sessions, by which arrangement considerable inconvenience would be obviated in reducing the number of followers to be attached to the judges during the progress of their circuits; and the district moonsiffs would at the same time receive a useful lesson under the eye of the judges, as to the most approved mode of investigating and deciding civil suits. The records of the suits decided by the judges or the officiating ameens on circuit would, we think, be most conveniently deposited with the senior district moonsiff, who might be employed to perform the functions of ameen.

39. The occasional circuits of the zillah judges would enable them to acquire an intimate knowledge of the state of the police within their respective zillahs, and they would have it in their power to furnish the fullest information to the magistrate and the provincial courts, upon the subject of any complaints which might be brought against the police officers for an irregular and improper exercise of their functions.

40. While the zillah judges are on circuit, the duties of their office at the sudder station would necessarily be confided to the registers, who would of course be empowered to officiate as assistant judges during the absence of their principals.

41. On this suggestion we also wish to have your unreserved opinion. You are at liberty to act upon it either generally or partially, if it shall appear to you to be free from material objection.

42. We agree with you in attaching high importance to the office of district moonsiff, and are most desirous to promote the utility and efficiency of that valuable class.

43. We are aware that the judicial commissioners were of opinion, that it was essential that the district moonsiffs should be influenced by motives of immediate gain in despatching the business before their courts; and hence their emoluments were made to consist partly of a fixed salary, and partly of fees of one anna in the rupee on the institution of suits. This arrangement may have in some respects effected the object it had in view; but we are apprehensive that it may have conducted rather to the quick despatch than the satisfactory adjustment of the business before their courts; we admit that the small number of appeals which have been made to the superior courts from the decisions of the district moonsiffs, compared with the number of suits decided by them, is apparently well calculated to diminish this apprehension; but before confidence can be placed in the general correctness of their proceedings, the number of suits appealed ought to be contrasted with the number of suits decided, and not, as has only been done, with the number decided. This comparison is not the means of making, but such a test is necessary, to prove the correctness of the collector's opinion of the satisfactory character of the proceedings of the district moonsiffs.

44. The collector of Bellary had stated that the district moonsiffs, by the exertions of their influence, influence, draw into their courts suits, which, under the Regulations, were intended to be decided by the village moonsiffs; and with a view to prevent this inconvenience, you abolished the institution fee on suits not exceeding ten rupees value, in the courts of the district moonsiffs. It was considered by your Government to be desirable that those suits should be decided by the village moonsiffs; it was thought that more of them would be so settled in proportion as the delay in the courts of the district moonsiff increased; and it was expected that the district moonsiff, though still bound to decide such suits, would find means to put off or to evade altogether the adjustment of them, when he had others before him that yielded him fees.

(3.)—Letter to the
Madras
Government.
11th April 1826.

45. In order to afford the people every facility of access to good judicature, we desire the establishment of numerous tribunals, conveniently situated, and with all attainable securities for the right conduct of the judge; but if obstacles are thrown in the way of suitors, by preventing or deterring them from taking their causes to a proper tribunal, there is a deviation from this principle.

If it is the wish of the people to take their suits to the district moonsiffs instead of the village moonsiffs, they should not by any means be discouraged from so doing; and the deterioration of the judicature, which must be the consequence of placing the judge's interest in opposition to his duty, is especially to be avoided.

46. Instances of the exertions of district moonsiffs to draw suits to their courts must no doubt have come to the knowledge of the collector of Bellary, but we are not aware of similar statements having been made from other districts; we apprehend, moreover, that the suits influenced by such means must be very few in proportion to those occasioned by the ordinary, legitimate, and unavoidable causes of litigation.

47. If the number of suits taken to the village moonsiffs had been materially affected by the exertions of the district moonsiffs, the effect would have ceased with the motive which was supposed to have produced it. But since the fees on suits not exceeding ten rupees value have been abolished in the courts of the district moonsiffs, the village moonsiffs have had even fewer suits than before.

48. In consideration as well of the enlarged powers confided to district moonsiffs by Regulation II. of 1821, as of the desirableness of diminishing the labours of the zillah courts, we are anxious that every encouragement should be given to the district moonsiffs, not only to dispose of the business without delay, but to weigh maturely the merits of each particular case.

49. With this view, we recommend that fixed salaries should be assigned to the district moonsiffs, which ought to exceed their former average receipts from fixed salary and institution fees. We do not, however, propose to dispense with the payment of an institution fee, but we recommend that no suit, instituted in a district moonsiff's court, should be subjected to a higher fee than two and a half per cent.

50. It may be expected that so considerable a reduction in the amount of the institution fee will bring a large addition of business into the courts of the district moonsiffs, and we are of opinion that a discretion should be lodged with the district moonsiffs to admit pauper cases into their courts. We must therefore expect that you will find it necessary to increase the number of district moonsiffs in each zillah; and we perceive that this measure was suggested by you as a remedy to the inconvenience which was experienced by the zillah judges from the additional duties thrown upon them and their registers by Regulation VI. of 1822.

51. We must leave it to your local experience to fix the number of district moonsiffs, according to the circumstances of each zillah; and in respect to the amount of their fixed allowances, we are anxious that it should be sufficient to secure the services of persons of ability. We do not expect that the sum which may be collected from the institution fee will be sufficient to meet the additional expense; but we are satisfied that if the measure is attended with any improvement in the administration of civil justice, the expense will be more than compensated by a decrease of charges in the department of police. We think that it will be of advantage to attach to certain districts in each zillah a higher rate of allowances, to which persons of extraordinary merit should, as opportunities offer, be appointed; and we recommend that at the close of the year the judges of the provincial courts should be empowered to confer honorary rewards, in addition to their ordinary allowances, to such sudder ameen and district moonsiffs as may have discharged their duties in an exemplary manner. We are likewise of opinion that similar rewards should be given to the native head police officers, who may be reported by the magistrates to merit the approbation of Government.

52. In respect to the criminal branch of business, we regret to observe, from the correspondence which accompanied the latest half-yearly statements transmitted to us, that you are far from being satisfied with the manner in which the magisterial duties were conducted in various districts. We more particularly allude to the observations contained in Mr. Hill's letter to the Foujdarry Adawlut, dated 7th November 1823, relative to the half-yearly statement ending 30th June 1823; and we entirely approve of the tenor of your instructions on that occasion. The great diversity observable in the administration of the same laws by different magistrates points out the necessity for placing the proceedings of the magistrates under the control of an authority capable of correcting so great an inconvenience.

53. The Foujdarry Adawlut have frequently reported to you the hardships and injuries which have been sustained by individuals from the irregular exercise of authority by the native heads of police, as well as from the want of a constant control over the proceedings of the magistrates; but we do not find that the representations of the judges have ever seriously engaged your attention. By section 40 of Regulation IX. of 1816, the judges on circuit are vested with a control over the recorded proceedings of magistrates; but the same judges, when sitting as judges of a provincial court, cannot interfere in the administration of that portion of the criminal law which is confided to the magistrates; their criminal judicature as provincial judges being strictly limited to a control over the proceedings of the zillah criminal judges. It is therefore obvious that individuals who may be sentenced by the magistrates during the periods when the judges of the provincial courts are not on circuit, have no means of appealing against the magistrates' proceedings, however erroneous or irregular these proceedings may have been. The Foujdarry Adawlut suggested that the judges of the provincial courts should be vested with the same authority over the proceedings of magistrates, as they now possess over the proceedings of the criminal judges; and we conceive that it is but equitable that persons who may be sentenced to punishment by magistrates should possess the same facilities for procuring a revisal of the magistrates' proceedings when the provincial courts are not on circuit, as persons similarly circumstanced now do during the periods when those judges are on circuit.

54. We are likewise of opinion, that a salutary check against the abuse of authority on the part of the native heads of police would be secured by extending the right of petition to all persons who may be sentenced to punishment by those authorities. All complaints against the proceedings and decisions of the native heads of police should, however, be addressed to the magistrate or assistant magistrate, as might be most convenient to the petitioners; but to secure the attention of the magistrates and their assistants, they should be required to keep a record of all the petitions which may be received, complaining of the acts of the subordinate officers; and in an explanatory column to state shortly the reasons for either affirming or altering the sentence in each particular case. A copy of this record should be transmitted monthly to the provincial court, to enable the judges to exercise watchful superintendence over the proceedings of the police authorities.

55. In your instructions to the Foujdarry Adawlut, dated 7th November 1823, you have suggested that "the magistrates and criminal judges should be required to submit their periodical statements to the provincial courts, accompanied by any observations which the contents of them might seem to make necessary; and as the course which we have now should be adopted places the control of the criminal and police proceedings of all such authorities immediately in the hands of the judges of the provincial courts, we should have that it would be impossible for such a disparity as that exhibited in the half-yearly statement ending 30th June 1823, between the adjoining Districts of Coimbatore and Madras, to exist without without measures being instantly adopted for remedying a misapplication, if not an abuse of authority, which you have justly described to be "a public evil of very serious magnitude."

56. In the absence of that full information which in any case we should desire to possess before we took upon ourselves to disapprove the proceedings of the local government, and, in the present instance, not without diffidence as to the correctness of our judgment when not in accordance with yours, we have thought it most prudent to suspend our final determination, to intimate to you, unreservedly, the views which we have taken, and to desire that, after considering our doubts, and the grounds of those doubts, you will as frankly report to us your sentiments respecting them, and that you will give us such further information as the subject may demand and you may be able to afford.

57. Entirely disposed to place due reliance on your prudence, we have now only to add, that, if after reconsideration of the whole matter, the restoration of any of the abolished zillah courts should, for the protection of the people, be in your judgment desirable, we authorize you to restore them, without waiting for further communication from us.

ANSWER to para. 11 of Letter of 4th January 1822.

58. We remark that Regulation I. of 1821, which empowers the Governor in Council to establish or abolish provincial and zillah courts of judicature by an order in council without enacting a Regulation for that purpose, was passed without any discussion on the subject being placed on record; and that the only reason given for your not previously referring it, according to the usual course, to the Supreme Government, was, that it would save time. Adverting to the important functions of the provincial and zillah courts, and to the provisions of Regulation I. of 1802, and of the Act 37 Geo. III. c. 142. s. 8, we think it necessary to direct that the establishment or abolition of those tribunals be effected as heretofore, and, as at the other presidencies, by a formal Regulation. It is required by section 5, Regulation I. of 1802, that in the preamble of every Regulation the reasons for enacting it shall be stated; but in the preamble of Regulation I. 1821, no reason is assigned; it is merely said that it will be convenient. We desire that the attention of the officers who prepare drafts of Regulations may be particularly directed to the rules laid down in Regulation I. of 1802.

Honourable Sirs:

1. We have the honour to acknowledge the receipt of your Honourable Court's letter of the 11th April 1826, communicating your sentiments on the subject of the abolition of the zillah courts under this presidency, the employment of district and village moonsiffs in the administration of justice, and the conduct and control of the police under the present system.

2. At our meeting on the 30th January 1827, we took into consideration the important subjects discussed in the despatch to which we have now the honour of replying, and have recorded in our Consultations of that date our sentiments on the several points upon which explanation appeared to be required.

3. The observations which are there offered in detail will, we trust, satisfy your Honourable Court; that although we did not consider it necessary to call for the opinion of the local and experienced officers in the judicial department before the abolition of such courts as we had reason to believe were no longer required was carried into effect, the measure was not not hastily adopted; that it was unconnected with the establishment of sub-collectors; and has not been productive of so much inconvenience to the people as your Honourable Court, from the fact of a few petitions against the measure having been received, and from the reports of judicial officers of the distance which, in one or two districts and in extreme cases, suitors and witnesses have had to travel, have been led to suppose, that there is little ground for the apprehension expressed by your Honourable Court, that in consequence of access to justice by the reduction of the zillah courts being rendered more difficult, crimes are committed, prosecutions prevented, information suppressed, and acts of fraud and violence committed with impunity; or for the supposition that the control over the village moonsiffs and police officers is thereby rendered less efficient, and the power which they exercise in consequence abused. We trust we have also satisfactorily shown that there is little reason for considering the statement, that prisoners are exposed to diseases, and even loss of life, by being sent from the hilly parts of Rajahmundry to the gaol at Masulipatam—another of the evils supposed to have been occasioned by the consolidation of the zillah courts—to be deserving of attention.

4. With respect to the district moonsiffs, we think we have clearly demonstrated in our proceedings before referred to, that there is no ground for drawing the inference that their courts are not popular, from the fact, that as the average of suits instituted in the zillah courts did not exceed the value of 175 rupees, most of them might have been carried to the native judicatories if the parties had wished it. Indeed the statements of the business performed by all the courts, European and Native, throughout the country, laid before us periodically by the Sudder Adawlut, show that the number of suits brought before the district moonsiffs is far greater than could have been expected; and from the information which we have been able to collect, it appears that the proportion of appeals to decisions in their courts is extremely small; and we have little doubt that a statement of the decisions affirmed or reversed in appeal would turn the scale still more in their favour. We think we may confidently assert, from the increased resort of suitors to the native tribunals, that they have fully realized the expectation formed of their utility; and, considering the respectability of the situation, the facility with which misconduct can be brought to the notice of the local superior authority, and the interest which the zillah judges themselves have in selecting men of known integrity and ability for the office, we are of opinion that there is no reason for supposing that the trust reposed in district moonsiffs is abused. We have not therefore deemed it advisable to make any alteration in the existing Regulation with a view to render suits under twenty rupees appealable. No complaints have hitherto been made against the rule, and if any inconvenience should hereafter be found to arise from it, the remedy is in the hands of Government, and can be easily applied. But although we have not considered it advisable to modify the moonsiff Regulation in this respect, we have adopted several of the measures suggested by your Honourable Court for the improvement of the system: among these are the restoration of the fee on suits under ten rupees, and the reduction of the fee payable by complainants on the institution of suits; which latter we have directed the Sudder Adawlut to carry into effect without making a corresponding reduction in the receipts of the district moonsiffs from this source. The expense, we are of opinion, should be borne by Government; and it is believed that the institution fees carried to the account of Government on suits dismissed for default, &c. will furnish ample funds to meet the disbursement. For facility of reckoning, however, we have fixed the fee at half an anna per rupee, instead of two and a half per cent.; the difference is trifling, and the calculation will be more easily understood by the poorer classes.

5. We have referred, for the consideration of the Sudder Adawlut, the suggestion of your Honourable Court, regarding the zillah judges holding alternate sessions at the different moonsiff stations within the zillah, and the allowing district moonsiffs a discretion of admitting pauper cases into their court; as also the suggestion of granting rewards to meritorious moonsiffs, and to head police officers for exemplary discharge of their duties: but we have not considered it advisable to shake the public confidence in the moonsiff system by such an innovation as the substitution of salary for fees; and we feel confident that your Honourable able Court, on referring to the reasons which we have assigned in the 37th, 38th, and 39th paragraphs of our Proceedings, will approve our resolution to allow the system, for the present at least, to remain in this respect undisturbed.

6. Whilst furnishing instructions to the Sudder Adawlut, on the subject of such parts of your Honourable Court's despatch as relate to the moonsiff system, we suggested various other modifications of the rules under which the proceedings in the moonsiffs' courts are at present conducted, which do not require to be here noticed in detail, but which will, if finally adopted and introduced into the code of Regulations, form the subject of a future communication.

7. In the 11th paragraph of our Proceedings, we have endeavoured to show that there is no ground for the apprehension expressed by your Honourable Court that the village moonsiffs are vested with much uncontrolled power, and are subject to great temptation, which too many of them are unable to resist; and that the fear of prosecution, which was before a useful check upon them, is now diminished by the reduction of the zillah courts. The fact is, that this class of public officers, although gradually becoming more useful, as yet takes but little part in the active discharge of any but revenue duties.

8. Your Honourable Court have animadverted at considerable length, and with just severity, upon the conduct of native police officers in extorting confessions from prisoners, and appear to apprehend that they are not sufficiently under control. In those cases where police officers have been convicted of practising cruelty on persons in their custody, it is satisfactory to know that they have been severely punished; but our belief is, that in a great proportion of the cases where violence is charged none has been used. It has now become so generally a practice with prisoners to bring forward at some stage of the trial a charge of having been compelled to confess the crime before the police officers, and witnesses in support of their assertions are so easily found among their relations and friends, that the tahsildars are cautious to avoid the appearance of any thing which can in any way be construed into an undue use of the authority vested in them.

9. As a proof how easily witnesses can be procured in support of accusations of violence, and how readily their evidence is received, we beg leave to refer your Honourable Court to a case brought to our notice by the magistrate of Coimbatore, and recorded in our Consultation of the 3d April. It is there stated that certain prisoners, charged with having committed an atrocious murder in open day, confessed the crime before the police, and when brought before the criminal judge denied it, and asserted that their depositions had been extorted, but alleged that they had no evidence to prove that they had been ill used by the police; before the court of circuit, however, they called several witnesses to prove the fact; and although the depositions of the witnesses differed in all material points from the statement made by the prisoners, their evidence was received, and an opinion strongly condemning the conduct of the police was recorded by the court, and communicated to the magistrate, in order that the parties accused might be severely punished. We believe that in this and in most other cases, in which cruelty is charged against the police, there is not the slightest ground for believing that any has been practised; and it is matter of surprise that police officers, restrained on the one hand by the dread of being dragged before the courts to answer to charges of imputed irregularity or misconduct, and stimulated on the other by the fear of drawing down upon themselves the displeasure of the magistrate in the event of any apparent remissness, discharge their duties so creditably and efficiently. The increasing tranquillity of the country, and the gradual diminution of organized bands of robbers, sufficiently prove the useful and meritorious services of the police. In the zillah of Ganjam, the notorious freebooter Maharta and his principal accomplices, against whom a military force had on several former occasions been unsuccessfully employed, have lately been apprehended by the police alone; and the magistrate of Guntoor has reported, that the principal and most troublesome, Chenchoo, Boches, Naick, and others, had been induced to surrender themselves, and have been brought to a civil and peaceable mode of livelihood, which he justly observes could not have been effected "unless the country had been under one person in the offices of collector and magistrate;" while to the southward, the notorious rious gang robbers, Appoo and Cautan, who had for some years past infested the districts of Trichinopoly and Salem, have been at last secured, and their haunts and associates discovered. There are now no districts in which gangs of robbers are known to exist, and it is believed that at no former period was the sense of security of person and property more confirmed than it is at present.

10. With regard to the control which is exercised over the police, we are not aware that any change could render it more efficient than it is at present; and we trust that your Honourable Court, on referring to the explanation given in the 46th, 47th, 48th, 49th, and 50th paragraphs of our Proceedings, will concur with us in that opinion; but if on further experience it should be found that some alteration is necessary, we think it ought to be made, not by giving any new power to the provincial courts, but by authorizing the judge on circuit to pass orders on petitions from every zillah within his range, during the whole course of his circuit, without reference to the particular district in which he may be at the time.

11. We are satisfied that more courts and more intermediate checks over the police are not wanted for the protection of the ryots from exactions, and of the inhabitants in general from theft and robbery; but more systematic experience, and consequently more aptitude among our local officers, both native and European, for the discharge of their several duties; we therefore entirely agree with your Honourable Court, that a system of training is as necessary in the judicial as in the revenue line, and that an intermediate class of functionaries, similar to that already established in the revenue, should be introduced into the judicial department.

12. We have accordingly, under the authority conveyed in the 57th paragraph of your Honourable Court's despatch, established auxiliary courts in those districts* where, from the pressure of business, their services appeared to be most required, and the system of training could, in consequence, be most effectually introduced. The presiding officers of these courts are denominated assistant judges and joint criminal judges, and are vested with the same civil and criminal powers as zillah judges; but in order that the files of the provincial courts might not be overwhelmed, if an appeal to them was allowed from all decisions by the assistant judges, and with a view also to adhere as nearly as possible to the rules regarding appeals in zillah courts, an appeal lies to the zillah judge from the decisions passed by the assistant judge, in suits for value not exceeding 1,000 rupees.

13. The expense of these courts will be considerably less than that of the zillah courts, as we have not considered it necessary to attach Hindoo or Mahomedan law officers to them, and as the salary of the assistant judge has been fixed at 1,400 rupees per mensem, and the native servants of the court will be paid at a rate somewhat below that fixed for similar classes of servants in the zillah court. The establishments of the auxiliary courts will be formed in the first instance from such of the servants of the zillah courts lately abolished as are now without employment and qualified for office; and when completed, will enable the zillah courts to effect a proportionate reduction in the number of servants on their establishments: the principle on which this will be regulated is explained in our Consultations of the 20th March 1827.

14. On reference to the 31st paragraph of our Proceedings, your Honourable Court will find our reasons for thinking that vacancies among the district moonsiffs should rather be filled up from the establishment of the assistant judges than that the opposite course should be observed; but upon the whole we are of opinion that the selection should be left to the judges, without confining their choice to any particular class of people.

15. Your Honourable Court will not fail to observe, that the assistant judges, now appointed have different powers and different duties from those who have hitherto been appointed, as occasion required, under Regulation VII. of 1809, and that it is still open to the Government to avail itself of the services of assistant judges under that Regulation.

* Masulipatam, Cuddapah, Salem, Madura, Canara, and Malabar.

whenever the pressure of civil business alone may render it necessary to afford additional aid to the zillah judges.

16. In reply to the 58th paragraph of your Honourable Court's despatch, we beg leave to refer you to the 52d and 53d paragraphs of our proceedings, for an explanation of the circumstance of no discussion on the subject of passing Regulation I. of 1821 having been placed on record, and for our reasons for considering the preamble to be sufficiently explanatory of the cause of the enactment of that Regulation, which we trust will prove satisfactory to your Honourable Court.

We have the honour to be, &c. &c.

EXTRACT, Fort Saint George Judicial Consultations, 30th January 1827.

The Board proceed to take into consideration the Letter from the honourable the Court of Directors in this department, dated the 11th April 1826, together with the Minutes of the President and Mr. Ogilvie thereupon, which are ordered to be recorded.

PRESIDENT'S MINUTE.

1. I have considered with attention the letter from the honourable the Court of Directors in the Judicial Department, dated the 11th April 1826: some of the measures recommended in the letter may be immediately adopted with advantage; but there are some which it would not be advisable to adopt, and others which it may be found useful to introduce hereafter when the system is more consolidated and better understood, but which it would be inconvenient to carry into effect at present.

2. The Honourable Court, after noticing the abolition of the zillah courts between February 1820 and March 1823, observe, that the local and superior judicial officers should have been required to report their opinion, before measures of such extreme importance were decided on. The abolition was not hastily adopted; it had frequently been discussed among the members of Government, who were unanimous in their opinion regarding its expediency. Had the members of Government been men of little experience, and unacquainted with the operation of the judicial system, I should undoubtedly have thought it necessary to make a reference to the judicial officers; but Messrs. Stratton and Thackeray, the two civil members, were, from their general knowledge of the service and experience in the judicial line, at least as competent as any of the local officers to form a just opinion on the subject under consideration; and to have waited under such circumstances to collect opinions from every quarter would have been a mere waste of labour. There are some cases in which it is useful to have the opinion of every local officer; there are others in which that of only one or two of the most intelligent can be of the smallest use; and there are some in which none is necessary. I considered the present to be a case in which Government could have derived no aid from other opinions in forming its own, for it possessed in itself as extensive a knowledge of the localities of every district under this presidency, and of the characters and customs of the inhabitants, as could have been obtained any where else; and as it had before it the periodical returns of the business done in the several courts, it was enabled, by observing what was done in some of the larger and more populous zillahs, to determine how far some of the smaller ones might be united without detriment to the due administration of justice.

It is obvious too, that on such a question as that of the reduction of the number of zillahs, an impartial opinion could hardly have been expected from the judicial officers.

They

234 APPENDIX TO REPORT FROM SELECT COMMITTEE.

They must be supposed to be like other men, favourable to the branch of service to which they belong, and however conscientious, they may be liable to be influenced, without being sensible of it, by their wishes and their interests. Had the number of zillah courts been double or even treble of what it actually was, I am satisfied that not a single reduction would have been recommended.

4. Petitions against the abolition of the courts are in general of little weight; they prove nothing against the measure; they rise out of partial local interests. In whatever town or village a zillah court is established, it is beneficial to the inhabitants, not only for the sake of justice, but because it adds to the value of their houses and other property, gives them additional employment, and a better market for their produce. The removal of the court will of course be a loss to the inhabitants of that place and its neighbourhood, and produce petitions; but the same thing would happen if the court were not reduced, but removed within the same zillah from a small town to a larger one, more conveniently situated for the population of the whole zillah; or even if, on removing the court, two courts instead of one were established in the same zillah, the inhabitants of the place from which the court had been removed would still complain. Had the courts been originally three times as numerous as they were, the reduction of any one of them would have produced petitions: Government cannot act upon such petitions, but must look to the wants of the whole country, and be guided by them in distributing the courts.

5. On the introduction of the judicial system, the courts were established at once, without any previous knowledge of the number that would be requisite. It was soon discovered that there were too many, and several were reduced; longer experience showed that the business of some courts was much less than that of others; that the business of all had been considerably diminished, by the operation of the Regulations of 1816 and subsequent enactments; and that a further reduction could be made without inconvenience and without imposing upon the courts more labour than they formerly had. It was upon this ground that the reductions from 1821 to 1823 were made, and it is to be regretted that any expression in the Minute proposing them should have led the Honourable Court to think that they were connected with the establishment of sub-collectors; there was no connexion between the two measures. The sub-collectors would have been appointed had there been no courts to reduce, and the courts would have been reduced if there had been no intention of appointing sub-collectors. But it was regarded as a satisfactory circumstance, that while we were increasing the expense of one branch of the service, we could lessen that of another without improving its efficiency. If we compare Bengal and Madras with respect to their relative extent of territory, and amount of revenue property and population, and if we take into the account the relief which the Madras zillah courts have derived from the Regulations of 1816, I believe it will appear that Madras has as large a proportion of zillah courts as Bengal.

6. The Honourable Court have quoted* some reports of judicial officers, regarding the great distance which witnesses have sometimes to travel. A case is stated in Canara, in which some of the witnesses resided at the distance of 200 and others of 260 miles from the zillah court. Mangalore, the court station, is about 50 miles from the southern extremity, and 160 from the northern extremity of Canara, and about 210 from the most distant part of Sondah. There was a zillah court at Honawer, which was abolished many years ago by a former government, and had the remaining court been then transferred from Mangalore to Candapore or Busroor, where the collector's cutcherry was for some years, it would have been equally distant from the northern and southern points of Canara, and would have obviated, as far as regards distance, every material inconvenience which has been since experienced. Canara is a long narrow tract of country, not more than twenty or thirty miles in its average width; and Sondha, which is situated above the Ghauts, is almost an entire jungle, thinly peopled and very unhealthy. In such districts, therefore, as Canara and Sondha, the partial evil of distance cannot be removed without giving to them more courts than the of their population and property requires. The pressure of business in Canara is much greater than in any other zillah, and has frequently engaged the attention of the Board; and though I have little doubt that it grew out of the misconduct of the court at a former period, yet I am convinced that it can now be remedied only by the aid of an assistant judge. A case is brought forward as one of great hardship in Chicacole, where some rayets travelled three times from Aska and Goomsoor to the zillah court, making a distance of a thousand miles. These are evidently extreme cases, which seldom happen. Goomsoor is a remote, unhealthy hill zemindarry, over which our courts have a very imperfect authority.

7. These complaints are not peculiar to this country. In all countries we have the same or perhaps greater aversion of prosecutors and witnesses to attend the courts, and leave their homes and business, and the same complaints of distance and detention. In many of our old zillahs, the court station was not central, but at one extremity of the district, like Masulipatam. It would be an useless multiplication of courts to attempt to bring every remote corner of a district within a limited distance of them. The people of India, both from habit and climate, attach much less importance to distance than we do; they travel at little expense, as they pay nothing on the journey for their accommodation; they would no doubt rather travel forty or fifty miles to a court than eighty or one hundred; but it is the leaving their homes and the time they are to be absent from them and their business which they think most of. A man who has to go fifty miles, knows that he can reach the court in two or three days; if a hundred, in as many more; but he can form no guess how long he will be detained there. It may be one, two, or three weeks, or as many months, and it is this which they chiefly complain of, and from which no increase of courts could afford more than a very trifling relief.

8. It is observed by the Honourable Court,* that as the average of suits instituted in the zillah courts did not exceed the value of 175 rupees, most of them might have been carried to the district moonsiffs had the parties wished it. It is not easy to ascertain the motives which may have led to this preference. In some instances it may have been the belief that the case would be better examined in the zillah court; in others it may have been contrary; the character of the court, and the case being a plain or intricate one, would often influence the suitor in his choice of a court. In many cases recourse was no doubt had to the zillah judge, because the suitors resided in the town which was the station of the zillah court. But one thing is clear, that is, all causes coming before the district moonsiffs might have gone to the judge, and as so small a proportion of them did go, that the moonsiff's court is much more popular than the zillah court. It cannot be denied that the abolition of the zillah courts was attended with inconvenience, from the loss of the services of the sudder ameens; but it was soon remedied by the appointment of additional moonsiffs.

9. It is apprehended by the Honourable Court,† that when, in consequence of the late reduction of the zillah courts, "access to justice becomes very difficult, crimes are winked at or compromised, prosecutions are prevented, information is suppressed, and acts of fraud and violence scarcely less terrible to the community in their commission than in their discovery, and its consequences must necessarily increase, although the Government may not be aware of the sufferings of the people." There is no cause, I think, for the apprehension here expressed. When at an earlier period several zillah courts were reduced, and Cuddapah and Bellary, each more extensive than any of the enlarged zillahs, were left with one zillah court each, no such apprehension was entertained, and no such consequences followed, and there is no reason to believe that they are more likely to follow in the recently enlarged zillahs. Crimes have not increased, they are gradually diminishing, and will continue to diminish. If the Honourable Court suppose that crimes can be prevalent without the knowledge of Government, or that the sufferings of the people can be concealed from it, they have formed an opinion of the state of things under this presidency which is far from being correct. There can can hardly be any crime, and there can be no suffering of the people, concealed from Government. There may be a very few exceptions in some of the hill zemindaries, where the authority of Government scarcely reaches; but, in all other districts, the detailed nature of our internal administration, and the innumerable number of rayets who hold their lands immediately of Government, bring us into such universal and direct intercourse with the people as to preclude the possibility of their sufferings being concealed from us.

10. It is remarked by the Honourable Court,* that the village moonsiffs, estimated to amount to 50,000, are vested with much uncontrolled power, and are subject to great temptations, which too many of them are unable to resist; that the fear of prosecution in the zillah courts was an useful check upon them, and that the late reduction of courts will remove this check. This opinion is not supported by any experience we have yet had. The village moonsiffs are so far from abusing their power that very few of them act at all. Their dread of being summoned on some false complaint or other to the zillah court is so great, that most of them avoid exercising the authority intrusted to them; this unwillingness was foreseen at the time the Regulation was passed, but not to the extent it has since been found to exist; had they been left according to ancient usage, responsible in the first instance only to their tahsildar, they would in general have discharged the duties of the petty jurisdiction assigned to them; but their fear of the court is so great, that only a small portion of the more intelligent venture to act at all. The abolition of the courts has not made them more confident, and it will yet be a very long time before they acquire confidence sufficient to enable them to become so useful in their subordinate station as they ought to be.

11. It is stated very justly by the Honourable Court,† that in order to form a just estimate of the merit due to the district moonsiffs from the small proportion of appeals made from their decisions, we ought not to compare the number of appeals with the number of decisions, but with the number of suits appealable, and that if this were done, the result would be less favourable to the moonsiffs. It is also remarked, that many appeals are prevented by expense and other obstacles, but this surely is not peculiar to the moonsiffs more than to the zillah and provincial courts. Even if we take only the appealable suits, the proportion of appeals will still be so small as to be very creditable to the moonsiffs. The records of the Government office do not supply the information required, as they do not distinguish between the suits above and below twenty rupees; and as it would take a considerable time to get it from the provinces, it will suffice for the present purpose to exhibit the returns which I have obtained from two of the nearest zillahs, Combaconum and Cuddapah.

There is, I think, no sufficient foundation for the supposition that great abuses are used by the district moonsiffs in the decision of suits under twenty rupees, from their not being appealable. Their proceedings are public, they are known to the whole district, and were they unjust, their courts would soon be deserted, and their fees would be lost; the cause of this would soon be known to the superior court, and they would be dismissed from office. The collectors and magistrates can take up complaints against them; and as they have every facility in learning the conduct of the moonsiffs towards the inhabitants, it is impossible that abuse of authority in giving unjust decisions can long remain undiscovered. Suits under twenty rupees can hardly afford a bribe to corrupt the moonsiff, and it is very improbable that the trifle which could be given should ever, except in very rare cases, tempt him to sacrifice his place and all his prosperity in life. The district moonsiffs are disliked by the servants of the zillah courts, because they carry off much of their former business; and they are still more disliked by the tchisildars, because they exercise a new authority in the district superior to theirs, and occasionally summon them before them. It was therefore apprehended, that unless the moonsiffs were strongly supported and guarded from all unnecessary interference, as far as it could be safely done, they would meet with so much counteraction and opposition as would render them quite inefficient. It was with the view of giving them weight and character among the people that it was thought advisable to vest them with authority to decide without appeal suits under twenty rupees. This measure has answered the expectations entertained of it. The moonsiffs' courts have now acquired the confidence of the people, and are eagerly resorted to by them; but though they are now so firmly established as not to require the same support as at first, and though their authority might not be shaken by making suits not exceeding twenty rupees appealable, such a change would, I think, be highly inexpedient, as it would only tend to multiply business without any adequate advantage; and as it is impossible that the present exemption of petty suits from appeal could be materially abused by the moonsiffs without complaint and discovery, and as no such complaints have yet appeared, I am of opinion that the present system ought not to be disturbed. Should any evil be found to arise from it on future experience, Government has the remedy in its own hands, and ought then to apply it, but not before.

12. Among the evils supposed to have been occasioned by the consolidation of zillah courts* are the diseases and even loss of life to which prisoners are said to be exposed, by being sent from the hilly parts of Rajahmundry to the jail at Masulipatam. I regarded this statement at the time it was brought forward as undeserving of attention, and as being founded in prejudice in favour of a favourite medical station; and in want of due investigation, Government has often had cause to question the correctness of medical theories respecting the health of prisoners; they are often at variance with each other: a prison is said to be unhealthy because it is too little ventilated, or too low, or too much exposed; while, after all, the unhealthiness is merely casual, and originates in causes not known, and perhaps affects the habitations of the people and the barracks of the military as much as the prison. I doubt the authority both of the medical officer and the Foujdarry Adawlut, when they tell us that prisoners confined at Rajahmundry cannot be removed to the sea-coast without danger to their lives, more than those apprehended in the neighbouring districts. In every district under this presidency, except Tanjore and the Jagheer, there are unhealthy hilly tracts as well as in Rajahmundry, yet it has never been thought necessary to have particular prisons for the offenders from such tracts in these districts. The district of Rajahmundry is in general open: the population among the hills is very small. The great mass of the people, and Rajahmundry itself, are in the open country: Ganjam and Vizagapatam are both more hilly and unhealthy than Rajahmundry, and yet no objection has ever been made to bringing prisoners from the interior of these districts to the coast. The districts of Masulipatam are as unhealthy as those of Rajahmundry; they are mixed with each other. The hill inhabitants of the one are sent without hesitation to Masulipatam on the sea-shore; but the hill inhabitants of the other, it is said, can only, with safety to their lives, be sent to Rajahmundry. The real hill inhabitants, those who actually reside upon the hills, are very few, and they would probably suffer from confinement in any jail. But the people who fill our jails are those those of the plains and of the villages among the hills, and they are so much the same race that no line could possibly be drawn so as to distinguish which of them should, for the sake of health, be sent to one jail and which to another.

13. The Honourable Court have adverted* at considerable length, and with just severity, upon the conduct of the native police officers in extorting confessions from prisoners; and they specify some very atrocious cases, among which are the murder of a man by a peon, in endeavouring to extort confession; and the maiming of a prisoner of a potail, in torturing him for the same object; in both these cases, however, it is satisfactory to know that the offenders were convicted and punished, one capitally, and the other with two years' imprisonment and hard labour. The judge who reports, fears that cases of forced confession are too common, even among the officers of Government; but observes that the proof is difficult. When violence really takes place, the proof cannot be difficult; but I believe that in a great proportion of the cases where it is charged, none has been used. It is much more general in Malabar and Canara than in other zillahs; and the difference is probably owing to the people of Malabar and Canara still retaining much of the turbulent and vindictive character which they acquired while divided into petty states, and little restrained by any regular authority from exercising acts of outrage on each other.

14. It is no doubt too certain that many irregularities are used in obtaining confessions, and that in some instances atrocious acts are committed. But when we consider the great number of prisoners apprehended, and the habits of the people themselves, always accustomed to compulsion where there is suspicion, how difficult it is to eradicate such habits, and how small the proportion of cases in which violence has been used is to the whole mass, the number of these acts is hardly greater than was to be expected, and is every day diminishing. The prohibition against forced confessions is known to all the native police officers, and it seems extraordinary that they should ever employ force, for they know that they have much to lose, and nothing to gain by such conduct. But some of them, in spite of every injunction to the contrary, when they believe that a prisoner is guilty, think it right to extort confession. Police officers in general, however, will not gratuitously expose themselves to loss of place and their families to ruin by such conduct. Prisoners are sometimes hurt in attempting to escape; and notorious offenders are sometimes roughly treated by the villagers who assist in securing them. The marks thus caused are sometimes exhibited as evidence of extorted confession: wherever there is proof of force having been used for such a purpose, the police officers should be invariably punished and dismissed from the service. But great caution is necessary in believing the accusation of force. It should always be very clearly established before it is entitled to credit. Police matters are so public that the charge of violence when true can hardly be concealed. There are two things in which there is constantly very great exaggeration, the number of persons concerned in a robbery, and the number of extorted confessions; only a small part of the alleged cases of extorted confessions are ever substantiated. The circuit court say, that the proof is difficult; I believe that, when true, the proof is easy, and that the difficulty lies in by far the greater part being unfounded. The charge is easily made, and the effects of its receiving belief from the court of circuit is so generally known, that offenders very frequently bring it forward in some stage of the trial. It is a point which demands the greatest possible circumspection on the part of the magistrate. If he lets the prisoner escape who has been guilty of extorting confession, he encourages one of the worst offences against the administration of justice. If he punishes the police officer charged with this offence in only a very few instances on false evidence, he will effectually deter the whole body from the zealous exercise of their duty, and let loose a host of robbers upon the community. No number of zillah courts would prevent the excesses complained of among the native police. Were we to double the number, it would have no effect in restraining them. They can only be checked and effectually put down by the vigilance of the magistrates, by never letting them pass unpunished, by the police officers finding from experience that they never could gain any thing from the use of force, but that they certainly suffer disgrace and punishment, and by time working a change in their habits.

15. The

15. The irregularities committed by the police are now much more difficult of concealment than when the offices of zillah judge and magistrate were united in one person, confined to a fixed station; and though too many of the police officers are still frequently guilty of such irregularities, yet the conduct of the great body of them is highly useful and meritorious, and its effects are becoming every day more evident in the increasing tranquillity of the country, and the gradual diminution of organized bands of robbers. The amelioration, though occasionally retarded by the misconduct of local officers, continues to advance, and is gradually diminishing the number of crimes.

16. The cruelties reported* by the circuit judge to have been inflicted on certain inhabitants by the parbutti and holkars in Malabar were investigated by the collector, and found to be without proof. The observation quoted from the Report of the Board of Revenue as to "the rayets not being in that state of ease and security which the justice and liberality of the British Government mean to place them," was made by the Board, from perceiving that the courts could give no effectual security to the great mass of rayets, from the exaction of the village and district officers. The subject had frequently, during a long course of years, been brought to the notice of Government; and as it was manifest that the evil could only be remedied by empowering the collector to enforce the summary restitution of all such illegal exactions, Regulation c. IX. of 1822 was enacted for that purpose. It is not more courts that we want for the protection of the rayets from exactions, and of the inhabitants in general from theft and robbery, but more systematic experience, and consequently more aptitude among our local officers, both native and European, for the discharge of their several duties. I therefore entirely agree with the Honourable Court, that a system of training is as necessary in the judicial as in the revenue line, and that an intermediate class of functionaries, similar to that already established in the revenue, should be introduced into the judicial department. I have long thought that some of the senior registers should receive higher allowances and extended jurisdiction; but the appointment of assistant civil and criminal judges is a much better measure.

17. I think that five assistant judges will be sufficient for every object. Canara is the district in which an assistant judge is most wanted: the pressure there has frequently been the subject of deliberation at the Board, and of correspondence with the Sudder Adawlut. Next to Canara, the want of an assistant judge is greatest in Malabar; and after Malabar, the district which at present most requires help is Cuddapah. But I imagine that the pressure there is only temporary, that it has arisen in a great degree out of the disorders caused by the famine in 1823-24, and that it will soon cease. Salem, both from its great extent and population, ought to have an assistant judge, either at Coimbatore or any other convenient station. Masulipatam, for the same reason, should have an assistant judge; but I am not sure that it may not be advisable to transfer the zillah judge to Rajahmundry, and station the assistant at Masulipatam. The towns, both of Rajahmundry and Masulipatam, are situated on the extremity of their respective districts, but Rajahmundry is central to both.

18. I concur also with the Honourable Court, in thinking that the native judicial officers of the assistant judges should in the first instance be taken from the officers of the reduced zillah courts, as far as they may be properly qualified, and that the vacancies which may occur afterwards should be filled from the list of district moonsiffs, in order that we may have a gradation of native as well as of European officers; such a gradation is desirable in every department. It encourages good conduct, and secures to the public the services of zealous and experienced servants. It should, however, be understood that merit alone can entitle any individual to promotion.

19. Some advantages might result from carrying into effect the suggestions † of the Honourable Court, regarding the zillah judges holding alternate sessions at different places within the zillah; but I imagine that they would be at least counterbalanced by the inconveniences veniences which would attend the measure. The visiting and inspecting of the district moonsiffs by the zillah judge might be useful; but, on the other hand, the general progress of business would probably be retarded by his absence from the court station, by the time spent in travelling, and by the partial hinderance of the moonsiff's proceedings while engaged with him. The same object might perhaps be attained by his sending occasionally for such of the moonsiffs as most appeared to require instruction, and employing them for a time under his own eye at the court station. His travelling for the purpose of learning the state of the police and hearing complaints against it, and communicating his information to the magistrate and the provincial court, would do no good, and might often lead to inconvenient interference, by diverting his attention from the duties more properly his own to those which did not belong to him. It will be much safer to leave the supervision of the police to the magistrate and the court of circuit. Before coming, however, to any final resolution on the question of the zillah judge visiting the stations of the district moonsiffs, it may be advisable to refer it for the opinion of the judicial department.

20. The Honourable Court* are apprehensive that the allowing fees to the district moonsiffs "may have conduced rather to the quick despatch than to the satisfactory adjustment of the business before their courts;" and they observe that the number of suits appealed should be contrasted with the number appealable, before it can be proved that their proceedings are of a satisfactory character. We have not, as already stated, before us the documents required for making this comparison; but it is sufficiently evident, from the continued resort of the people to the courts of the district moonsiffs, that their decisions are in general satisfactory.

21. As the Honourable Court disapprove of the abolition of fees on suits under ten rupees, which was done with the view of leaving no inducement to the district moonsiffs to use any undue means for drawing such petty suits into their own courts, and as the abolition of the fees does not appear to have had any material effect in any way, it seems proper that they should be restored.

22. In order to encourage the district moonsiffs, not only to dispose of their business without delay, but also to weigh maturely the merits of each particular case, the Honourable Court recommend† that their payment by fees should be abolished, and that they should receive a salary somewhat higher than the average amount of their present salary and fees together, and that "no suit instituted in a district moonsiff's court should be subjected to a higher fee than two and a-half per cent., which reduction they expect will bring a large addition to business in the district moonsiff's court." I do not think that the reduction of the fee to two and a-half per cent. would increase the business in the district moonsiff's court, because I am convinced that all now goes there that would go, even if there were no fees. The business in these courts is more likely to diminish than to increase; some of the moonsiff's already complain of having too little business. It does not appear, therefore, to be necessary to give them a salary in place of fees, to enable them to weigh cases more maturely. Such a plan may be proper at a future period, but not for many years. It is not suited to the present habits and opinions of the people. The moonsiff system is both popular and efficient, far beyond every expectation that was formed of it, and is becoming more so every day. It is better not to disturb it, but to let it go on as at present, until it shall have acquired more firmness by time, by the improved judicial knowledge of the moonsiffs and the increased respect of the people. If the fee should have a tendency in some cases to stimulate the moonsiff to too hasty decision, it is to be recollected that this is checked by the fear of suitors not coming to his court. If his decisions were wrong, either from haste or any other cause, the people would soon discover it, and carry their suits to the zillah court if they could not be settled in the village. If the business were in any case actually too great for him to get through properly, the inconvenience could always be easily remedied by appointing an additional moonsiff. But, though I would not think it safe to shake the public confidence in the moonsiff system by so great an innovation as the substitution of salary for fees, I highly approve of the recommendation that the fee in the district moonsiff's court should not exceed two and a-half per cent. I think, however, that it would be more convenient to make the fee half an anna per rupee. The difference is trifling, and the calculation would be more easily understood by the poorer classes of the people. The charge of half an anna is so light, that it may be adopted for every sum cognizable by the district moonsiff. The decrease of receipt which will be occasioned by the lowering of the fee should be borne by Government, and it should in no way affect the income of the moonsiff, who should continue to receive, as at present, one anna per rupee.

† Paras. 48 and 50.

23. I am doubtful of the propriety of leaving to the district moonsiffs a discretion of admitting pauper cases into their courts, but the subject may be referred for the opinion of the judicial department.

24. The granting rewards to meritorious moonsiffs and to head police officers for exemplary discharge of their duty, as recommended by the Honourable Court,* will no doubt be productive of considerable public benefit, and ought therefore to be carried into effect. It does not appear to be necessary to attach higher allowances to certain districts in each zillah, in order to reward extraordinary merit in moonsiffs by appointing them to them. In almost every zillah there are at present one or two moonsiff districts in which the allowances from fees are considerably higher than in the rest, and to which the more meritorious moonsiffs may be nominated as vacancies occur. It is not so much an addition to the pay of the moonsiffs, as a higher class of native judicial officer, that we want. I have frequently thought that in each zillah one, or in some cases two, native judicial officers might be invested, not only with civil but criminal jurisdiction, and be placed over a large district, somewhat in the same manner as is now proposed with regard to assistant judges. Such an office would give great respectability to the native judicial department, and would encourage the exertion and secure the services of men of integrity and talent, and in the administration of justice. The subject, however, requires too much consideration to be hastily adopted, but I shall endeavour at some future time to submit to the Board some proposition regarding it.

25. The half-yearly statements of prisoners noticed by the Honourable Court† do not exhibit a diversity in the administration of the same laws, but merely an error in the mode of preparing the statements, which either the provincial court or the Sudder Adawlut might at any time have ordered to be corrected, but which seems to have escaped their attention, until it was pointed out to them by Government.

26. The Honourable Court are of opinion,‡ that as individuals who may have suffered wrong from the magistrates or the police, have no means of appeal against their proceedings during the periods when the judges of the provincial courts are not on circuit, that the judges of the provincial court should have the same authority as the judges on circuit now have, to receive and pass orders on petitions against the magistrate and police officers: that the magistrate should transmit monthly a statement of all petitions against the police officers to the provincial court, and that the control of all criminal and police proceedings of all the local authorities should be immediately in the hands of the judges of the provincial courts.§ I apprehend that the alterations here proposed would, if carried into effect, produce more harm than good. There is hardly any case, I believe, except that of vagrants or persons of bad character confined on suspicion, in which the interference of the provincial court could possibly afford any relief. In other cases, the term of imprisonment would have expired, and the prisoner been released, before the court could receive the petition, make the necessary inquiry, and communicate their orders to the magistrate. The release of vagrants and suspicious characters would with more advantage be left as it now is, to the magistrate and the judge. No possible benefit could in any case be derived from the interference of the provincial provincial court, which could compensate for the inconvenience which it would produce. The magistrate's own character, the reports of his conduct by the circuit judge and Feudatory Adawlut, and the danger of his being removed from his office by Government, are all securities against his committing any act of oppression in the interval between the departure and arrival of the circuit court. I am therefore of opinion that no change ought to be made, but that if any be made, it ought to be, not by giving any new power to the provincial court, but by authorizing the circuit judge to pass orders on petitions from every zillah within his range during the whole course of his circuit, without any reference to the particular zillah in which he may be at the time.

27. The control of the magistrates and of the police ought not, I think, to be in the hands of the provincial court. The proceedings of both are already sufficiently under check; and to multiply checks would only tend to embarrass the operations of the police, and to divert the provincial court from their proper business, without producing the smallest increase of real control. The magistrates are intrusted with the direction of the police: all charges against them are cognizable by the court of circuit, and, when necessary, are referred to the Sudder Adawlut and to Government. Government ought to reserve to itself, as much as possible, the immediate control of the magistrates. By delegating it to too many intermediate authorities, it becomes more circuitous and less efficient, and will augment rather than lessen the business of Government.

28. The Honourable Court appear to think that there is a restriction upon receiving complaints against the native heads of police.* I know of no such restriction. All persons who are punished or injured by the police officers are perfectly free to petition against them.

29. I have not hesitated, in the course of this Minute,† to avail myself of the permission of the Honourable Court to dissent from their opinions where I could not agree with them. The Court do not seem to be acquainted with the change that has taken place, and which is still going on, in the character of the people and the state of the country, from the operation of the courts, of a standing army, and of a strong government. They reason throughout their despatch as if the reduction of certain zillah courts had left such zillahs unprotected by law, instead of being, as they were when incorporated with other zillahs, from the effects of the moonsiff system, of the magistrate's increased jurisdiction, and of other causes, as much protected by the zillah court, and as completely under its control, as they were in their separate state when first established. It is unquestionably the duty of Government to establish all the judicial courts that may be necessary for the due distribution of justice; but it has also another duty, not to waste the resources of the country in useless and expensive establishments. The judicial establishments of this presidency were at one time on a scale of extravagance, far beyond that of any other country, or what the resources of any country could maintain. They have since been reduced at different times, and are now at a standard more proportionate to the wants of the people; and any temporary pressure which may arise will be easily relieved by the appointment of an assistant judge, without the necessity of any additional zillah court. In every country some districts must be far from the principal courts, because no country can afford to maintain the expense of judicial courts, merely because some individuals of such remote districts may otherwise have to travel an inconvenient distance once or twice in the course of their lives. Expensive establishments, when once sanctioned, are not easily put down. There is never any difficulty in finding plausible reasons to keep up a lucrative office; and if the office be judicial, the protection of the people can always be brought forward in defence of it. But the people would be much more solidly protected by abolishing the expensive establishment and remitting the amount in their assessment.

30. I shall now recapitulate the several points which I have in this Minute recommended for the approval of the Board.

1st. That assistant judges be appointed to certain districts, and that a Regulation be framed, defining their duties and relation to the zillah judge.

(Signed) THOMAS MUNRO.

MINUTE by J. H. D. OGILVIE, Esq.

In the despatch of the 11th April 1826, the Honourable Court have taken a review of the system of civil and criminal judicature under this presidency, and have expressed their apprehension, that the reduction which has been made in late years in the number of zillah courts has been productive of bad effects to the administration of justice, and the welfare and convenience of the people.

The observations recorded by the honourable president in reference to the Honourable Court's remarks, appear to me to be so conclusive, and so completely to embrace all points affecting the different questions under discussion, that I have little to add beyond my general concurrence in his views.

The appointment of assistant civil and criminal judges, besides ensuring a succession of experienced officers in the judicial line, will obviate any partial inconvenience that may have resulted from the present large extent of some of the districts, and will, in my opinion, render it unnecessary to restore any of the courts which have been abolished.

It appears to me that there is no ground for the fear expressed by the Honourable Court, of the civil authority granted to the village moonsiffs, so far as past experience enables us to judge; the evils they apprehend have certainly not been felt, and the danger of abuse will be daily less, as the general system becomes more organized and better understood.

In speaking of the district moonsiffs, the Honourable Court remark, that although "their jurisdiction extended to suits of the value of 200 rupees, the average amount of the suits instituted in the zillah courts scarcely exceeds 175 rupees; and they appear to infer from this circumstance, that the courts of these officers are not popular; but this assuredly is not the case. Their courts, so far from being deserted, which would be the natural result of such a feeling, are held in the highest estimation by the people. The number of suits disposed of by them in 1825 was 53,652, and the number of appeals from their decrees, 1,303. It is true, as observed by the Honourable Court, that a small proportion of appeals affords no conclusive test of the goodness of the original decisions, because many cases are not appealable at all, and many persons are unable to bear the expense of further litigation; but as all cases filed in the moonsiffs' courts might, at the option of the claimant, have been carried to the zillah courts, the very great number so filed is at least a proof that the institution is popular, and possesses the confidence of the community. I have endeavoured to obtain from the Sudder Adawlut a statement distinguishing the appealable suits from those under twenty rupees, but it has not been proved practicable to prepare it immediately. It will be observed, however, by the accompanying statement (A.), that of the suits actually brought under the review of the zillah judges in appeal from the district moonsiffs, the proportion of decrees affirmed is far greater than that of those reversed, and little less than the proportion of those affirmed by the provincial court in appeal from the zillah judges, as will be seen in Statement (B). This result could not but be considered satisfactory under any circumstances, but must be regarded as particularly so in the early stage of an institution which is likely to improve very materially as it becomes more organized, and the functionaries obtain more practical experience in the investigation and decision of intricate cases. It would be too much to expect that all the district moonsiffs should be equally able and efficient; but I have been assured by some of our best judicial officers, that there are many individuals among them whose decrees in general leave little to be desired, either in form or substance, and would do credit to many of our registers or even zillah judges.

I do not think there is at present any reason to alter the amount within which the decisions of these officers are final; there seems no cause to suppose the power vested in them has been abused; and it would be inexpedient, without some very powerful cause, to lower them in the eyes of the community by curtailing their authority.

For the same reason, I do not think it would be right to substitute a fixed salary for the fees they now receive; but I entirely concur in the proposition for reducing the fee to two and a-half per cent., and making up the difference to the moonsiffs from the public treasury.

It is suggested by the Honourable Court that the zillah judges should occasionally visit the different stations within their jurisdiction; inasmuch as such an arrangement would afford them better means than they now possess of forming a just opinion of the estimation in which the different moonsiffs are held among the people; it would certainly be advantageous, but I am fearful that any benefit likely to result would be counterbalanced by the interruption which it would necessarily occasion to business at the sudder station.

I am, however, of opinion that the proposition of the Honourable Court, of extending to the provincial court collectively the powers now vested in the court of circuit, might be useful. At present, cases sometimes arise in which the punishment is completed before the interference of the judge on circuit can be obtained; many examples might be adduced, but one will answer every purpose. A magistrate, for instance, requires security for keeping the peace—this may be proper, or otherwise; but in default of finding it, the man is committed to jail; security cannot always be found; and if it is improperly demanded, it is hard that a man should be kept in jail four or five months, without any means open to him of obtaining redress.

In the 29th paragraph of the Honourable Court's despatch, it is observed, "Although we are satisfied that considerable progress has been made by your Government in fixing and equalizing the rates of the public assessment, with a view of conferring upon the ryots a permanent interest in their lands; yet we are induced to draw your attention to the state of the people under the Madras presidency, as described by the Board of Revenue in their Proceedings dated 27th November 1820, in order that you may call upon the revenue authorities to show in what part of your territories the opinions of the Board can still be considered to apply. In that report the Board observe, that they are assured, not only from the reports from officers deputed to inquire into complaints in the provinces, but from other unquestionable sources of information, that the great body of the ryots is not in that state of ease and security in which the justice and policy of the British Government mean to place them." But it should be remembered, that the Report here referred to was written six years ago, when a great part of the country was under village rents, and that which had reverted to the hands of Government still remained to be reclaimed from the disorder into which it had been plunged by the officers of Government having been so long shut out from immediate intercourse with the ryots. The change which has since taken place in our revenue administration has altered most materially the relations between the officers of the Government and the great body of the people; and the constant intercourse which the revenue officers now keep up with the inhabitants, renders it impossible that the exactions and oppressions there alluded to can be exercised without discovery.

The good effects of the general system are already apparent in the increasing prosperity of the country, the gradual diminution of crime, and the security which the community process from the depredations of gangs of robbers; and I feel convinced that nothing is wanting to ensure the continuance of these blessings but a steady adherence to the system now in operation.

RESOLUTION.

The Honourable Court, after noticing the abolition of the zillah courts between February 1821 and March 1823, observe, that the local and superior judicial officers should have been required to report their opinion, before measures of such extreme importance were decided decided on. From this it may be inferred, that the Honourable Court believe the measure to have been hastily adopted; but such was not the case. It had been frequently discussed among the members of Government, who were unanimous in their opinion regarding its expediency. Had the members of Government been men of little experience, and unacquainted with the operation of the judicial system, it would undoubtedly have been thought necessary to make a reference to the judicial officers; but Mr. Stratton and Mr. Thackeray, the two civil members, were, from their general knowledge of the service and experience in the judicial line, at least as competent as any of the local officers to form a just opinion on the subject under consideration; and to have waited under such circumstances to collect opinions from every quarter would have been a mere waste of labour. There are some cases in which it is useful to have the opinion of every local officer. There are others in which that of only one or two of the most intelligent can be of the smallest use; and there are some in which none is necessary. The present was considered to be a case in which Government could have derived no aid from other opinions in forming its own, for it possessed in itself as extensive a knowledge of the localities of every district under this presidency, and of the character and customs of the inhabitants, as could have been obtained any where else; and as it had before it the periodical returns of the business done in the several courts, it was enabled, by observing what was done in some of the larger and more populous zillahs, to determine how far some of the smaller ones might be united, without detriment to the due administration of justice.

2. Moreover, on a question which so generally affected the interests of the judicial branch of the service, and so immediately those of the individuals in office, it would hardly have been reasonable to have expected an impartial opinion. These, like other men, must be supposed to be favourable to the branch of service to which they belong, and however conscientious they may be, liable to be influenced, without being sensible of it, by their wishes and their interests.

3. In the 9th paragraph of their despatch, the Honourable Court observe, that at different times petitions, deprecating the removal of the zillah courts, have been presented; such petitions are in general of little weight, they arise out of partial local interests, and prove nothing against the measure. In whatever town or village a zillah court is established, it is beneficial to the inhabitants, not only for the sake of justice, but because it adds to the value of their houses and other property, gives them additional employment, and a better market for their produce. The abolition of the court will of course be a loss to the inhabitants of that place and its neighbourhood, and produce petitions; and the same consequences would follow if the court were not reduced, but removed within the same zillah from a small town to a larger one, more conveniently situated for the population of the whole zillah; or even if, on removing the court, two courts instead of one were established in the same zillah, the inhabitants of the place from which the court had been removed would still complain. But when a court is abolished altogether, there is another class of persons interested in presenting petitions, namely, the discharged servants, who, by representing their own as the general feeling, hope to attract attention to the subject and to recover their former situations. Had the courts been originally three times as numerous as they were, the reduction of any one of them would have produced petitions. Government cannot act upon such representations, but must look to the wants of the whole country, and be guided by them in distributing the courts.

4. On the introduction of the judicial system, the courts were established at once, without any previous knowledge of the number that would be requisite. It was soon discovered that there were too many, and several were reduced. Longer experience showed that the business of some courts was much less than that of others, that the business of all had been considerably diminished by the operation of the Regulations of 1816 and subsequent enactments, and that a further reduction could be made without inconvenience and without imposing upon the courts more labour than they formerly had. It was upon this ground that the reductions from 1821 to 1823 were made, and it is to be regretted that any suggestion in the Minute proposing them should have led the Honourable Court to think that they were were connected with the establishment of sub-collectors. There was no connexion between the two measures. The sub-collectors would have been appointed had there been no courts to reduce, and the courts would have been reduced even if there had been no intention of appointing sub-collectors. But it was regarded as a satisfactory circumstance, that while the expense of one branch of the service was increased, that of another could be lessened without impairing its efficiency, and that the number of native servants thrown out of employment would thereby be reduced. If a comparison be drawn between Bengal and Madras, with respect to their relative extent of territory and amount of revenue, property, and population, and if the relief which the Madras zillah courts have derived from the Regulations of 1816 be taken into the account, it is believed that it will appear that Madras has as large a proportion of zillah courts as Bengal.

5. In paragraphs 11, 12, 13, and 14, of their despatch, the Honourable Court have quoted some reports of judicial officers, regarding the great distance which witnesses have sometimes to travel. A case is stated in Canara, in which some of the witnesses resided at the distance of two hundred, and others of two hundred and sixty miles from the zillah court. Mangalore, the court station, is about fifty miles from the southern extremity, and one hundred and sixty from the northern extremity of Canara, and about two hundred and ten from the most distant part of Sondah. There was a zillah court at Honower, which was abolished many years ago by a former government; and had the remaining court been then transferred from Mangalore to Cundapore or Busroor, where the collector's cutcherry was for some years, it would have been equally distant from the northern and southern points of Canara, and would have obviated, as far as regards distance, every material inconvenience which has been since experienced. Canara is a long narrow tract of country, not more than twenty or thirty miles in its average width; and Sondah, which is situated above the Ghauts, is almost an entire jungle, thinly peopled, and very unhealthy. In such districts, therefore, as Canara and Sondah, the partial evil of distance cannot be removed without giving to them more courts than the amount of their population and property requires. The pressure of business in Canara is much greater than in any other zillah, and has frequently engaged the attention of the Board; and though there is little doubt that it grew out of the misconduct of the court at a former period, yet it is clear that it can now be remedied only by the aid of an assistant judge. A case is brought forward, as one of great hardship, in Chicacole, where some rayets travelled three times from Aska and Gumsoor to the zillah court, making a distance of a thousand miles. These are evidently extreme cases which seldom happen. Gumsoor is a remote, unhealthy hill zemindary, over which our courts have a very imperfect authority.

6. These complaints are not peculiar to this country. In all countries we have the same or perhaps a greater aversion of prosecutors and witnesses to attend the courts and leave their homes and business, and the same complaints of distance and detention. In many of the old zillahs the court station was not central, but at one extremity of the district, like Masulipatam. It would be an useless multiplication of courts to attempt to bring every remote corner of a district within a limited distance of them. The people of India, both from habit and climate, attach much less importance to distance than we do. They travel at little expense, as they pay nothing on the journey for their accommodation. They would, no doubt, rather travel forty or fifty miles to a court than eighty or a hundred; but it is the leaving their homes, and the time they are to be absent from them and their business, which they think most of. A man who has to go fifty miles, knows that he can reach the court in two or three days; if a hundred, in as many more; but he can form no guess how long he will be detained there. It may be one, two, or three weeks, or as many months; and it is this which they chiefly complain of, and from which no increase of courts could afford more than a very trifling relief.

7. In paragraphs 16 and 17 of their despatch, it is observed by the Honourable Court, that as the average of suits instituted in the zillah courts did not exceed the value of 175 rupees, most of them might have been carried to the district moonsiffs, had the parties wished so. It is not easy to ascertain the motives which may have led to the preference. In some instances it may have been the belief that the cases would be better examined in the zillah court; in others it may have been the contrary; the character of the court and the case being a plain or intricate one, would often influence the suitor in his choice of a court. In many cases, recourse was no doubt had to the zillah judge, because the suitors resided in the town which was the station of the zillah court.

8. But besides these, there are many reasons, arising from the state of the law, which would prevent moonsiffs from trying suits, which, if the amount were the only restriction, would be properly cognizable by them. Moonsiffs are prohibited by Section xii. Regulation VI. 1816, from receiving suits on account of personal injuries or personal damages, which, amongst people given to litigation, are very numerous; and suits in which they or their relatives or dependents, or others employed in their cutcherries, may be parties, or in which a British subject, or an European foreigner, or an American, may be a party; and they are prohibited from receiving pauper suits. Clause 2, Section xiv. Regulation VI. 1816, requires that the Vakceels employed by the parties shall be either their relatives, servants, or dependants; and the difficulty which suitors experience in procuring persons of this description has been stated by the judge of Canara as a reason why many suits, otherwise cognizable by the moonsiff, are carried to the zillah court.

9. One thing however is clear, that as all causes coming before the district moonsiffs might have gone to the judge, and as so small a proportion of them did go, that the moonsiff's court is much more popular than the zillah court. It cannot be denied that the abolition of the zillah courts was attended with inconvenience from the loss of the services of the sudder ameens; but it was soon remedied by the appointment of additional moonsiffs.

10. In paragraph 20 of their despatch, the Honourable Court express their apprehension, that when, in consequence of the late reduction of the zillah courts, "access to justice becomes very difficult, crimes are winked at or compromised, prosecutions are prevented, information is suppressed, and acts of fraud and violence scarcely less terrible to the community in their commission than in their discovery, and its consequences must necessarily increase, although the Government may not be aware of the sufferings of the people." It is believed that there is no just cause for the apprehension here expressed. When at an earlier period several zillah courts were reduced, and Cuddapah and Bellary, each more extensive than any of the enlarged zillahs, were left with one zillah court each, no such apprehension was entertained, and no such consequences followed; and there is no reason to believe that they are more likely to follow in the recently enlarged zillahs. Crimes have not increased; they are gradually diminishing, and will continue to diminish. Neither is there any reason for the supposition that crimes can be prevalent without the knowledge of Government, or that the sufferings of the people can be concealed from it. There can hardly be any crime, and there can be no suffering of the people concealed from Government. The disposition of the natives to present petitions on all subjects of real or imaginary grievance is a sufficient security of itself against this state of things. There may be a very few exceptions in some of the hill zemindaries, where the authority of Government scarcely reaches. But in all other districts, the detailed nature of our internal administration, and the innumerable body of rayets who hold their lands immediately of Government, bring us into such universal and direct intercourse with the people, as to preclude the possibility of their sufferings being concealed from us.

11. It is remarked by the Honourable Court, in the 22d paragraph of their letter, that the village moonsiffs, estimated to amount to fifty thousand, are vested with much uncontrolled power, and are subject to great temptations, which too many of them are unable to resist; that the fear of prosecution in the zillah courts was an useful check upon them, and that the late reduction of courts will remove this check. This opinion is not supported by any experience we have yet had. The village moonsiffs are so far from abusing their power, that very few of them act at all. Their dread of being summoned on some false complaint to the zillah court is so great, that most of them avoid exercising the authority intrusted to them. This unwillingness was foreseen at the time the Regulation was passed, but the extent it has since been found to exist: Had they been left according to ancient usage, responsible in the first instance only to their tasildar, they would in general have discharged the duties of the petty jurisdiction assigned to them; but their fear of the court is so great, that only a small portion of the more intelligent venture to act at all. They are besides subject to a criminal prosecution before the magistrate for abuse of power, under the provision of Section iii. Regulation III. 1819. The abolition of the courts has not made them more confident, and it will yet be a very long time before they acquire confidence sufficient to enable them to become so useful in their subordinate station as they ought to be. The village moonsiffs are not appointed, as the Honourable Court suppose, entirely without selection. In all large villages there are several hereditary heads who are equally entitled to the office of moonsiffs; but the one most fit, and who appears most likely to give satisfaction to the people, is alone selected to discharge the duties.

Government,

12. It is stated very justly by the Honourable Court, in the 22d paragraph of their despatch, that in order to form a correct estimate of the merit due to the district moonsiffs, from the small proportion of appeals made from their decisions, we ought not to compare the number of appeals with the number of decisions, but with the number of suits appealable; and that if this were done, the result would be less favourable to the moonsiffs.

13. The propriety of making the comparison in the way pointed out by the Honourable Court had not escaped the notice of Government; and in a letter to the Sudder Adawlut, dated the 17th January 1826, the attention of that court was called to the subject. Still further to enable the Government to form an accurate opinion of the merits of the district moonsiffs, it is necessary that the number of appeals affirmed and reversed should be noted; for as appeals are frequently resorted to, merely to evade immediate payment of the sum adjudged, the number of appeals alone can furnish no certain information as to the correctness or otherwise of the moonsiffs' decrees; where the number affirmed is great, the result must be considered very favourable, and if deducted from the total number of appeals would leave a very satisfactory proof of the efficiency of the moonsiff's court.

14. It is also remarked, that many appeals are prevented by expense and other obstacles. But this surely is not peculiar to the moonsiff's more than to the zillah and provincial courts. Even if we take only the appealable suits, the proportion of appeals will still be so small as to be very creditable to the moonsiffs. The records of the Government office do not supply the information required, as they do not distinguish between the suits above and below twenty rupees; and it would take a considerable time to procure it from the provinces: it will suffice for the present purpose to exhibit the returns which have been obtained from two of the nearest zillahs, Combaconum and Cuddapah.

15. There is, it is believed, no sufficient foundation for the supposition that great abuses are practised by the district moonsiffs in the decision of suits under twenty rupees, from their their not being appealable. Their proceedings are public; they are known to the whole district; and were they unjust, their courts would soon be deserted, and their fees would be lost.

16. If the people had not confidence in them, they would carry all suits under ten rupees to the village moonsiffs, and thus reduce the field for abuse on the part of the district moonsiffs by one-half, by confining their unappealable suits to such as were between ten and twenty rupees, and those not for land. The cause of this would soon be known to the superior court, and the moonsiff would be dismissed from office. The collectors and magistrates can take up complaints against them; and as they have every facility in learning the conduct of the moonsiffs towards the inhabitants, it is impossible that abuse of authority in giving unjust decisions can long remain undiscovered. Suits under twenty rupees can hardly afford a bribe to corrupt the moonsiff, and it is very improbable that the trifle which could be given should ever, except in very rare cases, tempt him to sacrifice his place and all his prospects in life. The district moonsiffs are disliked by the servants of the zillah courts, because they carry off much of their former business; and they are still more disliked by the tasildars, because they exercise a new authority in the district superior to theirs, and occasionally summon them before them. It was therefore apprehended, that unless the moonsiffs were strongly supported and guarded from all unnecessary interference, as far as it could be safely done, they would meet with so much counteraction and opposition as would render them quite inefficient. It was with the view of giving them weight and character among the people that it was thought advisable to vest them with authority to decide without appeal suits under twenty rupees. This measure has answered the expectations entertained of it. The moonsiffs' courts have now acquired the confidence of the people, and are eagerly resorted to by them. But though they are now so firmly established as not to require the same support as at first, and though their authority might not be shaken by making suits not exceeding twenty rupees appealable, such a change would, it is believed, be highly inexpedient, as it would only tend to multiply business without any adequate advantage, and it is impossible that the present exemption of petty suits from appeal could be materially abused by the moonsiffs without complaint and discovery; and as no such complaints have yet appeared, the Board is of opinion that sufficient reason for disturbing the present system has not yet been shown. Should any evil be found to arise from it on future experience, Government has the remedy in its own hands, and ought then to apply it, but not before.

17. Among the evils supposed to have been occasioned by the consolidation of zillah courts and alluded to in the 25th paragraph of the Honourable Court's letter, are the diseases and even loss of life to which prisoners are said to be exposed by being sent from the hilly parts of Rajahmundry to the gaol at Masulipatam. This statement was regarded at the time it was brought forward as undeserving of attention, and as being founded in prejudice in favour of a favourite medical station; and in want of due investigation, Government has often had cause to question the correctness of medical theories respecting the health of prisoners; they are often at variance with each other. A prison is said to be unhealthy because it is too little ventilated, or too low, or too much exposed; while, after all, the unhealthiness is merely casual, and originates in causes not known, and perhaps affects the habitations of the people and the barracks of the military as much as the prison. The authority both of the medical officer and the Foujdarry Adawlut may be doubted, when they assert that prisoners confined at Rajahmundry cannot be removed to the sea-coast without danger to their lives, more than those apprehended in the neighbouring districts. In every district under this presidency, except Tanjore and the Jageer, there are unhealthy hilly tracts as well as in Rajahmundry; yet it has never been thought necessary to have particular prisons for the offenders from such tracts in these districts. The district of Rajahmundry is in general open: the population among the hills is very small. The great mass of the people in Rajahmundry itself are in the open country: Ganjam and Vizagapatam are both more hilly and unhealthy than Rajahmundry, and yet no objection has ever been made to bringing prisoners from the interior of these districts to the coast. The hill districts of Masulipatam are as unhealthy as the hills of Rajahmundry.

Rajahmundry; they are mixed with each other. The hill inhabitants of the one are sent without hesitation to Masulipatam on the sea-shore, but the hill inhabitants of the other, it is said, can only, with safety to their lives, be sent to Rajahmundry. The real hill inhabitants; those who actually reside upon the hills, are very few, and they would probably suffer from confinement in any gaol. But the people who fill the gaols are those of the plains and of the vallies among the hills, and they are so much the same race, that no line could possibly be drawn so as to distinguish which of them should for the sake of health be sent to one gaol and which to another.

18. The Honourable Court have animadverted, in paragraphs 26 to 29 of their despatch, at considerable length and with just severity upon the conduct of the native police officers, in extorting confessions from prisoners, and they specify some very atrocious cases; among which are the murder of a man by a peon in endeavouring to extort confession, and the maiming of a prisoner by a potail in torturing him for the same object. In both these cases, however, it is satisfactory to know that the offenders were convicted and punished, one capitally, and the other with two years' imprisonment and hard labour. The judge who reports, fears that cases of forced confession are too common, even among the officers of Government, but observes that the proof is difficult. When violence really takes place, the proof cannot be difficult, but it is believed that in a great proportion of the cases where it is charged, none has been used. It is much more general in Malabar and Canara than in other zillahs, and the difference is probably owing to the people of Malabar and Canara still retaining much of the turbulent and vindictive character which they acquired while divided into petty states, and little restrained by any regular authority from exercising acts of outrage on each other.

19. It is no doubt too certain that many irregularities are practised in obtaining confessions; and that in some instances atrocious acts are committed. But when the great number of prisoners apprehended is considered, and the habits of the people themselves, always accustomed to compulsion when there is suspicion, how difficult it is to eradicate such habits, and how small the proportion of cases in which violence has been used is to the whole mass, the number of these acts is hardly greater than was to be expected, and is every day diminishing. The prohibition against forced confessions is known to all the native police officers; and it seems extraordinary that they should ever employ force, for they know that they have much to lose and nothing to gain by such conduct. But some of them, in spite of every injunction to the contrary, when they believe that a prisoner is guilty, think it right to extort confession. Police officers in general, however, will not gratuitously expose themselves to loss of place and their families to ruin by such conduct. Prisoners are sometimes hurt in attempting to escape, and notorious offenders are sometimes roughly treated by the villagers who assist in securing them. The marks thus caused are sometimes exhibited as evidence of extorted confession. Whenever there is proof of force having been used for such a purpose, the police officer should be invariably punished, and dismissed from the service; but great caution is necessary in believing the accusation of force. It should always be very clearly established before it is entitled to credit. Police matters are so public, that the charge of violence, when true, can hardly be concealed. There are two things in which there is constantly very great exaggeration, the number of persons concerned in a robbery, and the number of extorted confessions; only a small part of the alleged cases of extorted confessions are ever substantiated. The circuit court say that the proof is difficult; but it is believed that, when true, the proof is easy, and that the difficulty lies in by far the greater part being unfounded. The charge is easily made, and the effect of its receiving belief from the court of circuit is so generally known, that offenders very frequently bring it forward in some stage of the trial. It is a point which demands the greatest possible circumspection on the part of the magistrate. If he lets the person escape who has been guilty of extorting confession, he encourages one of the worst offences against the administration of justice. If he punishes the police officer charged with this offence in only a very few instances on false evidence, he will equally deter the whole body from the zealous exercise of their duty, and let loose a host of robbers upon the community. No number of zillah courts would prevent the excess complained complained of among the native police; were we to double the number, it would have no effect in restraining them: they can only be checked and effectually put down by the vigilance of the magistrates; by never letting them pass unpunished; by the police officers finding from experience that they never could gain any thing from the use of force, but would certainly suffer disgrace and punishment; and by time working a change in their habits.

20. The irregularities committed by the police are now much more difficult of amendment than when the offices of zillah judge and magistrate were united in one person; confined to a fixed station; and though too many of the police officers are still frequently guilty of such irregularities, yet the conduct of the great body of them is highly useful and meritorious, and its effects are becoming every day more evident in the increasing tranquillity of the country, and the gradual diminution of organized bands of robbers. The amelioration, though occasionally retarded by the misconduct of local officers, continues to advance, and is gradually diminishing the number of crimes.

21. The cruelties reported by the circuit judge to have been inflicted on certain inhabitants by the parbutti and holkars in Malabar, referred to in the 23d and 24th paragraphs of the Honourable Court's letter, were investigated by the collector, and found to be without proof.

22. The observation quoted in the 29th paragraph of the Court's letter, from the report of the Board of Revenue, as to "the rayets not being in that state of ease and security which the justice and liberality of the British Government mean to place them," was made by the Board, from perceiving that the courts could give no effectual security to the great mass of rayets from the exactions of the village and district officers. The subject had frequently, during a long course of years, been brought to the notice of Government, and as it was manifest that the evil could only be remedied by empowering the collector to enforce the summary restitution of all such illegal exactions, Regulation IX. of 1822 was enacted for that purpose. It is not more courts that are wanted for the protection of the ryots from exactions, and of the inhabitants in general from theft and robbery, but more systematic experience, and consequently more aptitude among our local officers, both native and European, for the discharge of their several duties. The Board therefore entirely agrees with the Honourable Court, that a system of training is as necessary in the judicial as in the revenue line, and that an intermediate class of functionaries, similar to that already established in the revenue, should be introduced into the judicial department. It has long been thought, that some of the senior registers should receive higher allowances and extended jurisdiction, but the appointment of assistant civil and criminal judges is deemed a much better measure.

23. Under Regulation VII. 1809 and Regulation I. 1821, it would be competent to the Government, without any new enactment, either to appoint assistant judges with the powers conferred on those officers by the former of these Regulations, or to establish new zillah courts with the same powers as are exercised by the existing zillah courts; but in the former case, civil powers alone would be vested in the new tribunal, and those would be exercised under certain restrictions, and only at the station where the court is now held; and in the latter, the local jurisdiction would be more extensive, and the establishment on a larger scale than is considered expedient.

24. It therefore appears necessary that a new Regulation should be passed; which, while it will authorize the establishment of additional courts on a new footing, will leave it open to the Government also to appoint assistant judges with the powers declared in Regulation VII. 1809, whenever and wherever they may be required.

25. It is accordingly resolved, that assistant judges vested with the full civil and criminal powers of a zillah judge, but with certain limitations as to local jurisdiction, shall be appointed in those districts where their services are considered to be required, and that the order Adawlut be desired to frame and submit to Government, at their earliest convenience, the draft of a Regulation, containing provisions to the following effect:—

The Governor in Council to have power to establish, remove, and abolish courts whenever he may deem it expedient. The presiding officers to be called assistant judges and criminal judges.

The limits of the local jurisdiction of assistant judges and criminal judges to be determined by the Governor in Council, by an order in Council in the first instance; and to be liable to alteration by the same authority afterwards.

Assistant judges to exercise the same power in civil matters, within the limits allotted to his jurisdiction, as are now vested in a zillah judge.

Appeals from the decision of an assistant judge, in suits for property under the value of 1,000 rupees, to lie to the zillah court; in suits above that sum to the provincial court.

The zillah judge to be authorized to refer suits to the assistant judge, when the place in which the cause of action may have arisen may be situated on the borders of the assistant judge's jurisdiction, and may be so far distant from the zillah court as to render it a matter of great inconvenience to the parties and witnesses to attend at that station.

Native officers vested with the full powers of sudder ameens and so denominated, not being law officers, may be attached to the assistant judge's court; to be remunerated by a fixed salary and fees, or in such other manner as the Governor in Council may direct.

Exposition of points of law arising in matters before the assistant judge and sudder ameens, to be obtained from the law officers of the zillah courts.

Assistant criminal judges to have the same powers in every respect as criminal judges.

The Governor in Council to determine from time to time, whether there shall be a general gaol delivery for the whole zillah at one station only, or a separate one at each of the court stations.

26. It is believed that the foregoing are the only provisions which it will be necessary to enact in order to give effect to the proposed arrangement; but if there should be others which have been overlooked, the Sudder Adawlut will be desired to insert them in the draft of the proposed regulation: but the object of that court should be to reserve for a letter of instructions every point which is not indispensably necessary to form part of a legislative enactment.

27. It is resolved that assistant judges shall be appointed in the districts now forming the jurisdiction of the zillah courts of Canara, Malabar, Cuddapah, Madura, Salem, and Masulipatam; and in order that the operation of the new courts may not be unnecessarily delayed after the Regulation which the Sudder Adawlut will be required to prepare shall have been enacted, the judges in the three first of the zillahs above mentioned, in communication with the collectors and magistrates, and in the three latter, in communication with the collectors and magistrates of Tinnevely, Coimbatore, and Rajahmundry respectively, will in the mean time be desired to select such portion, varying from one-third to one-fourth, of the present entire jurisdiction, as may be considered proper to form the jurisdiction of the assistant judge; the selection should be regulated with reference to the extent of population, to the means of providing accommodation for the court by making over to it any suitable public buildings which may now be unoccupied, or may be rendered available for the purpose, and the station should be as far distant from that of the zillah judge, and as central in regard to the jurisdiction of the assistant judge, as the above considerations will admit.

28. The several judges above mentioned, in reporting for the information and orders of Government the station and limits of the jurisdiction selected, will at the same time submit a list of the establishments required for the assistant judge's court. In that establishment it will not be necessary to include a Hindoo or Mahomedan law officer; and it is presumed that, that, generally, a much smaller establishment than is allowed to a zillah court will be sufficient for that of the assistant judge.

29. The Board consider it very desirable, that the native officers of the assistant judges' courts should in the first instance be taken from the officers of the reduced zillah courts, as far as they may be found properly qualified, and instructions to this effect will be issued when the number of persons to be entertained on each establishment shall be determined.

30. The Board is of opinion, that the salary of the assistant judge should be 1,400 rupees per mensem, which is about the sum received by a sub-collector, including fixed and extra tent allowance; this is nearly as much above the salary of a register to a provincial court as it is below that of a zillah judge, and is the same as was allowed to an assistant judge under Regulation VII. 1809.

31. The Honourable Court are of opinion that vacancies which occur in the establishments of the assistant judges should be filled up from the list of district moonsiffs, in order that there may be a gradation of native as well as European officers; such gradation is very desirable in every department, as it encourages good conduct and secures to the public the services of zealous and experienced servants; but as the pay of the servants in a zillah court, with one or two exceptions, is generally far below that of a district moonsiff, there would be some difficulty in giving effect to the arrangement proposed by the Honourable Court. The duties required of persons holding situations in a zillah court are moreover such as cannot be learned by previous service as a district moonsiff; while, on the other hand, the habits of business acquired in a zillah court, and the means afforded of observing the mode in which the proceedings are conducted and justice administered, and of acquiring a knowledge of the Regulations, could not fail to be of use to a district moonsiff. It therefore appears desirable that the district moonsiffs should be selected from the most intelligent and industrious of the court servants, rather than the opposite course should be observed. The labours of the court are so much diminished by efficient moonsiffs, and so much increased when the office is filled by persons not properly qualified for it, that it would perhaps be better to leave the selection to the judges, without confining their choice to any particular class of people.

Their attention, however, will be drawn, on a suitable occasion, to the advantage of securing a regular succession of persons duly qualified for the office.

32. Some advantages might result from carrying into effect the suggestions contained in paragraphs 38 to 41 of the Honourable Court's letter, regarding the zillah judges holding alternate sessions at different places within the zillah; but it is apprehended that they would be at least counterbalanced by the inconvenience which would attend the measure. The visiting and inspecting of the district moonsiffs by the zillah judge might be useful; but, on the other hand, the general progress of business would probably be retarded by his absence from the court station, by the time spent in travelling, and by the partial hinderance of the moonsiff's proceedings while engaged with him. The same object might perhaps be attained by his sending occasionally for such of the moonsiffs as most appeared to require instruction, and employing them for a time under his own eye at the court station. His travelling for the purpose of learning the state of the police, and hearing complaints against it, and communicating his information to the magistrate and the provincial court, would do no good, and might often lead to inconvenient interference, by diverting his attention from the duties more properly his own to those which did not belong to him. It will be much safer to leave the supervision of the police to the magistrate and the court of circuit.

33. Before coming, however, to any final resolution on the question of the zillah judges visiting the stations of the district moonsiffs, it may be advisable to refer it to the opinion of the Sudder Adawlut, with an extract from paragraph 38 of the Honourable Court's letter.

34. The Honourable Court are apprehensive, that the allowing fees to the district moonsiffs "may have conducted rather to the quick dispatch than to the satisfactory adjustment of the business before their courts;" and they observe, that the number of suits appointed should should be contrasted with the number appealable, before it can be proved that their proceedings are of a satisfactory character. The Board has not before it, as already stated, the documents required for making this comparison; but it is sufficiently evident, from the continued resort of the people to the courts of the district moonsiff, that their decisions are in general satisfactory.

The Honourable Court have suggested several modifications in the rules which now regulate the proceedings in the courts of the district moonsiffs, many of which appear to be well calculated to improve the system, and ought therefore, in the opinion of the Board, to be adopted.

36. Section v. Regulation II. 1821, which directs that district moonsiffs shall not receive fees on suits for sums not exceeding ten rupees, was enacted, because it was supposed that the district moonsiffs, in order to obtain the fees, drew to their courts many of the petty suits which it was intended should be tried and determined by the village moonsiffs; the object of the Regulation was rather to induce suitors, in trivial causes, to resort to the village moonsiffs, than to withhold from the district moonsiffs the remuneration to which they would be entitled in cases which parties of their own accord, and from preference, brought to their courts. Experience has shewn that the abolition of the fee has not had the effect of throwing into the hands of the village moonsiffs more causes than were formerly brought before them; but, on the contrary, there appears reason to suppose that it may have operated as an additional inducement to bring causes under ten rupees to the courts of the district moonsiffs; for litigation in such cases not being attended with any expense in either court, suitors would naturally give the preference to that of the district moonsiff, whose superior qualifications afford a better prospect of obtaining a just decision, and whose judgment is less likely to be biased by local and party interests, than that of the village moonsiff. Moreover, as district moonsiffs are not authorized to refuse to receive and try suits under ten rupees when brought before them, it appears reasonable that they should receive the same remuneration for the trouble which is imposed upon them in these as well as other cases. It is resolved, therefore, that Section v. Regulation II. 1821, be rescinded.

37. In order to encourage the district moonsiffs, not only to dispose of their business without delay, but also to weigh maturely the merits of each particular case, the Honourable Court recommend that their payment by fees should be abolished, and that they should receive a salary somewhat higher than the average amount of their present salary and fees together; and that no suit instituted in a district moonsiff's court should be subjected to a higher fee than two and a-half per cent., which reduction they expect will bring a large addition of business into the district moonsiff's court.

38. The Board does not think that the reduction of the fee to two and a-half per cent. would increase the business in the district moonsiff's court, because it is satisfied that all now goes there that would go even if there were no fees. The business in these courts is more likely to diminish than to increase; some of the moonsiffs already complain of having too little business. It does not appear therefore to be necessary to give them a salary in place of fees, to enable them to weigh cases more maturely; such a plan may be proper at a future period, but not for many years. It is not suited to the present habits and opinions of the people. The moonsiff system is both popular and efficient, far beyond every expectation that was formed of it, and is becoming more so every day. It is therefore better not to disturb it, but to let it go on as at present, until it shall have acquired more firmness by time, by the improved judicial knowledge of the moonsiffs, and the increased respect of the people.

39. If the fee should have a tendency in some cases to stimulate the moonsiff to too hasty decision, it is to be recollected that this is checked by the fear of suitors not coming to his court. If his decisions were wrong, either from haste or any other cause, the people would soon discover it, and carry their suits to the zillah court if they could not be settled in the village. If the business were in any case actually too great for him to get through properly, properly, this inconvenience could always be easily remedied by appointing an additional moonsiff. For these reasons, the Board think that it would not be expedient to adopt the measure of granting a fixed salary in lieu of fees; and is of opinion that the system should, for the present at least, remain in this respect undisturbed. But though the Board do not think it safe to shake the public confidence in the moonsiff system by so great an innovation as the substitution of salary for fee, it highly approves of the recommendation that the fee in the district moonsiff's court should not exceed two and a-half per cent. The Board think, however, it would be more convenient to make the fee half an anna per rupee. The difference is trifling, and the calculation would be more easily understood by the poorer classes of the people. The charge of half an anna is so light, that it may be adopted for every sum cognizable by the district moonsiff. The decrease of receipt which will be occasioned by the lowering of the fee should be borne by Government; and it should in no way affect the income of the moonsiff, who should continue to receive, as at present, one anna per rupee.

40. It is resolved, therefore, to direct the Sudder Adawlut to provide by a legislative enactment, that the fee to be levied from the plaintiff, in suits preferred to district moonsiffs in the first instance, shall in future be half an anna in the rupee on the amount or value of the property in dispute, instead of one anna in the rupee, as prescribed in clause first, Section xvi. Regulation VI. 1816; but that the district moonsiffs shall continue to receive the full compensation, at the rate of one anna in the rupee, on the decision of suits upon the merits, or upon their adjustment by razeenamahs of the parties, as allowed by Clause first, Section lix. of the Regulation in question. It is presumed that the institution fees carried to the account of Government, on suits dismissed for default, &c. will afford ample funds to meet this disbursement; but to obviate confusion, the Sudder Adawlut will be instructed to submit their sentiments as to the mode in which the payment should be made, which will afterwards be sufficiently provided for by a letter of instruction to the courts. All that will be required, therefore, to be introduced into the new Regulation will be the modification of Clause first, Section xvi. and Clause first, Section lix. Regulation VI. 1816, as to the amount of the institution fee above proposed, with a provision that the moonsiff shall receive the full compensation, when due, from the judge.

41. It appears that the present will be a convenient opportunity to rescind so much of Clause first, Section v. Regulation VI. 1816, as declares that the local jurisdictions of district moonsiffs shall be so arranged as to include one or more whole tehsildars, a provision for which was contained in the draft of a Regulation submitted with the letter from the Sudder Adawlut, under date the 22d December last. The enactment of the other provision of that draft, for rescinding so much of Section vi. Regulation VI. 1816, as restricts the office of district moonsiff to persons of the Hindoo or Mahomedan persuasion, does not appear to be immediately required.

42. If the provisions of Clause first, Section lxii. Regulation VI. 1816, are understood to authorize the district moonsiffs to transmit directly to the law officers of the zillah court written abstracts of the cases on which they require an exposition of the law, and to receive that exposition in the same way, the Governor in Council is of opinion that the law should be altered, and that all communications between district moonsiffs and the law officers of the zillah court should be required to be made through the zillah judge. This will prevent collusion between the moonsiffs and the law officers; will enable the judge to know what questions are proposed, and how they are answered; and will also afford him the means of ascertaining whether consistent expositions of the law are given on the same points, at different times and to different moonsiffs. The propriety of this mode of proceeding is so obvious, that it is understood to be universally adopted; but it appears proper that the latitude which the section in question seems to imply, in respect to direct communication, should be taken away; and that it should be optional with the judge, either to refer the points to his own law officers, or to those of any other zillah. Unless this option be given to the judge, it is obvious that the remedy for an erroneous exposition of the law to the moonsiff would not be found in an appeal to the zillah judge, to whom the same exposition would would of course be given by the same law officer. For similar reasons, in regard to points arising in cases tried by himself in the first instance, and appealable to the provincial court, it seems desirable that Clause first, Section xvi., Regulation III. A. D. 1802, should be so modified as to admit of a zillah judge referring cases for the opinion of the law officers of the other zillah courts, as well as to those of the "Supreme Courts;" and also to two at least whenever the importance of the subject, or other cause, may render such a measure desirable.

43. The Board entertains doubt as to the propriety of leaving to the district moonsiff a discretion of admitting pauper cases in their courts, but resolves to refer the subject for the opinion of the Sudder Adawlut.

44. The granting rewards to meritorious moonsiffs and to head police officers for exemplary discharge of their duty, will no doubt be productive of considerable public benefit, and ought therefore to be carried into effect. It does not appear to be necessary to attach higher allowances to certain districts in each zillah, in order to reward extraordinary merit in moonsiffs by appointing them to them. In almost every zillah there are at present one or two moonsiff districts in which the allowances from fees are considerably higher than in the rest, and to which the more meritorious may be nominated as vacancies occur. The means, moreover, of rewarding the most deserving moonsiffs will in some degree be afforded by the proposed appointment of sudder ameens, not being law officers, to the courts of the assistant judges, as they will receive higher pay than the district moonsiffs; and from having a more extended jurisdiction will derive larger emoluments from fees. The Sudder Adawlut will, however, be desired to submit any suggestions which may occur to them, as to the best mode of rewarding meritorious moonsiffs and heads of police.

45. The half-yearly statements of prisoners noticed by the Honourable Court in the 52d paragraph of their letter do not exhibit a diversity in the administration of the same laws, but merely an error in the mode of preparing the statements, which either the provincial court or the Sudder Adawlut might at any time have ordered to be corrected, but which seems to have escaped their attention until it was pointed out to them by Government.

46. The Honourable Court are of opinion,* that as individuals, who may have suffered wrong from the magistrates or the police, have no means of appeal against their proceedings during the periods when the judges of the provincial courts are not on circuit, that the judges of the provincial courts should have the same authority as the judges on circuit now have, to receive and pass orders on petitions against the magistrate and police officers; that the magistrate should transmit monthly a statement of all petitions against the police officers to the provincial court, and that the control of all the criminal and police proceedings of all the local authorities should be immediately in the hands of the judges of the provincial courts.

47. In the opinion of the Board, the control of the magistrates and of the police ought not to be in the hands of the provincial court. The proceedings of both are already sufficiently under check, and to multiply checks would only tend to embarrass the operations of the police, and to direct the provincial court from their proper business, without producing the smallest increase of real control. The magistrates are intrusted with the direction of the police; all charges against them are cognizable by the court of circuit, and when necessary, are referred to the Foujdarry Adawlut and to Government. Government ought to reserve to itself, as much as possible, the immediate control of the magistrates. By delegating to too many intermediate authorities, it becomes more circuitous and less efficient, and will augment rather than lessen the business of Government.

48. The Board is strongly impressed with the conviction, that the superintendence of the police, involving the peace and good order of the country, ought not to be exercised on judicial principles, with all the forms and technicalities which they necessarily entail, and with their inaptitude to such a purpose; but upon the principles of civil government, leaving as is at present left, redress of actual wrongs to be obtained by due course of law; but the correction of errors and the remedy of inconveniences to proceed from the executive administration, or those to whom its authority may be delegated, upon an enlarged and unfettered consideration of the welfare of the community.

49. It is only in the case of imprisonment that the interference of any superior could be immediately necessary or beneficial to the party aggrieved; but the term for which magistrates are empowered to adjudge imprisonment is so short, that before the complaint could be conveyed to the provincial court; an explanation called for from the magistrate, his reply received, and final orders passed by the provincial court, the sentence will, in most cases, have been fulfilled, and redress can then be as substantially afforded by the judge on circuit a few weeks after, as by the provincial court collectively at the time; besides, if persons, considering themselves aggrieved, were at liberty to complain to the provincial court collectively, as well as to the judge on circuit, it would frequently happen that after an unsuccessful application to the latter, the party would, before the return of the circuit judge to the station of the provincial court, prefer his complaint to the former, and inconsistent orders might be passed; or in the absence of the circuit judge, unnecessary references made to the magistrate on matters which a competent authority had already decided. The power of control must, therefore, be vested either in the judge on circuit, or in the provincial court collectively, not in both; and it is the opinion of the Board that it is best in the hands of the judge on circuit, as the authority to whom parties aggrieved can apply with least inconvenience to themselves and witnesses. The most salutary control, however, exists in the responsibility of the magistrate to Government, and in the powerful motives by which he is stimulated to act for the public advantage.

50. The Honourable Court appear to think, that there is a restriction upon receiving complaints against the native heads of police; but Government is not aware of any such restriction; all persons who are punished or injured by the police officers are perfectly free to petition against them.

51. The sentiments expressed in the President's Minute, being entirely in accordance with those of the other members of the Government, have been unanimously adopted by the Board; and in the course of these proceedings, it has not hesitated to avail itself of the permission of the Honourable Court to dissent from their opinions where it could not agree with them. The Honourable Court do not seem to be acquainted with the change which has taken place, and which is still going on in the character of the people and the state of the country, from the operation of the courts, of a standing army and of a strong Government; they reason throughout their despatch as if the reduction of certain zillah courts had left such zillahs unprotected by law, instead of being, as they were, when incorporated with other zillahs, from the effects of the moonsiff system, of the magistrate's increased jurisdiction, and of other causes, as much protected by the zillah court, and as completely under its control, as they were in their separate state when first established. It is unquestionably the duty of Government to establish all the judicial courts that may be necessary for the due distribution of justice; and it has also another duty, not to waste the resources of the country in useless and expensive establishments. The judicial establishments of this presidency were at one time on a scale of extravagance far beyond that of any other country, or what the resources of any country could maintain. They have since been reduced at different times, and are now at a standard more proportionate to the wants of the people; and any temporary pressure which may arise will easily be relieved by the appointment of an assistant judge, without the necessity of any additional zillah court. In every country some districts must be far from the principal courts, because no country can afford to maintain expensive judicial courts, merely because some individuals of such remote districts may otherwise have to travel an inconvenient distance once or twice in the course of their lives. Expensive establishments, when once sanctioned, are not easily put down. There is never any difficulty in finding plausible reasons to keep up a lucrative office, and if the office be judicial, the protection of the people can always be brought forward in defence of it. But the people would be much more solidly protected by abolishing the expensive establishment, and remitting the amount in their assessment.

52. In the 58th paragraph of their despatch, the Honourable Court observe, that Regulation I. 1821, which empowers the Governor in Council to establish or abolish courts by an Order in Council, without making a Regulation for the purpose, was passed without any discussion on the subject being placed on record, and appear to object to the establishment or abolition of courts otherwise than by a formal Regulation, on the ground of the impolicy of the functions of those tribunals, and the provisions of Regulation I. 1802, and of the Act Geo. III. c. 142, s. 8. The Board observes, that whether the discussions on such subjects be placed on record, and whether the grounds of the proceeding be detailed in the preamble of a Regulation or not, the measures are not less the result of mature deliberation among the members of the Government, than if the records of the office were burthened, and the preamble of a Regulation filled with details on points on which there is no dissenting voice in the Council. No court is ever established or abolished without a thorough conviction of the necessity or expediency of the measure; and where, upon such conviction, the establishment or abolition of a court has been determined on, the distribution of justice to the country would be improperly deferred in the one case, and an unnecessary expense incurred in the other, by waiting until all the official routine and references which precede the enactment of a formal Regulation have been gone through; and the code, already inconveniently bulky, would be rendered more so by an addition of matter which can in no wise be made the subject of judicial cognizance, and cannot affect the principles on which justice is administered.

53. With regard to the preamble of Regulation I. 1821, in which it is considered by the Honourable Court that sufficient reasons for passing the Regulation have not been stated, the Board observe that it is therein declared, that the powers which it vests in the Governor in Council are granted "for the sake of public economy, the convenience of the people, and for facilitating the distribution of justice;" these reasons were thus concisely stated, because it was considered that they were of such force and weight in themselves as to render detailed discussion unnecessary, and because it is always desirable that a legislative enactment should be as clear and concise as possible.

54. As the subject of modifying certain parts of the Regulations is now under consideration, it is resolved to notice a few further provisions which require to be rescinded, although not connected with the rules respecting district moonsiffs, which have formed the subject of a former part of these proceedings.

55. The first provisions which require to be removed from the code are those contained in Section xv. Regulation IV., and Section xiii. Regulation V. 1802, which authorized the Sudder Adawlut to suspend from office judges of the zillah and provincial courts in certain cases. It is not properly a provision of law, but an act of Government, to suspend a judge; and such matters should be entirely excluded from the Regulations. For a similar reason, Section xxxiv. Regulation I. 1803, which gives to the Board of Revenue the power to summon the collectors and their assistants to the presidency, to fine and to suspend them from office, should also be rescinded.

56. The power vested in the courts of circuit by Section xxviii. Regulation VII. 1802, to order corporal punishment to be inflicted for contempt of court, appears to be very objectionable. It is believed that throughout the code of Regulations, corporal punishment is confined to offences against the persons, property, or morals of the people; and the proper punishment for contempt of court appears to be fine or imprisonment. Considering how vague the meaning of the term is, and that it rests solely with the offended party to determine what shall be deemed contempt of court, it seems very desirable that Section xxviii. Regulation VII. 1802, should be rescinded and a provision substituted, authorizing the court to adjudge a fine or imprisonment for a definite period. Section xxii. Regulation III. 1802, which gives to a zillah court power to punish contempt of court and other offences against itself, by a fine not exceeding 200 rupees, or confinement until the fine shall be paid, should be modified in regard to the latter provision, and imprisonment for a definite period substituted. The persons most likely to be guilty of contempt of court are such as in all probability probability would not have the means of paying a fine of 200 rupees, and imprisonment for life might be the consequence.

57. Section ii. Regulation I. 1819, rescinds Section ix. Regulation XXVI. 1802, and declares that zemindaries may be divided into portions charged with a proportion of the permanent land-tax less than 500 pagodas per annum; but Section x. Regulation XXV. 1802, containing an opposite provision, remains unrescinded. This is understood to be an error of inadvertence, and should be rectified by rescinding the section last referred to.

58. The Sudder Adawlut will be instructed to take a suitable opportunity to introduce the proposed modifications into the Code of Regulations.

APPOINTMENT of COMMISSIONERS of REVENUE and CIRCUIT.

COPY of a LETTER, in the Revenue Department, from the Bengal Government to the Court of Directors, dated 10th December 1828; with its Enclosures.

No. 3.

Letter from the Bengal
Government,
10th Dec. 1828.

Honourable Sirs :

1. HAVING seen reason to conclude that the system in operation for the superintendence and control of the executive Revenue authorities is seriously defective (your Honourable Court appear to have come to the same conclusion), we have considered it to be our duty to enter on a full consideration of the means by which a suitable remedy may be applied. And after deliberate reflection and much discussion, we have satisfied ourselves that for the attainment of the objects which your Honourable Court and the local government have with equal anxiety laboured to accomplish, it is indispensably necessary to employ a considerable number of revenue commissioners, vested with a controlling authority, each over a moderate tract of country, and acting intermediately between the collectors of districts and a general Board stationed at the presidency.

2. While this matter engaged our attention in the Revenue department, we found in the communications of the Sudder Adawlut, and in the reports of the state of business in the several courts of civil and criminal judicature, not less occasion to infer, that in the Judicial department also some change was essentially necessary, in order to secure an adequate supervision of the executive officers and the due administration of justice. And as the first step to the desired reform, it has appeared to us to be advisable to employ the same agency by which the revenue district officers are to be controlled and directed in superintending the police and administering criminal justice under the authority of the Nizam Adawlut. This we propose to effect by vesting the above-mentioned commissioners with the powers that belong to the courts of circuit.

3. We are thus able to provide, with some reduction of expense, such a number of commissioners of revenue and circuit as to secure that each may, without difficulty, superintend efficiently the affairs of the districts placed under him, even in quarters where circumstances call for the most minute interference, and at the same time hold the half-yearly sessions with regularity which justice and policy equally require. And after the maturest reflection, we cannot perceive that, even on the strictest principles of those who advocate the system established by the code of 1793, such an union of powers in the authority appointed to control the executive officers is liable to any serious objection. It is certainly, we conceive, calculated to secure many important advantages.

4. In regard to the powers exercised by the officers in charge of districts, we do not propose any immediate change. The executive functions in the different departments will remain therefore as heretofore, separate where hitherto disjoined, and united where hitherto held together. And beyond the unquestionable improvement of separating the criminal and civil jurisdiction of the provincial courts, which is the immediate consequence of the appointment of commissioners of circuit, we have not made any alteration in the tribunals appointed to administer civil justice, excepting in the case of a few districts in which vicinity to tracts of country superintended by officers possessing full revenue and judicial powers, and other circumstances, have suggested the extension, with some modification, of the plan that has been so long successfully followed in Cuttack.

5. We have abolished the offices of superintendents of police as no longer likely to be useful, in a degree commensurate with the expense.

6. The revision of the public sales, by which numerous land-owners in many of the districts of the conquered and ceded provinces have suffered much injury, is to be prosecuted by the revenue commissioners with the agency of the collectors or other subordinate revenue officers. And the special commission appointed under the rules of Regulation I. 1821, the operations of which have as yet been confined to Cawnpore and Allahabad, will therefore be superseded. The work of redress being carried on along with the settlement now in progress under Regulation VII. 1822, will, we trust, proceed more rapidly and at a less charge to Government. The subsidiary arrangements requisite for the adjustment of the various claims which have to be inquired into and settled, after the original wrong has been redressed, will, we doubt not, be more successfully effected; and it seems to be certain, that by a detailed settlement, several of the districts may be made to yield no inconsiderable addition to the public rental, with great relief to the bulk of the community, and a full recognition of all private rights.

7. We have at the same time made provision in those quarters in which the necessity of the measure is most urgent, for the prompt investigation and decision of cases wherein the revenue of Government is alleged to be appropriated by individuals without a valid title; employing for the purpose three able and experienced judicial officers as commissioners, under the rules of Third Regulation of the present year. Those officers will have no concern in the management of the revenues, and are to be relieved from any other judicial duties than those which attach to them under the above-mentioned law, to the execution of which therefore they will be entirely devoted.

8. Among the advantages of the plan, your Honourable Court will observe, that it includes a provision for the superintendence and control of the officers employed in Arracan, of which, as you will perceive from the proceedings noted in the margin,* the revenue administration has hitherto been far from satisfactory to us, and in regard to which province, we are still deplorably in want of the information necessary to a clear judgment. The same officer officer who is to perform that duty will likewise have the superintendence of Chittagong, and the adjacent country to the east of the Megna, where much remains to be done for the satisfactory adjustment of the rights of Government and of the people; to the accomplishment of which, hitherto postponed from year to year without any definite prospect of completion, the presence of the commissioner will, we trust, essentially contribute.

9. Mr. Scott, an officer of great experience and distinguished abilities, to whom the general administration of Assam and the management of the rude tribes who inhabit the hill country in our north-east frontier has for some years been confided, we propose to vest with the powers of a judicial and revenue commissioner in the district of Sylhet and a portion of Rungpore, where his services are likely to be productive of much public benefit.

10. We have likewise provided for the superintendence of the revenue and judicial offices of the Delhi territory, by a commissioner acting under the authority of the resident, whose other avocations do not allow of his going the circuit with the regularity that is desirable, nor of entering sufficiently into the details of the settlements and other proceedings of the principal assistants. Relieved from these duties, the resident will be able to assume the general superintendence of some of the districts of the Doab in the immediate vicinity of Dehlee; an arrangement from which we anticipate much advantage.

11. For a full explanation of the grounds on which we have resolved to adopt the above arrangement, we beg permission to refer your Honourable Court to the several minutes and other papers noted in the margin.* It must be superfluous to repeat in this place the statements and observations contained in them. In so far indeed as concerns the Revenue department, the plan we have adopted will be found to differ little from that which your Honourable Court has more than once suggested. And the alteration in the judicial establishments does not, you will perceive, involve any general or fundamental change of principle. Some change was absolutely indispensable to the fulfilment of the undeniable right of the subject, and the primary duty of the Government.

12. The measures to be taken for the better administration of civil justice will form the subject of early deliberation in the Judicial department, from which we shall have the honour of submitting a detailed exposition of our views.

13. With the arrangement now reported, to which we propose to give effect as soon as the necessary details can be adjusted, we have resolved to combine a general revision of the allowances attached to the several offices that are held by your covenanted civil servants. The result will be communicated to you without delay in a separate despatch.

14. In the mean time, the Statement (No. 11.)† which is herewith transmitted, will show the present measure will be attended with some immediate and considerable ultimate saving; and the principle of curtailing the charges of our Government, as far as is possible consistently with its other paramount interests and the just claims of individuals, will be strictly observed by us in the revision of our civil establishments.

No. 1.—MINUTE of the GOVERNOR-GENERAL.

The Governor-general seeing in the proceedings of Government reason to apprehend that the system at present in operation for the superintendence and control of the executive officers is defective, and inquiry confirming the conclusion; I directed the secretary of Government in the Territorial department to report fully on the subject. I now lay before the Board the accompanying paper, which that officer has submitted to me in compliance with my instructions.

The arrangement therein suggested corresponds in principle with the plan of a principal, with subordinate collectors, existing at the Madras Presidency, in the ceded districts, under Sir Thomas Munro, the complete success of which appeared to me that time incontrovertibly established. Mr. Graeme, who was then one of Sir Thomas's assistants, and may be considered as a high authority in revenue matters, informs me, that subsequent experience entirely confirmed the good of the system. The sanction of the Court of Directors was strongly expressed in favour of the arrangement, and I learn that the same authority has directed its introduction in Cuttack. I think there will be advantage in keeping more distinct the controlling and executive authorities, and I therefore very much approve of that part of the suggestions by which the commissioners are to be relieved from any part of the executive duties of a collector.

Before, however, coming to any final decision, I am anxious to learn the sentiments of my colleagues. And I should not wish to confine our deliberations strictly to the offices immediately connected with the Territorial department, if it shall appear to them that by a more comprehensive arrangement, we could advantageously combine the object of securing a more efficient system of revenue management with that which is above all important, the better and more prompt administration of civil and criminal justice; and I think this may be done without any sacrifice of established principle, if the revenue controlling and the revenue executive powers are kept distinct. I have seen with pain, that the files of the civil courts (those of appeal particularly) are loaded with arrears, and that in many instances the gaol deliveries have been injuriously delayed, and there is reason to apprehend that in the Bareilly division especially, the judges of circuit cannot adequately control the magistrates and the subordinate police. It would be presumptuous, after a residence of a few months, to come to a decided conclusion upon so momentous a question. But if I were obliged to draw an inference from the facts and reports which each council brings more or less before us, as well as from the information received out of doors, I am afraid that I should be obliged to say that the administration of civil and criminal justice, if not a complete failure, was so defective and inefficient as to demand our instant and most serious attention; and I trust that Mr. Bayley, who is well versed with this subject in all its different relations, and who is very sensible of its defects, will have the goodness to consider and to suggest the means by which this undeniable right of the subject, and this primary duty of every government, can be more completely fulfilled.

No. 2.—SECRETARY'S REPORT.

HAVING some time ago been desired by Mr. Bayley to state my opinion as to the expediency of modifying the constitution of the Revenue Board in the Western provinces, I was tempted to take the opportunity of submitting the sentiments I entertain in favour of a still further change of system, under persuasion that the established revenue and judicial system has, from inherent defect (above all, from the separation of the lines, and the want of popular institutions), essentially failed in securing for the people such a measure of good government as is at all worthy of our country, and that it has little or no tendency towards improvement; but partly from the oppressive heat of the weather, partly from the occupation of current business, and partly from other causes, which will readily occur to others without my avowal, I have found it more difficult than I thought it would have been to put my notions into a distinct shape. And such a change could not of course be thought of, without long and serious consideration; and even if I were much more certain than I am of the accuracy of my views, and had ample time fully to develope them, I could only have ventured to present them as matter of inquiry.

Some change, however, in the constitution of the controlling revenue authorities seems to be very urgently required; and under the commands of your Lordship, I propose to state what has occurred to me, confining my speculations to the officers immediately connected with the Territorial department. On the one hand, it seems to be indispensably necessary, that Government should be relieved from a portion of the references on which it is even now required to decide, by the institution of an authority that shall come between it and those who immediately direct and control the executive offices; and on the other hand, if the immediate supervision of the executive European officers is vested in deliberative Boards, trusting for their knowledge of facts chiefly to the reports of those whom they have to control, conducting their business for the most part through the medium of English correspondence, exercising authority over tracts exceeding in each direction many hundred miles, issuing their orders from the recess of a kutcherry situate in some corner of their jurisdiction, it seems to me quite certain that they will utterly fail to impose any effectual check to the grossest mismanagement. Things may indeed go on smoothly upon paper; we should obtain, in any quantity we require, periodical tributes of self-applause; we may even have the demonstration of good management which is afforded by an increasing rent-roll; but there will be no real security that our officers (even those who are thoroughly honest and zealous) are not occasioning much miserable distress and much cruel injustice. We shall have, as heretofore, under our best officers, multitudes of industrious men oppressed by an excessive demand, or robbed of their property through some abominable abuse; and in other cases, the most wasteful sacrifice of the Government dues in favour of a few.

As recently expressed to me by a very intelligent officer, the vast majority of the collectors' acts, whether good or bad, "is absolutely unknown both to the Board and Government, and what does appear before them may, for aught they know, be either the result of the most laborious research, or of no research at all, but compiled by native officers, saving their European superiors all trouble but that of signature."

With the best possible system of control, indeed, it would be vain to hope for any thing like the full truth. Nobody knows it, at least nobody who will divulge it. But if we wish to come at all near it, we must compel our collectors to master all the details of the work done by their subordinates, and to authenticate what they do by an actual trial and by a real appeal to the parties interested. If this be done, and if moderation be our guiding principle, I feel confident that the difficulties which have been so artfully raised will speedily disappear. With the people once for us, all indeed must be plain sailing; our native officers will become what they ought always to be, and what most of them are excellently qualified to be, executive instruments directed by their European superiors, not the governors of those they profess to obey. The worst settlement then made will be a great improvement upon the past system, bestowing upon the people many real blessings in spite of all our blunders, which we shall gradually discover and correct. But Government and the subordinate controlling authorities must be prepared to do their duty to the people. There must be no mincing the matter of personal control and responsibility, and no slurring over the question of qualification. The collectors must be able to say, "I visited the village for such a time; I examined the boundaries, and found or made them settled and acknowledged by such persons and in such a manner; I had the field-book of the measurement in my hands; I adopted such means of testing the accuracy of its record, in regard to extent, soil, and crops; I caused the different abstracts to be made in such a manner, by such and such means; I can read the accounts readily; I compared the results and found them to agree; I examined personally such and such parties; I understood them and they understood me; the detailed assessment was made and checked, and verified in such a manner; it was fully explained to all all interested, either directly or through their accountant. They agreed, and pottahs were issued, or if not, why."

The tehsildars' reports should show precisely what they did in controlling and checking the ameens; the collector's roobakaree must be a bona fide minute of his actual proceedings.

For the above purposes, we must have a controlling authority of corresponding energy, and (as far as the difference in extent of jurisdiction allows) equally accessible to the people.

It will not suffice to wait for complaints; those who complain are often the least likely to be injured.

In the matter of settlement, especially under the provisions of Regulation VII. 1822, the controlling authority should, I think, apply to the acts of the collectors the same kind of tests that collectors apply to the proceedings of tehseldars, and tehseldars to those of the measuring ameens. They should go upon the spot completely through the papers relating to a certain number of villages in each pergunnah, or other tract, with particular reference to the varieties of tenure and interest, which the preliminary inquiries may exhibit.

They should communicate personally and familiarly with their collectors, seeing exactly how they do their business, and especially ascertaining beyond the reach of question, that they can eventually do what on the records they presumed to do. When they find they cannot do so, they must teach them; where they cannot be taught, they must report them as destined for some easier duty. They will thus adjust a thousand matters of detail which otherwise will either never be adjusted, or the adjustment of which, through a formal written correspondence, will be tedious beyond measure. They should, in short, I conceive, do, in regard to their collectors, almost every thing which was expected from the principal collector in his intercourse with his subordinates, when that appointment was experimentally introduced into Bundelcund. But they must have more distinct authority, and they must not be burthened, as Mr. Fane was, with a load of executive duty.

In the instructions which led to the experiment of Mr. Fane's appointment, the Court of Directors do not appear to have in any degree debarred the Government from exercising a considerable latitude in regard to details; and the more I consider the subject, the more am I satisfied that, if we would really establish an efficient system of control, the controlling and executive authorities should be kept distinct. A principal collector, really acting as such, must virtually direct every thing with almost all the same liabilities to err, as now beset our collectors in the heat and haste of the executive administration. A particular individual may possibly not err under such circumstances; but then all that can be said is, that in the special case no control is necessary. If he does err, as most men will do, he will, I apprehend, require for the correction of his errors as much more active supervision than can be exercised by a single deliberative Board.

I would therefore leave the executive officers very much as they are, excepting that deputies should be really such, doing what they are bid by their principals. And I would have the controlling authority altogether relieved from the executive management of the districts under them.

The sphere of their control must be much more limited than what is assigned to the Boards, that they may really know the country and be enabled frequently to visit the different divisions of it.

In the Western provinces, the proceedings of the collectors, in the exercise of the extensive judicial powers belonging to them, cannot be effectually controlled if we place under each controlling authority so wide a tract of country. And if the first-mentioned class of officers are active in making settlements, we must, I think, have a separate authority of control for every five or six collectors. For besides the investigation and decision of individual complaints, and the special examination of a certain portion of each year's work, every village settled will involve the necessity of reading at least the roobakary (or minute) of settlement, ment, and of examining the general results afforded by the accounts of the assessment, so as to see that, on the face of the record, there is no reason to think that the rights of the people or those of Government have been neglected or sacrificed.

But such a scheme seems to require that the immediate control of the collectors should be vested in individual commissioners; for unless, by uniting the departments, we could, in the aid of the judges of circuit, the appointment of a sufficient number of Boards, each consisting of two only, would occasion a heavy addition to the public charges; and even with the aid of the judges of circuit, it would be necessary that each member of the Boards employed in the immediate supervision of the collectors should separately undertake the details of a certain number of districts.

The employment of single commissioners in the necessary number must of course add to the urgency of providing relief for Government, by the institution of an intermediate authority; and such commissioners it will probably be thought proper to subject to a degree of supervision, which Government could scarcely exercise, even if it had the requisite leisure.

In considering the means of providing, without additional expense, the necessary number of local commissioners and a superior Board, I have reverted to the conclusion I had already drawn, that the place of the special commission, acting under the rules of Regulation I. 1821, might be advantageously taken by the revenue authorities. As far as concerns the circumstances of the sales, the investigation of the cases tried by that commission appears to be generally easy; so that the revenue commissioners, using the instrumentality of the collectors and their officers, when they see fit for purposes of local inquiry, might, I conceive, without difficulty undertake the trial of them. And in regard to the more intricate claims of the joint proprietors that have to be settled when sales are annulled, I am more and more persuaded that they can be adjusted satisfactorily only after a field measurement and individual assessment, with a detailed census, and all that should be done in making settlements under Regulation VII. 1822, and this done on the spot and amidst the people.

If then the three Mofussil commissioners, in addition to the nine members of the Board, be considered available for the duty of controlling the executive revenue officers, there will be no difficulty in providing the necessary number of local commissioners and the members of the Sudder Board without any increase of expense.

It has appeared to me as advisable to include the Dehlee territory in the plan, because I believe that the commissioner in the Northern Doab may afford the resident considerable aid in controlling the principal assistants. And Sir Edward Colebrooke some time ago expressed his willingness, in return for such aid, to take upon himself the decision of cases in the Doab, which Mr. Fraser has now to refer to Bareilly, and then eventually to Furruckabad. It may probably be thought best to keep all the Regulation provinces under the Presidency Board, of which indeed the jurisdiction may eventually be with advantage extended; and there will be no practical difficulty in arranging the matter in whatever way may be deemed best.

It has also seemed to me that it would be advantageous to give the commissioners in Assam and Arracan (I mean of course, in the latter, the controlling commissioner whoever he may be) authority over the districts adjoining to those provinces, and to extend the revenue jurisdiction of the commissioner in Cuttack to the whole district of Midnapore (he now exercises the powers of the Revenue Board in Hidgelee), giving Bhanguipore, Purnea, and Dinagepore, to the Patna division (they were once with Rungpore, under the Benares and Behar commission); the remaining districts of Bengal may very well be managed by two commissioners. The annexed Statement (A.) will show the scheme that has occurred to me; * few more observations seem to be necessary in explanation of it.

I will only add, that any one who shall proceed from the most remote of our western districts to the province of Rohilcund, and thence crossing the centre of the Doab into the country country of the Bondelas, must be forcibly struck with the varieties which the character and social relations of the people, no less than the physical circumstances of the regions themselves, present; and will cease to wonder that gross errors were committed, when one plan and the partial experience of one place were employed in the regulation of their revenue; still more will the necessity of a considerable variety of scheme and a proportioned number of agents become apparent, if again entering the Doab in the vicinity of its termination at Allahabad, we cross over to Goruckpore, and thence pass through the fertile regions of Benares and Behar into the alluvial plains of Bengal.

* I also annex a Statement (B.) explanatory of the General Scheme to which I referred in the beginning of this Note.

With respect to the precise powers to be exercised by the local commissioners and the superior board respectively, I have some hesitation in submitting any decided opinion.

The case is one, perhaps, in which it is best to let rules arise out of practice.

Whatever a collector can do of his own authority, that he ought to do when ordered by the commissioner who is over him.

And the superior board should look more to general control and special interposition on appeal, when prima facie it may appear that wrong has been done or right withheld, than to a minute intermeddling with individual cases.

A good groundwork for more detailed rules will be found in the Letter of the Central Board, relative to the powers and duties which they proposed to confide in Mr. Fane, as principal collector, and which were objected to only because they appeared to go beyond the plan then experimentally contemplated. That paper and the orders issued by Government on the occasion are annexed for the convenience of immediate reference.

I shall briefly notice a few points.

Settlements.—The commissioners should report to the Board, for eventual reference to Government, all orders issued or decisions passed by them on important points of general application, whether relating to the rate, or mode of assessment, or to the system of management to be pursued, or to the special privilege, if any, to be allowed to particular classes.

Each year, by the month of October, the work done by each collector in the preceding season should be reported, with the required statement by the commissioners to the Board, and by the latter to Government; the Board should be furnished, for eventual reference, with the minutes (roobakaree) of settlement for each village, and with all the printed forms. It may be sufficient if they submit to Government the abstract Statements, No. 1, 2, 3 and 4.

Remissions of revenue will of course require the sanction of Government, and suspensions should not be continued without its authority beyond the current year. Suspensions allowed by the local commissioners should immediately be reported to the Board.

Sales in the western provinces are now happily very seldom made. Their final confirmation had better, I think, still be reserved to Government; for they may operate as a severe forfeiture in individual cases, and if numerous, may affect the peace of the country. The local commissioners may certainly be allowed to authorize the usual advertisements in all the provincial and in the permanently settled districts; it may be sufficient to give the Board a power of special appeal merely. There indeed the sale statements of many districts are of such enormous bulk, that practically, I believe, the transmission of them to the Board is an useless and cumbrous form.

Sales under decrees of court should, I think, be made by order of the local commissioners, with reference either to the Board or to Government. But it may be useful and interesting to get quarterly statements of such sales.

Petitions of Suit.—Persons deeming themselves aggrieved by the acts of the revenue authorities should, I conceive, be authorized to sue in the courts for redress, if denied by the local commissioner, leaving it to them, however, still as now to prefer as special appeals to the Board of Revenue and to Government.

Petitions connected with the Revenue Management.—No change should be made in the management management of villages, excepting the necessary transfers on deaths and the like, or when all the parties interested agree, without a report to the Board. But the order of the local commissioner should suffice to give possession immediately when the matter is one within the cognizance of the revenue authorities.

Pensions.—The confirmation of all hereditary pensions should, I think, be by Government. The local commissioners should decide on life pensions, when the amount is within that which leaves the cognizance to the Board, and the Board should decide upon those of a larger amount. Both should submit quarterly statements of all such decisions.

Rent free Grants and Claims.—The decision of the local commissioners should be sufficient in cases when they are for resumption, the parties having an appeal to the courts or to the special commission.

Butwarrahs should be made under orders of the local commissioners, periodical reports being furnished to the Board. But the whole matter of these partitions requires revision.

Forfeitures should not be enforced without orders from Government, to which indeed the disposal of the property forfeited naturally belongs.

Defaulters.—The orders of the local commissioners should be final in respect to the issue of process against the person of revenue defaulters, and the release of them from gaol; periodical statements of all prisoners being sent to the Board, to which should belong the power of special interference.

Towjhees.—The monthly towjhees of the collectors should be furnished to the local commissioners; the Board will get corresponding statements in abstracts from the accountant's office at the Presidency quarterly, or at such other periods as they may desire.

The local commissioners should have the same power as now belongs to the Board, in regard to all the native officers of the collectors' appointments resting with the latter. But all changes should be periodically reported to the Board; and the collectors should be prevented as far as possible from carrying with them favourite officers from one district to another.

Internal Management of Collector's Office, &c.—In this the local commissioners will not often have occasion to interfere, but when they do so, their orders and instructions should be at once obeyed.

The authority of the local commissioner should suffice for disbursements ordered by a regular decree of court, quarterly statements of all such being sent to the Board.

Contingent charges, not exceeding 100 rupees, to be sanctioned by local commissioners, but statements of all such to be sent to the Board.

The Board to be empowered to pass charges to the amount of 500 rupees, similarly sending statements to Government.

The settlement of the Abkare Mehal to be made under the orders of the local commissioners; but when concluded to be reported to the Board; and no farms for more than one year to be granted without the authority of the Board.

The accounts of all Khas estates, and those under the Court of Wards, to be examined and audited by the local commissioners, who will furnish such statements in regard to them as may be required by the court, and will remit through the Board all money belonging to wards that are to be invested in Company's paper by the Government agents.

Fines.—The rules regarding fines imposed by the Revenue authorities require, I think, to be revised. But in the mean time, the local commissioners should exercise the powers now belonging to the Board in that behalf, subject to a special appeal to the Board, and to the obligation, of course, of reporting to that authority all fines requiring the sanction of Government for their realization, which the Board should be authorized to remit without reference, when they may think that the penalty has been improperly imposed.

Alterations in the fixed establishment will, as heretofore, be made under the authority of of Government, and all propositions to that effect must consequently be reported to the Board.

The allowances of some classes, the tehsildars for instance, should, I think, be revised. They are liberal, but not proportionate to the labour and responsibility attaching to the management of the several subdivisions. Long service when good should be considered, and new men introduced by new collectors should come in at the bottom of the list.

In regard to the investigation and decision of the cases described in Regulation I. 1821, the local revenue commissioners should exercise the powers of the Mofussil commissioners acting under that law, using however more extensively the agency of the collectors and punchayets or juries.

The Board at the Presidency may hear appeals as the Sudder special commission now do; but I think the appeals should be special, that is to say, they ought only to be admitted when, on perusing the petition of the parties and the decree of the local commissioner, there is reason to doubt whether justice has been done: this especially when the decisions may be for the annulment of those sales which have been such a curse to the country and such a disgrace to our Government.

I am strongly inclined also to recommend, that the powers of the commissioners for the redress of injuries sustained through the operation of such sales and errors of record should be extended to more recent cases than those which fall within the jurisdiction of the special commission. I fear it was somewhat too hastily assumed, that the administration of latter years did not require such a corrective, and that the denial of redress by the commission, in cases wherein possession was lost subsequently to the year 1217, has been regarded as arbitrary and unjust, and has operated to maintain much wrong that would have been easily redressed.

On this subject I annex (C.) some papers received a short time ago from Mr. W. W. Bird.

The English correspondence of the local commissioners should be kept in the simple form of books of letters received and letters sent, for each of the districts under them, and each of the authorities within which they correspond: a miscellaneous book being reserved for papers that cannot be so classed. Copies of these books should be sent down to the Board monthly, or as often as convenient opportunities offer.

Copies of all roobakaries of settlement, as well as those relating to claims to rent-free land, should also, I think, be furnished to the Board for perusal and eventual orders, with indexes of all other orders passed in the native languages. Of course such other Persian papers will be sent as may be especially required; and generally, we must, I imagine, be contented to build up rules of practice as the necessity for them arises. It is sufficient if the people know what they have to do, and what to shun in their relation with their governors whom they are to obey, and what orders they may legally resist, where they must seek for redress if aggrieved, and what course they must follow to procure it. With the detail of provisions designed merely for the instruction of our officers in their official relation to each other, the community have little concern, if the general result be such as to produce the greatest practicable sum of good; and for this purpose obedience and discipline in our body (I mean the civil service) is the first thing wanting.

Immediate Saving
Ultimate Saving

It is to be remarked, that Mr. Scott (the political agent, N. E. frontier) has two military officers under him, receiving Rs. 16,200, so that it may not be necessary to give him a covenanted civil servant as an assistant. I might also, perhaps, fairly take credit for the assistant whom, under the present system, the commissioner in Cuttack requires. As to uncovenanted and native establishments, I should hope that under a simple system of keeping the proceedings and records, and with the diminished number of references to Government on cases of little importance, the expense ought rather to be reduced than increased.

Eventually the following collectorships at the sudder stations, of which the commissioners would have their office, when not in tents, may admit of considerable reduction:—

Bareilly allowances	32,500
Furruckabad	30,000
Allahabad	43,000
Benares	45,000

If Mr. Blunt's appointment were to cease, and another local commissioner were appointed in his room, the immediate saving would be more considerable, for in that case we might take credit for all that is paid to Mr. Blunt's substitute in the sudder court. But if a commissioner for Arracan over Mr. Paton be thought unnecessary (the office seems to me to be indispensably necessary, though the cost is now expensive), then the realization of the stated saving must depend on the necessity or otherwise of appointing a commissioner to the eastern districts of Bengal, whose salary would consume the immediate saving within 1,000 rupees, and we should not be entitled to take credit for the saving consequent on Mr. Blunt's return to the sudder, which would then not depend on the adoption or rejection of this scheme.

So, also, if Mr. Scott were not to take the four districts I have proposed to assign to him, and it thence became necessary to have three instead of two commissioners for Bengal.

The average of the salaries of the district officers on the above plan, agrees very nearly with that of the allowances now drawn, though the distribution is different.

To the senior division commissioners I would propose to give 45,000 rupees; to the juniors, Rs. 40,000. The expense of the six commissioners will then amount to Rs. 5,10,000, twelve men being required to fill them. If we attach to each an assistant on a salary of 1,000 rupees a month, the charge will be Rs. 5,82,000.

Now we have in the western provinces six members of Boards, three special commissioners, nine judges of circuit, in all eighteen officers, drawing an aggregate of Rs. 7,78,000, and it is certain that the Bareilly court at least cannot overtake its business. If to the above we add Rs. 1,15,735 for the secretaries, sub-secretaries, assistants, and surgeons of the Boards, we have a total charge of Rs. 8,93,735, or Rs. 3,11,735 above that of the proposed commissioners; and the saving in the district establishments being Rs. 1,51,612, there is altogether a prospect of ultimate retrenchment to the extent of Rs. 4,63,347. The Behar districts might, I conceive, without inconvenience, revert to the Presidency Board of Revenue, even though that authority should not be relieved from the charge of the eastern districts adjoining to and beyond the Berhampooter.

We should then have ample funds to provide for what is much wanted, a sudder commission for the affairs of the western provinces, to be stationed at the Presidency: who should exercise along with the powers of the Sudder Dewanny and Nizamut Adawlut those of head Revenue

278 APPENDIX TO REPORT FROM SELECT COMMITTEE.

Revenue Board, acting in immediate communication with Government, as the chief Judicial and Revenue authority must do, if we would hope for any thing like a good settlement of the country, or the establishment of a good system of civil government.

Three members would, I imagine, suffice. They should have a register in the Judicial, and a secretary in the Revenue department. The probable charge may be stated as follows:—

Senior Member ...	Rs. 60,000
Two Junior ditto (at 55,000) ...	1,10,000
Register and Secretary (30,000) ...	60,000
Two Assistants (9,600) ...	19,200
TOTAL ...	2,49,200

And from this we may deduct at least 55,000, the salary of one of the sudder judges; 1,94,200 rupees is the remaining charge. So that even supposing it to be thought necessary to have three instead of two members in the local commissions, there would still be a considerable saving; and this, after providing what seems to me very desirable, a controlling authority in the Delhi territory between the resident and the principal assistants, the resident to be supreme as a judge of the sudder and revenue of the chief.

Independent of considerations of economy, the advantages of the scheme may be thus summarily stated:—

Superior knowledge in all officers, whether executive or controlling.

More efficiency in the controlling authorities in both departments, Revenue and Judicial.

Prompt punishment of the guilty; prompt release of persons falsely accused.

Consistency of views and principles and actions.

Increase of power to European officers, with proportionate increase of checks to its abuse.

Decrease of litigation, lying, and fraud.

Diminution of labour, now uselessly expended in doing and undoing.

Gradual establishment of popular tribunals through increase of knowledge in the European functionaries.

Probable prevention of the disunion and demoralization in progress throughout the provinces.

More justice to the people, more strength to Government.

The districts from (A.) to (B.) are under the single court of circuit at Bareilly, whereas Lord Cornwallis thought that six, or at most seven districts, bearing an average assessment of Rs. 61,00,000, a proper sphere of jurisdiction for a provincial court. The consequences are, that common humanity has been often outraged by the inordinate* detention of persons under commitment for trial; that a (C.) large proportion of those committed are acquitted; that there is comparatively little or no appeal, either in civil or criminal cases, and that the judges hurrying through the circuit know little, and care but little, about the people. It would be very advisable, I think, to have a magistrate and collector for the northern part of Agra, above Mutra. The country is very populous, and is the seat of much commerce. Smuggling

* Note.—Inquiring at Seharunpore, I found that the two Sessions of 1823 had commenced at the same time, and this so late as May 1824; and that the two Sessions of 1824, with the first of 1825, were postponed till December of the last year. Acquittals were to convictions as 36 to 30.

Appeals from the magistrate's orders averaged only about eight in the year.

In four years there had been 67 appeals from 360 civil decrees, but of the cases appealed only three had been determined, the whole of the regular civil suits decided by the Bareilly court being less than 78 per annum.

Notes.
(A.) (B.)

(C.)

Smuggling of salt is said to thrive for the want of control. Possibly some of the southern divisions of Delhi might be advantageously annexed.

(D.) Some pergunnahs of Suswan, which are within the Dooab, should be restored to the district to which they originally belonged; and the station of the magistrate and collector should certainly be fixed at the town of Budaon.

(E.) I have put this district here, in order to keep Rohilcund together. But it ought to be transferred to the Furruckabad division, and then Futtehpore should be given to Allahabad.

(F.) There should be a magistrate and collector for that portion of Cawnpore which touches the Jumna. In the Custom department, too, the appointment would, I doubt not, relieve the fair trader, and prevent smuggling. It would not, however, I think, be necessary for the magistrate and collector always to reside on the spot.

(G.) So also there should be a deputy collector in those parts of Allahabad which lie south-west of the Jumna; and the portion of Bundelcund between Colinger and Allahabad should likewise, I think, be under a distinct officer.

(H.) I have fixed on Azimghur as the place where, I think, a civil judge would best be stationed for the business both of that chuckla and for Goruckpore and Ghazeepore; relieved from the charge of the magistracy and from the summary civil jurisdiction which will belong to the collectors and magistrates, a single judge would, I conceive, suffice, aided, as he may be by natives. For regular suits, distance of place is not of so much consideration; and even if the civil tribunals were more remote than they are, it would be the detention at the station, whether near or far, which results from delay in decision, more than the journey of an additional day or two, of which the people would have to complain. This remark applies generally.

The annexed Statement of the civil suits decided and depending in the Bareilly and Benares provinces, made up from the latest papers I have with me, will, I conceive, evince that abundant provision is made for the civil business of the North Doab and Agra divisions, by the appointment of two judges to each; and that the judges may find some time for the purposes of general supervision.

In Rohilcund, I am rather disposed to think that one civil judge might suffice, the collectors and magistrates exercising summary powers in cases touching land and rent, and the agency of native judges being duly employed in the primary trial of other suits.

In the Furruckabad division, the Cawnpore judge might possibly be somewhat pressed, if Futtehpore were added to his jurisdiction; and that district may more properly belong to Allahabad.

When, however, judges are relieved from the turmoil and interruption of the police, and of the magistrate's court, they will soon, I imagine, be found capable of getting through much more business than they now do in a given time, and their control over the native judges will be infinitely more efficient.

This leads me to think that a judge at Jounpore will not be required, and that one such officer may suffice for Goruckpore and Ghazeepore; though the file of those districts is very heavy. Good Revenue management and prompt decision of summary suits will soon, I imagine, diminish litigation in both.

In the lower provinces it seems to be advisable, with certain special exceptions, to leave the existing system, for the present at least, unchanged. The perpetual settlement has there taken from our Revenue officers all power and influence, and has left few motives to the acquisition of knowledge. The judicial authority is every thing.

It would, however, be useful to have a Presidency Board and local commissioner. And if adopting this scheme, we exclude Benares from the above scheme, and the Revenue administration only of the province were modified, along with that of Behar, Bengal, and Orissa, we might have the following result, reducing the strength of the Benares court, in consequence of the separation of Bundelcund and Allahabad.

If the Sudder Commission had jurisdiction over Benares, the Court of Sudder Dewanny and Nizamut Adawlut would probably be able to spare another judge; but on this I will not reckon, considering that the same circumstance might render it necessary to add a fourth member to the Sudder Commission.

Under either plan, the supernumeraries may be easily employed on special duties. There are many thousand cases of pensions and rent-free holdings, which it would be equally advantageous to Government and the people to have settled without delay.

LETTER from W. W. BIRD, Esq. to Mr. Secretary MACKENZIE.

My dear Mackenzie:

16th April 1828.

I ENCLOSE a list of the cases which were thrown out in consequence of possession having been lost subsequently to 1217 F. Numerous cases of the same description would be preferred, were we authorized to take them up. The accompanying correspondence with the Governor-general in Council will explain how the question stands at the present moment. The case of Tiloke and others for Mouza Kooktra Chuharpore, which we were allowed to review by the orders contained in the last paragraph of Mr. Bird's letter of the 5th April 1827, has been referred under Section x. Regulation I. 1821; but the papers have not yet been sent down. You will therefore have time before the decision can take place to settle the point of jurisdiction.

A copy of our letter of the 10th April 1821, in which the question originated, is likewise enclosed, and you will easily obtain from Molony, who knows all about the matter, any further information that may be necessary on the subject.

I return the petition which you put into my hands at Maharajgunge. The case was dismissed by the M. S. C. before the enactment of Regulation I. 1823, under the idea which then prevailed, that the exercise of undue influence was necessary to give jurisdiction. If the petition be sent to us, we will apply for permission to return it, or it might be transmitted to the Sudder Court direct, to be forwarded to us, with orders for that purpose.

I remained at Gopee Gunge about ten days, and succeeded in enabling the Raja's officers to secure nearly the whole of his balances. I hope soon to report progress.

Believe me, &c. &c.

Allahabad, 16th April 1828.

Mofussil Special Commission, Allahabad,
the 4th July 1826.

From the MOFUSSIL SPECIAL COMMISSION to E. MOLONY, Esq., Secretary
Sudder Commission.

Sir :

5th July 1826.

WE have the honour to submit a statement of seventeen cases belonging to the Cawnpore file, which were dismissed without investigation, under the instructions communicated in the 3d, 4th, and 5th paragraphs of your Letter of the 22d December 1821, and to request, that we may be authorized to rehear them, in order that they may be fully inquired into, and decided on their merits.

2. These cases were first brought to the attention of the sudder by a Letter from this Commission, dated the 10th April 1821, stating certain doubts which had arisen in regard to jurisdiction, in consequence of possession having been lost subsequently to the period specified in Clause first, Section iii. Regulation I. 1821, although the error of record to which such loss was imputable had taken place within that period. These doubts were afterwards removed by a communication from the Board of Commissioners, referred to in Letter to you of 5th December 1821; but the Sudder Commission being of opinion, that the cases in question could not be heard without the enactment of a new Regulation, they were dismissed as above stated.

3. Our wish now to rehear them is founded on the decision of the Sudder Commission, in the case of Talooja Abdalpore, and on the opinion therein recorded by Mr. Ross, that a proprietor a proprietor of land who may have been deprived of his right in consequence of an error of record committed within the period specified in Clause first, Section iii. Regulation I. 1821, by any act happening posterior to 1217 F., is entitled to claim restoration under the provisions of Clause fifth or sixth of the Section of the Regulation quoted; and that the Mofussil Commissioners are bound to entertain the claim, and take cognizance of it under those sections.

4. Many other claims of a similar description not yet preferred, in consequence of the ejection of the cases in question, will probably be brought forward, and of course it will be proper to admit them on the same principle.

5. Copies of the original petitions in each case, and of the decisions thereon, accompany this Letter.

Mofussil Special Commission, Allahabad,
5th July 1826.

From E. P. SMITH, Esq., Officiating Secretary SUDDER SPECIAL COMMISSION, to the MOFUSSIL SPECIAL COMMISSION, 21st July 1826.

Gentlemen:

I AM directed by the Sudder Special Commission to acknowledge the receipt of your Letter, dated the 5th instant, and of its enclosures relative to seventeen cases in Zillah Cawnpore, formerly rejected by you, and which you are now desirous of re-admitting on your file.

2. The Sudder Special Commission observe that the cases in question were rejected by you, in pursuance of certain constructions put by them on the several clauses of Section iii. Regulation I. 1821, which constructions were given in reply to references made by you. It does not now appear that the parties whose suits were then rejected have petitioned for any revision of the orders formerly passed by you; and as these cases must be considered to have been disposed of by a regular course of proceeding, the Sudder Special Commission do not consider it expedient now to review them on your reference.

3. I am further directed to observe to you, that in ordering the admission on your file of the claims to recover different portions of Talooqa Abdalpore, it was by no means the intention of the Sudder Special Commission collectively to give a conclusive opinion on the question of jurisdiction, either generally or in that particular case; all that the Sudder Special Commission intended was, that you should receive the case on your file, and pass such judgment as you might think proper on any points connected with it, including of course that of jurisdiction, leaving any party dissatisfied to appeal in the usual manner.

I have, &c.

COMMISSION.

Sir:

6th September 1826.

We have the honour to acknowledge the receipt of your Letter of the 21st July last, communicating the refusal of the Sudder Special Commission to authorize the revision of the cases therein referred to, on the grounds that the parties whose suits were then rejected had not petitioned for the purpose.

and Circuit.

2. We now beg leave to enclose a copy of a petition to that effect from Tilokee and others for the recovery of Mouza Kootra Chukurpore, Pergunnah Bhogneepore Moosannugur, their complaint for which was rejected by us on the 9th February 1822, in pursuance of the construction put by the Sudder on Clause sixth, Section iii. Regulation I. of 1821; we enclose likewise copies of the original petition, and of all papers connected therewith.

3. It is stated by the complainants that the village is their hereditary property, and that they were in possession of it until the end of the year 1219 Fuslee; but Tilokee, the engaging proprietor, having been erroneously recorded at the cession as Mokuddum, they were ousted in 1220 Fuslee by the decision of the Revenue authorities, in favour of Kazec Mahomed Yasseen, the present occupant, who had no title to the estate, and whose name had been originally entered in the Settlement books a zemindar, through the influence of the native officers.

4. We hope that the Sudder Commission, before passing orders on the above complaint, will pronounce a conclusive decision on the question of jurisdiction; or should the construction formerly put upon Clause sixth be deemed an obstacle to so doing, that they will submit the point for the consideration of Government.

5. Adverting to the great accumulation of business before this Commission, it is obviously an important object to save time; but if these cases be taken up without the point in question being previously determined, and it should be ultimately decided on appeal that our jurisdiction is barred, in consequence of possession having been lost subsequently to 1217 Fuslee, although the error of record and recognition which occasioned such loss was committed prior to that period, the whole of the time employed in these inquiries will have been thrown away.

6. We are also induced to urge the expediency of a preliminary determination of the point in dispute, for the further reason, that our general jurisdiction in the district of Cawnpore, which has been already renewed no less than four times, may be brought to a close, since, if jurisdiction on the one hand be barred in the cases alluded to, it would probably be unnecessary again to extend our authority in that district; and if, on the other hand, jurisdiction be allowed, all the cases of the nature referred to might be immediately admitted on the file, and brought to a speedy decision.

We have &c.

From the Secretary to the SUDDER COMMISSION to GEO. WARDE, Esq., Member of the MOFUSSIL SPECIAL COMMISSION.

Sir:

I HAVE the honour to acknowledge your Letter of the 6th September last, which was received in this office on the 13th of the same month, but has since been mislaid.

2. In answer to the first paragraph of the communication in question, I am directed to inform you that the Sudder Special Commission, from a consideration of the obvious danger and inexpediency of pronouncing judgment on the general admissibility of any stated number of cases, without an investigation into the circumstances of each particular case, were induced to require that you should go into and determine a real case, and submit it for their final decision, that a rule of precedent for similar cases might be thereby established for the guidance of the Mofussil Commission.

3. The whole of the correspondence which took place in the case of Abdalpoora has been been referred to Government, and no special orders having been received on the subject by the Sudder Special Commission, they are led to conclude that the orders conveyed to the Mofussil Special Commission, in Mr. Molony's letter of the 20th June last, have been deemed unobjectionable by the Government; and under these considerations, with the information now before them, the Sudder Special Commission decline entering on a discussion of the construction already given to Clause 6, Section iii. Regulation I. of 1821, and direct that the Mofussil Commission will proceed immediately to complete their proceedings in that case, and either pass a decision thereon, or refer it for a final order to this Commission, under Section x. Regulation I. of 1821.

4. In the event of the case being so referred, the Sudder Commission will, after due consideration of its merits, be prepared to discuss the general question which it appears to involve, and to decide whether a further reference to Government is or is not necessary.

5. You are authorized to review your former proceedings in the case alluded to in the petition which accompanied your Letter.

From the MOFUSSIL SPECIAL COMMISSION to the SUDDER SPECIAL COMMISSION.

Gentlemen :

10th April 1828.

UNDER the second Clause of Section xii. Regulation I. of 1821, we deem it incumbent on us to submit, through you, for the consideration of his Excellency the Most Noble the Governor-general in Council, a draft of a Regulation for extending the powers of the Special Commission, in receiving, investigating, and determining the claims specified in the Regulation in question, to the expiration of the Fuslee year 1221.

2. The necessity of such an extension has been suggested to us by the following circumstance :—In the year 1219 or 1220 Fuslee, the collector of this district was ordered to revise the settlement of Mehals, not held under zemindaree tenures; these orders through the machinations of the native revenue officers, especially Dewan Soobhan Allee Khan, and a person named Gungapershand, who was proscribed by Government on the 25th of September 1818, led to an extensive mutation of landed property. Many of the landholders who, in the uncertainty which prevailed at the first and second triennial settlements, were recorded as mokuddums or moostagers, though, in most cases, there is reason to believe they were the real proprietors, were ejected, and engagements were made with individuals, whose names had been subsequently introduced into the Persian copy of the settlement account, in the column of proprietors, expressly for that purpose; and who, in many instances, were the relations or dependants of native officers, or fictitious substitutions; thus a large portion of Pergunnah Akberpore, Shahpore, and several other estates elsewhere, were transferred in 1219 and 1220 Fuslee to Khulut Khan, Khan Khawan, and Surwanee Khan, the Isimfurzees of the ex-tehsildar, T'ajoodeen, and others, whose claim to original proprietary right is notoriously defective.

3. We understand that nearly 150 villages have been alienated in the manner above described. Applications for the recovery of several of them have been brought to us, and more are expected; but we shall await the result of this reference, to determine in what manner they are to be disposed of.

4. We were at first inclined to think, that as these fraudulent mutations in 1219 and 1220 Fuslee, could not have been brought about but for the error in the title, by which the first holders were originally admitted to engage, their cases might be heard under the rule contained

contained in the latter part of Clause 6, Section iii. Regulation I. 1821; on more mature consideration, however, we think that there is great room for doubt, and in order to prevent our proceedings being involved in an error, which might be attended with serious embarrassment, we have determined, as enjoined in such cases, to propose the measure now submitted. We have been induced to recommend the extension to the end of 1221 Fuslee, with a view to include the whole of the proceedings of the quinquennial settlement.

5. The Regulation, as far as we are yet capable of judging, appears to be admirably calculated to meet the objects intended to be effected by it; and in proportion as its provisions are known and understood, to excite among the native inhabitants of this district the greatest satisfaction.

A REGULATION for extending the powers of the Special Commission, in the Ceded and Conquered Provinces, acting under the Provisions of Regulation I. 1821, passed by the Governor-general in Council, on the Preamble.

WHEREAS it has appeared that numerous estates in the ceded and conquered provinces were acquired by the native officers of Government, their relations, connexions, and dependents, subsequently to the period to which the cognizance of such cases is limited by Regulation I. 1821, through the fraudulent and iniquitous practices enumerated in that Regulation, the following rules have been enacted, to be in force from the date of their promulgation.

Extending to the expiration of 1221, Fuslee, the admission of claims for the recovery of land preferred to the Special Commission under Regulation I. 1821.

The Special Commission, acting under Regulation I. 1821, is hereby authorized to receive, investigate, and determine all claims to recover possession of land, which have been lost without just cause, through or in immediate consequence of any act done or record prepared, filed or authenticated, by Revenue officers, from the period of the cession or conquest (according as the lands may be situated in the ceded or conquered provinces), to the expiration of the Fuslee year 1221, corresponding with the LETTER from A. MACKENZIE, Esq., Second Judge, Provincial Court, at Bareilly, to HOLT MACKENZIE, Esq.

Sir:

13th November 1827.

IN the eighth paragraph of the letter of the Right Honourable the Governor-general, addressed to yourself, dated Meeruth the 21st July last, your attention has been directed to the general bearings of our Judicial system in its application to the Western provinces, and to the measure of establishing a sudder court in the Western provinces.

The judges of the provincial courts exercising original and appellate jurisdiction, and going circuits to hold criminal sessions for gaol deliveries of districts, being the same persons, it may be perhaps pardoned to an individual of this class to submit to your notice a few observations relating to the circuit business within the provincial division of Bareilly, which comprehends the greatest portion of country described, in Revenue language, as the Western provinces, exclusive of the territory "to which our written laws do not extend," for it is obvious the performance of the circuit duties by officers so circumstanced has a direct communication with some of the judicial inquiries to which your attention has been directed.

The

The judicial province of Bareilly is comprehended between the 26th and 30th degrees of latitude, and the 77th and 81st of longitude. This vast area is thickly peopled; it is divided into twelve stations, at which sessions are held, besides joint magistrateships; and it may be estimated that, taking one district with another, 30 commitments are made in every six months for trial, at six-monthly sessions prescribed by law, supposing sessions to be regularly held for each district at not greater intervals (than six months). From my own observation, in whatever parts of the country I have been employed, and from all the inquiries I have been able to make of others, I have arrived at this conclusion: that, taking one trial with another, one set of workmen and description of people with another, one trial a day, including travelling and holidays, is a good and regular rate of labour; it might be shown, I think, that this rate exceeds the fact, but not the practicable, and perhaps, too; that the average of commitments in six months is below the truth. The strength of our court is three itinerant judges, and the senior judge, who remains at Bareilly, and in the absence of all the other judges holds monthly sessions for the city and zillah of Bareilly, and the two extensive joint jurisdictions of Pilibheet and Shajehanpore; it is certain that the commitments for this portion of the province nearly double the average of 30 in six months. Two members of the court must be always out on circuit; and if any the smallest allowance be made for interruptions of business from sickness or necessary absence on leave, of members for the shortest intervals, the three itinerant judges must be out together, and the whole time of the senior judge would be occupied with the Bareilly sessions, leaving no time at all for civil duties, without even securing the non-accumulation of arrears of circuit business itself, by the death of prosecutors and witnesses in cases committed for trial during the long intervals that occur between gaol deliveries, when arrears have once begun from any cause to accumulate. Sessions are not shortened but protracted, for other witnesses must be waited for, or equal time lost on inquiries made to ascertain the death or cause of absence of persons whose attendance was thought necessary by the committing authority. The cruel hardship on the persons committed by long detention in prison before trial, possibly innocent, need only be adverted to: the hardship on the officers, Native and European, forming the courts of circuit, is not a small one, in being kept eternally without a rest or a home. Some relief to many parties would be obtained by dividing the Bareilly circuit into two portions, and by assigning them to each of the two members of the court, who would leave the sudder stations simultaneously at the six-monthly periods. A line drawn due west, from Bareilly to the Jumna, would divide the province into two, or six districts, exclusive of Bareilly, and a circuit might generally be concluded for each portion in six months by each court. All parties would probably work harder to get home, and the effect upon the population would be greater of trials and punishments, while the criminal acts which occasioned the trials were still fresh in the minds of the people. Finally, the judge returned from the circuit would have six unbroken months to devote to the judicial business of appeal and of original jurisdiction, provided it were determined by Government that monthly sessions should no longer be held for Bareilly, but sessions at six-monthly periods, as for all the other districts of the country, and provided a fourth itinerant judge shall be conceded to us in like manner as has been already done to most of the other provincial divisions of half the extent of ours, half the number of districts. It need not, I am sure, be suggested to your mind, how much application, unbroken by other kinds of labour, promotes both the dispatch and the quantity of the performance of one description of business generally of the same nature; for my own part, I have always experienced, that whether the business I have been engaged on be holding criminal trials, or investigating questions of civil right (when it so happened), I have been able to dispose of twice as much business in a second as in a first month, when the attention has been singly given to one description of judicial business. The case, no doubt, may be different with others, and with minds of the higher and rarer order, but I speak of men with ordinary working capacity; the case too may be very different when, from the nature of business, the conclusions sought to be arrived at are not to be, or cannot be, of a severely and strictly judicial character and effect. It is not to be concluded, that because a comparatively small number of appeals have been disposed of in the Bareilly court, with reference to other courts, an equal proportion of work has not been performed; with reference to the relative strength of the courts, and the relative number of appeals filed, in my time, till very lately, there have never been more than one judge (the senior) present at the same time at the sudder station. If a single judge does not concur in the judgment passed in the zillah, he has performed an equal quantity of work in recording a different opinion, which remains however a dead letter till a concurring opinion of a second, a third, a fourth, or fifth judge shall dispose of the appeal; any dissentient opinion from the zillah judgment may be taken to have established some reasonable ground for the appeal. But parties will not appeal, when from the presence of a single judge at the sudder station evil may at once arise to the appellant, by the confirmation of the zillah judgment; and no redress can possibly be obtained by any judgment of the appellant jurisdiction in his favour for a long time to come; these considerations may account for the few appeals disposed of, and the few appeals comparatively filed in late periods; the truth is, that most of the appeals are of old standing, in almost every one of which, one at least, if not more opinions have been recorded. These cases are principally such wherein the plaintiffs sue for shares of village lands and rights; in these cases there never could nor can be genuine documentary evidence, from the nature of the rights and circumstances of all the parties, for the defendants in possession generally, in whose favour the zillah judgments have gone. Quantities of documents are on the files of the cases, showing that they or their predecessors were always held to be, and acted with the Government agents, as the sole owners and enjoyers; and show from the registers of collectorships, that the persons whom the plaintiffs profess to represent, or from whom to inherit, never existed at all, or never had connexion with the lands or rights sought for; yet so powerful has been the effect of truth, of the force of oral testimony, and of the general sentiment of the zillah, that in a vast number of cases the plaintiffs have obtained considerable benefit from prosecuting, either from compromise with the adversary, or from judgments partially favourable to their claims. In such cases it is hardly possible to concur wholly with the zillah judge; his judgment must be either reversed or amended, on his own showing, and so the case stands over not disposed of. I believe it will be found, that not any original suits are, properly speaking, in arrear before the Bareilly court. What has been said is only intended to show that it is not the fault of the members of the court, but owing to established rules, and the distribution of the general duties to be performed by the whole body, that so little civil work has been of late years executed in the Bareilly court. The division of the province into two circuits, the appointment of a fourth itinerant judge, and the holding six-monthly, not monthly, sessions for Bareilly, Pilibheet, and Shajehanpore, would render some small facilities to the devotion of more time and labour to civil business; the convenience and comfort of the public servants, Native and European, and humanity to prisoners to be tried for crimes, and to their families, may at the same time be considerations not wholly to be excluded from the mind of Government.

When I ventured to observe to you the different capacity I experienced in my own instance for the performance of work of the same and of a different description, in periods of the same and some duration, I meant work of the nature of properly judicial investigation and judicial conclusions. I am however aware in how small a degree work of the nature contemplated is needed, or can be either performed or rendered useful in the existing state of men and things in these provinces. I concur in the unanimous opinion, I believe I may venture to say, of every man, European or Asiatic, who, capable of forming an opinion, has formed one on the subject, that the judicial system instituted or sought to be instituted by Lord Cornwallis has wholly failed in its application to the Western provinces. It appears to my mind, that the first great vice was the forms of processes and proceedings, and the intervals of time between pleadings prescribed by the Regulations; and the second, and a greater vice, was the institution of admitting appeals in all cases whatsoever (that was the principle; the after limitations with respect to the amount of value of subject in dispute touched not the principle); the spirit of ad-

gation was created by the spirit of gaming to take another chance, and of honour not to suffer a defeat; the non-execution of decrees followed the appeal: and the demoralization of all classes of the community followed judicial delays and attendance at the courts, and the gambling of parties in the judicial lotteries required and fed perjury, forgery, subornation, and, in the lower parts of India, private assassination. In Chittagong there is hardly an old case where land is not the object disputed, and there are very few of a great many such in appeal in that zillah of many years' standing, in which successive murders of principals and witnesses on each side, have not been perpetrated, and are recorded, and in which the papers of the civil record and the record of trials before the courts of circuit are not quite mingled together in the nuthces respectively: the only mode of administering these countries seems to be clearly indicated by past experience of our own failure, and the older experience and better success of the ancient governments in the time of their military strength, namely, the system of having strong local governments severely responsible to supreme authority, content with strong probability of truth, and alike ignorant of and scorning purely judicial inquiries, and judicial distinctions, doubts, darkness, and acquittals. The local governments of the ancient better times may be well represented and succeeded by the commissions or commissionerships of the present day, and completely resorted to in a few rare instances, but in a limited manner more generally; why should not a judge in original jurisdiction, for subjects of great value and difficulty, and in appeal, and a judge of circuit be joined with the revenue superior officer in one commission? Let the three minds consider the necessity for carrying into execution a capital sentence, for the establishment of a general principle, for the assessment of the claims of the state for revenue over extensive tracts of country similarly circumstanced, or the admission of extraordinary exceptions, and consider the decision of points of law and of civil suits in original and appellate jurisdiction of great magnitude and importance; while in ordinary and usual business, each commissioner would confine himself to that province of public business with which he was from habit of ability most conversant, and of which he was the most capable; that there are not men enough, either in number or sufficient in capacity, must not be argued; the time and the want must supply the men and content the Government with the number and capacity; it is not the master workman that complains of his tools. What I have now presumed to state is my own private speculative opinion; once written I let it stand, because I honestly believe the opinion is very generally entertained by private individuals, both European and Asiatic; but for it, merely as coming from me, I expect hardly a hearing: yet I cannot help expecting some attention may be given to the observations I have submitted respecting the circuit business, for I pledge myself to establish from tabular statements, with which I can furnish you from the court, that my general statements are fully and legitimately founded in and on the truth.

I have, &c.

A. MACKENZIE,
Second Judge.

No. 3.—MINUTE of Mr. W. B. BAYLEY.

I HAVE carefully considered the Report which the Territorial secretary has prepared under the instructions of the Governor-general, and I have at the same time given my attention, as far as the pressure of current business will allow, to the other important points indicated in his Lordship's Minute.

I concur generally in what is stated by Mr. Mackenzie, as to the expediency of substituting Revenue commissioners for the existing Boards, and of establishing a general Head Board of Revenue at the Presidency; but with that measure it appears to me to be be very desirable to combine an arrangement calculated to secure the better administration of justice, particularly in the divisions of Bareilly and Benares.

It is quite clear that the circuit of the former is extensive beyond all reasonable bounds; that it is consequently impracticable to guard against frequent delays in the gaol deliveries; that the judges cannot have that knowledge of the districts under them which it is desirable they should have, and do not practically exercise the control over the magistrates and the subordinate police which ought to be maintained. Even if we adhered to the principle of requiring that our judge should proceed every six months on circuit, yet, as there is no chance of his being able to return within the period, we should not really maintain the system contemplated in the establishment of half-yearly sessions.

To the civil business of the court, the constantly recurring change of judges resident at the sudder station, with the exception of the senior judge, and the shortness of the period for which any one of them can devote himself to the hearing of appeals or original suits, is a most serious hindrance. The same observations apply, though in a much less degree, to other divisions. For if the circuit business be more promptly conducted, the arrear of civil cases is generally much heavier than at Bareilly. To any plan for remedying the evil, by an adequate increase of numbers, there is a strong objection in the present state of the finances; and, independently of pecuniary considerations, the number of gentlemen employed in the Sudder Court, the Boards, and the Courts of Appeal, is already so great as to create a serious difficulty in finding officers of suitable qualifications. It is impossible, indeed, to revert to the expression of the views entertained by Lord Cornwallis in regard to the Courts of appeal and circuit, as explained in the annexed extract from his Minute of February 1793,* and not to be struck with the contrast between what was designated and what has been accomplished.

All that is stated in regard to the necessity of exercising a close control over the executive officers in the Revenue department, seems to me to apply equally to the executive police; and if we desire our judges of circuit to do what they are expected to do with the prevention of abuse and the enforcement of the law, we must give them such a sphere of control as may admit a reasonable inference that they knew the districts of their respective divisions, and are really accessible to the complaints of the people. Nor is any thing, I believe, more certain than that promptness in the trial of charges has a very powerful effect in checking the prevalence of crime. The importance of securing the early acquittal of the innocent (and all who are not convicted we are bound to treat as such) need not be insisted upon.

With these sentiments, I have been led to the conclusion that much advantage will result from combining, in a single officer, the functions of a Revenue commissioner and of a judge of circuit.

As far as the executive officers are concerned, I confess I am not convinced of the expediency

* 45. These courts will be the great security to Government for the due execution of the Regulations, and the barriers to the rights and property of the people.

46. The offices of judges of these courts will be the first in importance in the civil line. The persons selected to fill them should be distinguished for their integrity, abilities, and knowledge of the manners, customs, and languages of the natives, and their allowances should be proportionate to the greatness of their trust. The decisions of these courts will command respect, and at the same time that they will give security to property, and afford protection to the people, their weight and influence will contribute greatly to the vigour and stability of our internal government.

47. The judges of these courts, in their capacity of judges of circuit, will possess exactly the same powers as the present judges of circuit, with this great additional advantage, that they will be able to complete the gaol deliveries in one half the time in which they are now accomplished. The senior judge should make the circuit of one half of the stations within their jurisdiction, whilst the other two perform the circuit of the remainder. In addition to the great advantages of expediting the trials, the duty of the circuit will be rendered easy to the judges, and leave them ample time for the discharge of their duties as a court of appeal in civil cases, and also for the trial of crimes and offences committed within the cities; for which last purpose they should be directed to hold a criminal court on the first of every month (excepting when they are upon the circuit), and continue their sittings until sentence is passed in all persons committed or held to bail, for trial in the preceding or any former month, unless, from the non-attendance of witnesses or other causes, they should find it necessary to postpone the completion of any trials to a future session.

pediency of any union of Revenue and Judicial powers, further than is already provided for by the rules of Regulation VII. 1822. I can readily, indeed, perceive that in the hands of superior men the measure might be very advantageous. The unity of purpose, the concentration of knowledge, the singleness of authority, may doubtless, in particular places, best operate to secure the lives and properties of the people and to command their obedience. But in considering a general scheme, we must not look to special advantages. We must take things and men as they are in the gross. And so considering the subject, I confess I should be glad to see in every district a civil judge, a magistrate, and a collector, acting separately.

To the union of powers in the authorities of control, there do not appear to me to exist similar objections. The revenue commissioners and the judges of circuit are alike removed from the heat and haste which may occasionally betray the best of our executive officers into error. In no conceivable case do I perceive any likelihood that the powers of the one department can be wrested from their proper purpose, with a view to objects connected with the other.

On the other hand, it is obvious that in controlling the police, a judge of circuit will derive very great advantage from the information he may obtain as a Revenue commissioner, from the people who will crowd to him in that capacity, and from collectors and tehsildars under his authority; and that in like manner the communications of the magistrates, the reports of the darogahs, the results of trials at the gaol deliveries, and the examination of the proceedings of the inferior courts, will often throw much light upon the character and effect of the arrangements adopted by the Revenue officers. One large class of crime, affrays, which often fills our gaols with men, whom, however necessary it is to punish, it is impossible not to regard without compassion, may be in a great measure directly traced to defective Revenue arrangements; and if we were to pursue the consequences of fends arising out of unadjusted rights, of the poverty resulting from over-assessment, of the ruin and confusion which unjust sales must occasion, we should readily recognize a still closer connexion between the departments.

Independently, therefore, of the advantage of contracting the extent of the circuits, I am quite persuaded that the union of the powers of a Revenue commissioner with those of a judge of circuit, will be attended with much advantage in the Judicial department and in the Revenue department; the very necessity of going the circuit will tend advantageously to secure that personal supervision which Government and the Home authorities have so frequently enjoined. Vested with the twofold authority over a moderate tract of country, the controlling officer will be altogether without excuse, if there be found to exist in the subordinate offices any serious mismanagement or malversation.

I might much strengthen my argument as applicable to the Western provinces, by adverting to the peculiar nature of the duties belonging, in an unsettled country, to the Revenue commissioners. But it seems to me to be unnecessary to dwell longer on the subject.

Nor do I now propose to enter into any detailed discussion of the measures that seem to be required for the due administration of civil justice. I assume it as indispensable that the arrears in the appeal courts should be got rid of. It is certain, I apprehend, that that object will be greatly promoted by the separation of the criminal and civil powers, now exercised by the provincial courts. And though I am disposed to think, that for civil suits it is advisable to have only one appellate European court, the ultimate adoption of such an arrangement will in no degree be hindered (on the contrary, it will be facilitated) by the measure I now recommend in regard to the courts of circuit.

Keeping the civil courts distinct from the Revenue authorities, we do not in any degree depart from the system already established for the administration of civil justice; and the more I have considered the subject, the more have I been confirmed in the persuasion that the duties of the judges of circuit may more advantageously be combined with those of a Revenue commissioner, than with those of a civil judge of appeal.

I shall

I shall not, however, now enter further on the consideration of the changes to be made in the civil courts; but confining myself at present to the departments of Revenue, police and criminal justice, I shall proceed at once to state briefly the conclusions to which I have arrived on a consideration of the subject, in full communication with Mr. Mackenzie, and the propositions I have to submit for the deliberation of the Board. In the sequel, I shall have incidentally to remark upon the effect of these propositions on the provincial courts, in which the number of judges must of course be diminished when the circuit duties are separately provided for; but in whose authority, as civil tribunals, I do not propose any immediate change.

It appears to me, then, that Benares and the provinces to the north-west should be placed under commissioners exercising in the Judicial department the powers of judges of circuit, and in the Revenue department those of Revenue commissioners.

I conceive that there ought to be five great divisions instead of six, as suggested in the paper (B.) requiring ten commissioners instead of twelve.

The Agra and Furruckabad divisions may be united, Allyghur being perhaps excluded from the former, and attached to Delhi and the districts of Cawnpore and Futtehpore, being detached from Furruckabad, and added to the Allahabad division.

The provinces of Rohilcund and Benares (the latter including Goruckpore) to constitute, as proposed, separate divisions.

In each division two commissioners to be employed with separate circles, according to the plan of paper (B.), modified as is requisite, in consequence of the change in the divisions above specified, and with some further slight changes.

The annexed statement will show the distribution of districts which has appeared to me the most convenient; but the point is one of detail, which may be further considered if the general plan be approved. I shall content myself, therefore, with explaining an apparent misarrangement; I mean the union in the same circle of districts belonging to the Doab and Bundelcund. For this, two reasons have been assigned; first and chiefly, because in going from Cawnpore to Humeerpore, and from Allahabad to Banda, the commissioner will have to pass through pergunnahs that are not otherwise likely to be often visited; those of the Doab on the Jumna and the southern part of Bundelcund; and secondly, because in the rains the Doab is much more salubrious. I have also thought it right to include in the statement, a similar distribution of the districts of Behar, Bengal, and Orissa, in case it should be deemed, as I am disposed to think it is, expedient to adopt the same arrangement generally, and the opportunity is obviously a fit one for providing that supervision and control, which we have long desired to see established over the affairs of Arracan.

It seems to me to be desirable that the commissioners of each division should, when circumstances do not decidedly oppose the arrangement, have their head-quarters at the same station, for the benefit of consultation; that provision may more readily be made for occasional vacancies or sickness; that Government may be able to require the concurrence of two voices in any case wherein it may appear expedient, and with a view to economy in certain parts of their establishment; but that each be distinctly responsible for the good government, and vested with the exclusive control, of the districts included in his circle.

The commissioners will be subordinate to the Nizamut Adawlut in their capacity of judges of circuit, and to a Sudder Board as Revenue commissioners. But in the Delhi territory, the powers of the Sudder Dewanny and Nizamut Adawlut and those of the superior Board should remain with the resident.

For the above purposes, nineteen officers are required in the interior of the country, in addition to the commissioners of Cuttack and Assam, to whom I propose to assign some additional territory; for the Presidency Board three members are required; in all twenty-two.

There are now employed in the provinces in question, exclusive of Cuttack and Assam, nine nine members of Boards, three Mofussil special commissioners, twenty-six provincial judges, and two superintendents of police : in all forty.

Of the twenty-six provincial judges, fourteen should be retained, for the present at least, to decide the appeals, of which so heavy an arrear has accumulated; viz. three at Benares and Calcutta, and two at each of the other provincial stations.

The remaining twelve will be available for the new offices; and if the arrangement be generally adopted, Government may, I think, dispense with the services of the superintendents of police; of whose office Sir Charles Metcalfe has more than once suggested the abolition, but which, under other circumstances, I should have been disposed to retain, unless positively compelled to relinquish it by a want of means.

Having thus twenty-six officers at our command, it would appear that the arrangement may be adopted with a considerable saving of expense; since even if it should be resolved to have three commissioners for the execution of the third Regulation of the present year distinct from the established courts, there will still be one office less to provide for; and the secretary and the sub-secretary of one of the Revenue Boards will be otherwise employed.

The number of judges of appeal may, I hope, be gradually reduced; and there will be a diminution of allowances as vacancies occur among the officers, who now draw more than that which I imagine will be thought sufficient for the commissioners. The arrangements which I shall submit in a separate Minute to the Board, with a view to expedite the administration of civil justice, will include a proposition for the eventual establishment of a separate Sudder Dewanny and Nizamut Adawlut in the Western provinces, and for the ultimate abolition of all the provincial courts of appeal. If those measures should be deemed expedient, a much larger saving of expense will be effected.

The uncovenanted and native establishments of the several Boards and commissioners now cost Rs. 24,769 per mensem, which, under a proper system and with jurisdictions admitting much personal discussion between the commissioners and their subordinates, ought to suffice, or more, for the establishments of the above offices. There are, besides, the native establishments of the circuit courts of Bareilly and Benares. And the circuit houses would, under the proposed plan, serve as cutcherries for commissioners. Further, some of the collectors might admit of reduction; and, on the whole, a certain saving might be anticipated with much increase of efficiency.

No. 4.—MINUTE of Sir CHARLES METCALFE.

I CONCUR in the proposed arrangement, of which the details have been prepared by Mr. Bayley and the secretary in the Territorial department; although I regret that the intended reform is not to be more complete.

I concur, of course, in the abolition of Boards, in the substitution of commissioners, in the extension of the same changes to the Lower Provinces, and in the discontinuance of the offices of superintendents of police; all these being measures which I have myself repeatedly advocated.

But I regret the continued separation of the offices of judge, magistrate, and collector, the limitation of judicial powers of the commissioners to criminal trials, and all other parts of the old and new system which tend to produce disunion in the administration of our rule; conceiving that this disunion gives birth to discord and unnecessary litigation, with much injury, oppression, and unhappiness among the people.

The best form of government, with a view to the welfare of the natives of India in their present state, I believe, to be that which is most simple, and most free from artificial institutions.

The best form of government, with a view to the maintenance of British dominion in India, I believe to be that which is most conducive to an union of powers, and most free from the elements of collision and counteraction.

Such a form of government is also most consistent with economical management in our administration civil and military, the expense of which, both branches included, threatens, under the existing system, to overwhelm the Government, and cause the loss of the country.

If, therefore, I had the power to modify our existing institutions according to my own notions, I should propose as follows:

Our territory should be arranged in districts of suitable size.

One European civil functionary should superintend each district, exercising all the local powers of judicature, police, and revenue, in all its branches; having under him native officers subject entirely to his orders. The judicial business especially should be conducted in native courts, their proceedings being subject to the revision and correction of the European superintendent. Native juries should be used whenever it might be practicable, for the settlement of disputes. Junior civil servants might be employed in districts, not as indispensable parts of the establishments, but to assist the superintendent as he might direct, and thus acquire a knowledge of the duties which at a subsequent period they would themselves have to perform.

Above the superintendents of districts there should be commissioners of divisions, each division containing as many districts as might be proper, who should exercise the higher powers in all branches of administration. The district superintendents should be entirely under the orders of the commissioner of their division, who should repeatedly visit every part of the territory under his control; directing, and revising, and correcting the proceedings of the superintendents.

Junior civil servants might be attached to the commissioners as secretaries or assistants, to aid them in details, and acquire a knowledge of their own future duties.

The commissioners should be under the immediate authority of a Board of Control, established at the Presidency, consisting of a sufficient number of the best officers under the Government; to which Board all the reports of the commissioners should be addressed, and to its revision and correction all their proceedings in all departments should be subject. Members might be deputed from this Board to investigate more closely the conduct of commissioners, whenever there should seem to be reason for such a measure.

The Board should communicate directly with Government, reporting whatever might require orders or be proper for information; and over the Board the Government should exercise authority in all branches of administration, including even the revising, correcting, and altering the judicial decisions, whenever it might deem its interference necessary from good and sufficient cause. For I contend, that in our rule over India, with reference to

to the present condition of its inhabitants, the exclusion of the Government from the exercise of the highest judicial functions is unintelligible to our native subjects, and produces no good effect whatever; but is calculated to bring the Government into contempt, to deprive it of the power of rectifying wrong, and to sacrifice the public revenue through the possible ignorance or caprice of individuals, deciding finally on their own arbitrary opinions, without a competent knowledge of their subject, and without any well-digested code of laws for their guidance. I mean no disrespect to the many excellent officers in the Judicial department, but I must maintain, that the power granted to them under the present system of alienating the public revenue for ever at their own discretion, with scarcely any law to check them, is what they ought not to possess, free from the control and final orders of the Government, there being no reason whatever why the members of the Government should be more likely than other individuals to decide unjustly.

The outline, then, of the scheme which I should think best adapted for the government of the native subjects of British India, in its present state, consists of the following particulars:—Native functionaries, in the first instance, in all departments; European superintendents over them; commissioners over the superintendents; a Board over the commissioners, and the Government above all.

Every functionary, from the lowest to the highest, ought to strive to make the administration of our Government beneficial and paternal; much, or rather most, would depend on superintendents of districts; and the happiness of the people would be greatly influenced by the degree of benevolence and affection felt by these officers towards them.

It is not necessary to trouble the Government with further details of the scheme above described, or with the arguments which might be adduced in its support. I am well aware that parts of it are opposed to received opinions prevalent in India as well as in Europe, and that, therefore, it is not likely to be adopted. But in recording my concurrence in very considerable alteration of the existing mode of provincial administration, I have thought it right, at the same time, to show the principles by which that concurrence is influenced.

It does not appear to me to be requisite to enter on any minute examination of the details of the plan prepared by Mr. Bayley and the secretary in the Territorial department.

With reference, however, to the Delhi territory, I venture from local experience to remark, that one commissioner under the resident will be ample for the control of the five districts of that territory; that there will be no advantage in annexing the northern or Panéput district, as proposed in the plan, to the circle on the opposite side of the Jumna; and that it will be preferable to keep the whole of the Delhi territory under the same direction, and to avoid mixing up any part of it with other districts, under a different form of local administration.

It further occurs to me, that there is no obvious utility in appointing two commissioners to a division, when they are to act separately in separate portions of that division. It would seem to be more advisable to make each separate circle a division, and to appoint a separate commissioner; the advantage of two commissioners being at the same station, for the purpose of communication and consultation, does not strike me as nearly equal to that of each commissioner residing within his own circle; for instance, the Furruckabad commissioner ought not to reside at Agra, nor the Agra commissioner at Furruckabad; the Bareilly commissioner ought not to reside at Moradabad, nor the Moradabad commissioner at Bareilly. The commissioners, if disposed to communicate and consult together, can find no difficulty in meeting on their mutual borders. Some of the circles appear to me to be unnecessarily small; but if they be so, there ought to be at least this advantage, that the duty of the commissioners will be more efficiently performed in consequence.

I should like to see clearly stated the anticipated diminution of expense, immediate and prospective, which is to proceed from the proposed arrangement. It seems to me, that if the full salaries designed for the commissioners and other officers be granted in the first instance instance to all, not at present in the receipt of equal allowances, before corresponding reductions accrue from casualties and resignations, there will be little, if any, immediate diminution of expense.

(Signed) C. T. METCALFE.

The following Minutes in the Financial department were ordered to be recorded.

No. 5.—MINUTE of Sir CHARLES METCALFE.

For the last two years, the Board of Revenue in the Western provinces has not, I understand, once met to transact business as a Board.

The three members have been acting separately; one residing principally at Bareilly, one at Futtehghurh, and one in the Seharunpoor district.

The secretary, the surgeon, and the establishment generally of the Board, have been attached to the first member residing at Bareilly; and the correspondence, nominally of the Board with Government, has been carried on under his direction.

The defects of this arrangement seem undeniable, and it appears to be clearly desirable, either that the Board, if a Board there is to be, should meet and transact business together, or that the useless expense of establishments designed to aid a Board, which has virtually ceased to exist, should be reduced.

I am inclined, for my own part, to prefer the latter course, both because the reduction of expense is of itself a very essential benefit under existing circumstances, and because I am not of opinion that the business of the Board will be better done by the congregating of the members, or so well, as by their separate employment in distinct divisions of territory.

I therefore beg leave to propose, for the consideration of the Honourable the Governor-general and the Board of Government,—

First. That the Board of Revenue in the Western provinces be abolished.

Second. That the three members be nominated Commissioners of Revenue in their respective divisions, with the powers of a Board generally, but excepting such as it may be expedient to withhold.

Third. That the offices of secretary and surgeon to the Board, and all other establishments attached to the Board, be abolished; an establishment being reserved for the present first member, similar to that which is allowed to the second and third members respectively.

It may be here remarked, although I do not at present submit it as a proposition, that if any doubt exist as to the competence of the courts of circuit to perform the duties of superintendents of police, in the event of our dispensing with the latter, the Commissioners of Revenue may be appointed also commissioners of police.

(Signed) C. T. METCALFE.

No. 6.—MINUTE of Mr. W. B. BAYLEY.

In his Minute of the 5th instant, Sir C. Metcalfe has suggested that the Board of Revenue in the Western provinces be abolished, and that the three members of that Board be nominated Commissioners of Revenue in their respective jurisdictions.

I agree with Sir Charles Metcalfe in opinion, that the arrangement under which the business of the Western Board has for some time past been transacted is defective, and should not be continued.

The entire separation of the members of the Board from each other for so long a period is neither contemplated by the Regulations, nor by the instructions of Government. I am not, however, satisfied that the adoption of the specific measures suggested in Sir C. Metcalfe's Minute would promote the public interest, either as regards an immediate diminution of expense, or the improvement of the Revenue administration of the Western provinces.

It is supposed, by Sir C. Metcalfe, that the dissolution of the Board would admit of the abolition of the offices of secretary and surgeon to the Board, and of all other establishments attached to the Board, except that portion which would be allotted to the senior member, on a scale similar to that which is now allowed to the second and third members respectively.

But I imagine that whether the Revenue administration be superintended by three commissioners with separate jurisdictions, or by a Board as now constituted, the preparation of the proceedings, of translations, of periodical reports and statements, and the conduct of the current business, and other details, now executed by the secretary to the Board, his assistants and establishment, must still be provided for, and must demand the same degree of labour as heretofore.

Each commissioner will require the aid of a secretary or of an experienced assistant, to superintend the details above referred to; and it would, I conclude, be necessary to distribute, in fair proportions, between the three commissioners the whole of the subordinate establishments now maintained for the general duties of the Board at Bareilly.

If I am correct in this view of the case, the proposed arrangement would not be attended with any material reduction of expense; and I cannot anticipate any substantial benefit from the proposed change in other respects.

The success of our administration in every department depends much more on the qualifications, the personal character and disposition of the individuals employed in superintending and controlling others, than on the merits of the system, or forms under which that control is required to be exercised.

If Government could place full reliance on the judgment, knowledge, zeal, and conciliatory disposition of each individual member of our Boards or superior Courts, I for one should cheerfully concur in the expediency of intrusting to each of those members undivided authority and control over a defined tract of country, in preference to the system now in force.

But looking to the state of the service, and to the individuals of whom our Boards and Courts are now composed, I think it safer and better, as a general rule, to restrict the power to be exercised by one individual within the limits now prescribed.

Exceptions to such a general rule, founded on special local considerations, or on the confidence reposed by Government in the character and peculiar qualifications of an individual officer, may be expedient; and in what I have above said, I do not wish to be understood as adverse to alterations clearly beneficial; but I think we should, on general principles, avoid sweeping and general changes in our system of administration, and in our laws, unless they hold out a clear and a distinct prospect of practical advantage.

Territorial Department, the 10th Dec. 1828.

No. 7.—MINUTE of Mr. SWINTON.

The inability of the Western Board, as a deliberative body, is apparent, from the fact stated in Sir Charles Metcalfe's Minute, that the several members of that Board have not for the last two years, transacted business together; but this fact appears to me to prove, prove, rather that the members are not disposed to act together, than that benefit would be derived from dissolving the Board, and making each member independent in his respective division.

The practical objections to the proposed change are so distinctly pointed out by the Governor-General in his Minute of the 9th instant, that I have only to express my entire concurrence in the view of the question taken by Mr. Bayley; with him I apprehend that the change of plan would not be attended with any considerable saving of expense; while, on general principles, it appears to me the system now in operation, of vesting the general management and control in two or more members of a Board or Court, as a collective and deliberative body, is calculated to provide against many evils and inconveniences which might be experienced, constituted as the civil service is, were one individual to be intrusted with these powers; the case might be different if the nomination to such high and responsible offices was confined to the ablest and most intelligent members of the service, without regard to seniority; but such system of selection neither exists at present to the extent here contemplated, nor could it be put in practice without creating much jealous discontent and ill-will, and probably involving in its consequences more evil than good.

With regard to the special case under consideration, a more natural remedy for the acknowledged inefficiency of the Board of Revenue in the Western provinces as a deliberative body, would be either to select less discordant materials, or to require that the existing members should meet once or oftener every year at the principal station of Bareilly, for the transaction of business. But this I am fully aware is more easy to propose than to execute.

It may perhaps be thought expedient, before any final decision is taken, to request the secretary to furnish a statement, showing the actual saving of expense which would result from the adoption of Sir C. Metcalfe's suggestion.

No. 8.—MEMORANDUM by Mr. HOLT MACKENZIE.

It appearing to be desirable to push on the settlement in places that present a certain prospect of a large increase of revenue, with the utmost rapidity that is consistent with the resolution of Government not to expose its subjects to the old auction system, I beg leave again to bring to notice the circumstances of the districts of Goruckpore and Allahabad.

2. The former is distinguished from all the other ceded districts, by the circumstance that the present assessment has been continued merely from year to year. A new settlement, therefore, concluded before the month of Jith (or June) next, may have effect in the ensuing season. It is also, I believe, distinguished by general lightness of assessment. It is said to contain a great multitude of tenures held free without a shadow of right, and it is understood that there is much wrong to be redressed, arising out of the Revenue sales, which were unfortunately so often had recourse to in former times, nominally for the realization of the Government Revenue, too frequently as a ready means of usurpation by our native servants.

3. In the few villages of which detailed settlements were submitted by the late collector, an increase of 2,416 rupees on the jumma of 4,999 rupees was obtained, although great advantages were proposed for the Malgoozar; many villages, indeed, which were nearly waste, or stated to be so at the last settlement, are now well cultivated. The present collector is of opinion, that in the Huzoor, Tulseel, assessed at 2,25,000 rupees, an increase of 50,000 rupees might be added to the rent-roll with facility. In one pergunnah belonging to it, paying to Government 28,000, the collections made from the cultivators are are estimated at 80,000 rupees. In several of the other divisions, also, Mr. Armstrong anticipates with confidence a considerable increase,* which there seems reason to think may be obtained not only without distress, but with much advantage to the general body of the agricultural community; for the existing assessment presses very unequally. Of the Raj of Sitassee, the Mofussil rental is estimated at 76,000 rupees, with a Government jumma of 31,000. In pergunnah Amaha, which the collector considers to be adequately assessed, the Government demand is stated by the Revenue surveyor to average only 14½ annas for the acre of cultivated land, being equivalent to 3½ annas in the local begah. On the total area surveyed, the average is eight annas and twelve pice per acre; an inference may thence be drawn, that Mr. Armstrong's views are generally moderate. At the same time, the results of the survey lead one to conclude, that very great inequalities of assessment prevail in the pergunnah in question, and they satisfactorily demonstrate that the records to which our officers have heretofore referred for the contents of the several villages are utterly and extravagantly false: the quantity of land held free of assessment in Goruckpore is stated at 600,000 begahs.

4. In this district the villages are very numerous, being more than 11,000. The average extent of those which have been surveyed appears to be less than 180 acres. The settlement of boundary disputes is likely therefore to be troublesome, and if not settled until a permanent settlement or long leases shall give to the zemindars in rent free tenancy every acre of land they can usurp from the neighbours, it is impossible to calculate the amount of lying, litigation, and violence that will ensue. Already indeed, chiefly, I believe, from the defects of our Revenue arrangements, the Goruckpore court is overwhelmed with suits. In other respects, I do not think the settlement ought to present any serious difficulties, if the officers employed understand what they are about, and are able to communicate freely with the people, and really to command their subordinates; for the soil and crops do not appear to present any very great varieties. The tenures, also, will apparently be found to comprise few varieties. In the excess of the collections hitherto made by the Malgoozars, there is a large fund out of which Government may richly afford such advantages to the cultivators, in respect to rates, as would soon probably obviate any unpopularity incident to the inquisition, as would fix them in comfort to their fields, and lead rapidly to further improvement. With the people in our favour, every thing will be easy. In villages of so small a size, I should not expect to find that entanglement of rights which often occurs where the properties of several hundred land-owners are scattered in patches over many thousand acres; and the records, though more numerous, will be proportionately simple.†

5. But of course every thing will be obscure and embarrassed if the European officers commence operations on a large scale, without first having thoroughly mastered details. In such a district, the native officers and most of the Sudder Malgoozars must, from the nature of things, be very averse to a survey strictly superintended. If the collector comes to know the country and the people, as Mr. Wilkinson, for instance, does those of Khoodah, and if the cultivators get assured tenures on easy rates, there will be an end of the power which those men now exercise. They will consequently use their best efforts to thwart openly or covertly; then if our views be vague and indistinct, they have only to throw a little dust in our eyes to cast us altogether into darkness, and they can have little difficulty in alienating the people from us, if we constitute them the only medium of our intercourse.

6. In giving the collector assistants therefore, Government ought, I think, specifically to

• Sullimpoor Majbowlee	30,000
• Butumpoor Bansee	1,30,000

It is highly suggestive to go over the fields of a single such village, with the record of the survey and cases combined, and then to reflect on our rates for dividing landed property, and on the operation of decrees of court, relative to the rights of co-proprietors (especially where there would be a better term).

to press upon him and upon the Board the indispensable necessity of training those assistants in a proper manner. That a knowledge of the people and their concerns may be acquired, as a Revenue and Judicial officer in an unsettled district should acquire it, the most minute details must be mastered. They are to be completely mastered only by going thoroughly into individual cases, examining link by link, and wheel by wheel, as found actually at work, the whole of the moral mechanism that binds the communities together, or serves to regulate or restrain the action of individual interests. This being done in a few instances, it will no longer be difficult to watch the workings of a thousand similar or analogous machines. The disorders to which they are subject will be easily understood and readily remedied; the varieties of scheme which may be subsequently presented will be promptly recognized; and the blunders by which we must constantly be liable to derange what we fancy we are directing, will, it may be hoped, be avoided.

7. It is in this way that knowledge is acquired in regard to every thing else, whether we look to the moral or physical world. The official education of the young civilian is too generally pursued on a different plan. He is cast within the four walls of a cutcherry, to take his share in the general government of an extensive district, before he really knows the circumstances of a single individual it contains; can we wonder if he finds or creates a chaos? He is vested in early youth with the power of the whip and the gao; he is associated with the very worst part of the people; he is beset with the lying and litigation of wretches, who in his ignorance must find the strongest temptation to deceit: can we expect he should generally acquire the knowledge, or the habits, or the feelings that should belong to the governor of an extensive district?

8. It would, I think, be a great improvement, if collectors' assistants in the Western provinces, where every one should begin his career as assistant to a collector, were at first employed in investigating the circumstances of a single village, the sphere of their inquiries and authority being gradually extended with increase of knowledge; they should themselves see the census made and the fields measured; they should translate with their own hands all the papers, and they should daily seek the advice and instruction of the collector (half an hour after breakfast would be sufficient), till they were thoroughly masters of the most minute particular relative to the settlement and collection of the revenue. The nearest village to the sudder station of those in which the rents might be realized directly from the cultivators should be selected; and I can scarcely imagine a pleasanter or more instructive employment for a young man than to be thus engaged in managing an estate on the principle of rendering the tenants comfortable, as a preparation for the more difficult duty of governing a district so as to make the people happy. No one should be made a collector of an unsettled district, in regard to whose power of communicating freely with the people, and of reading readily all the records he has to sift and authenticate, there may exist any doubt.

9. It is quite a mistake, I conceive, to imagine that there is any serious difficulty in work of making settlements, when confined to villages which the collector can visit, or to suppose that a collector, knowing his business, need to go into an endless detail. He, indeed, who looks for certainty in what nature has left uncertain, and who does not know where to look for truth, even when before him, may be led into endless toil, and may continue to the end of time groping his way amidst the confusion he will create. Hence we are scared with objections touching the varieties of soils and seasons, as if it were our object to wring his last penny from the peasant. Hence even in matters of account, in which falsification is mathematically impossible, and where the work of a 15 rupee mutasiddee is as good or better than that of a 50,000 rupee secretary, we hear of the difficulty of check, and of the vast labour of framing a simple ledger or two. Hence mainly the prejudice against Ryotwar settlement; and it must constantly be borne in mind that the work is one in which no man, however otherwise qualified, can completely succeed, who is impatient of the details necessary to accuracy. But the details once mastered, the labour of the European officer will be comparatively light; he will have only the duty of a direction direction and control, and the settlement of disputes: they will be few which the people do not settle for themselves. He will compel his Umlah to work instead of slaving at their dictation. The difficulty of assessing land accurately and equally is admitted; but it is a difficulty that will diminish with every day's experience; and if moderation be the ruling principle (I use this term throughout for moderation towards the bulk of the people), with a liberal consideration for the claims of those who have long enjoyed the advantage of large profits, though by a questionable title, considerable inequalities will not much signify; and if we can gain the confidence and co-operation of the people, which may, I hope, be gained by our acts—professions are worse than useless—the course will be smooth.

10. Experience seems to have shown, that questions of private right are settled with facility, when we thus carry justice into the midst of the people, and deal with things as they are found actually existing. What is obvious, a single glance makes known; what is notorious, the boldest liar will scarcely deny, if confronted with a crowd ready to expose him. Every deserted site, the demarcation of every field, every tank, or well, or grove, or temple, tells its own story; all parts of the village institution combine, when seen in one view, to evidence the truth. In most cases falsehood must be contradictory. Nay, the very dispositions of the people seem in most places to change for the better, when kindly and fairly treated, listened to, and understood. They show that they are not less desirous than the most privileged communities of seeing justice done, that they have not less regard for the sentiments of their fellows, and that their reputed disregard for truth is to be traced to causes common to all ignorant men, when required to answer the inquiries of the ignorant.

11. In our cutcherries every thing has to be investigated; truth and falsehood may be spoken with the same composure, for they will be received with the same gravity. Misconceptions are unavoidable. Misrepresentation is the business of hired witnesses. Ignorance is the necessary condition of those whom they address. Is it wonderful if to elicit truth be difficult? How many hours of laborious examination would be required to extract from the evidence of my hurkurahs the condition of the room I sit in, the position of the different articles of furniture, and the arrangement or disarrangement of the various boxes, and books and papers! There would be no desire to deceive, yet innumerable contradictions would occur, and after the toil of a long investigation, the mind would arrive at a conception infinitely less accurate and complete than the eye view of a single minute would afford. It is the same with much that has to be recorded relative to a village. I lay this stress upon the matter, because I believe nothing has stood so much in the way of the plan of detailed settlement as the apprehensions of difficulties, which a Madras or Delhi man would laugh at, and which in truth have no solid foundation; and because if those apprehensions were well founded, we should find comparatively few men capable of doing what is desired; whereas my persuasion is, that we need care for little but plain good sense, good temper, and integrity, and the disposition to prosecute the work with an honest desire of doing justice to the people and to Government. The command of language and the technical knowledge necessary, will come rapidly with practice, if the practice be of the right sort.

12. I have no apprehension, therefore, of any difficulty in finding an abundant supply of fit instruments among the young men of the civil service, if they are only put into the right way. The duty will soon, I trust, come to be a popular one, if care be taken that those who labour to discharge it do not suffer in their prospects. For intrinsically there are few things that can gratify more than the consciousness of having given that comfort and security to a number of our fellow men, which a good settlement ought to give.

13. With the above views, it appears to me desirable that three intelligent officers should be appointed to superintend the six tahsildars of Goruckpore, as assistants or deputy collectors; and one to aid the collector in the settlement of the Huzoor tahseel. In Allahabad,

Allahabad, also, some special arrangement of the kind would seem to be desirable. Of the Revenue affairs of this district, the latest report is that which I received from Mr. Dunsmure, in reply to a circular sent to all the collectors of the Western provinces, which is hereunto annexed.

14. As far as concerns the mere realization of the Government jumma, the result is sufficiently satisfactory; but if it be any part of the duty of Revenue officers to see that the amount realized for the public service bears a due proportion to the sums levied from the community, the settlement so candidly made by Mr. Dunsmure seems to evince the existence of serious defects in the administration of the district. The plan of deputing sezawals to collect from a portion of the cultivators the revenue to which all should contribute, ought surely to be discontinued. It is monstrous thus to leave the malgoozars in the enjoyment of large profits, and to relieve them from the duties and responsibility of Revenue engagers. If arrears accrue, there can be no difficulty in applying advantageously for Government and the people the rule contained in Section iv. Regulation IX. 1825. But further, it is now more than five years since Regulation VII. 1822 was published; yet little has been done towards its execution in Allahabad. Now, throughout the greatest part of the district, a system of money collections by middle men prevails. On both sides the Ganges it touches on Benares, where the produce of the different crops in different kinds of soil, and the rents collected from the cultivators, may be ascertained with comparative ease. The revision of the assessment might consequently, I conceive, be made with great facility and promptitude, though the villages are of small extent and proportionally numerous.

15. Here, as elsewhere, the native officers may naturally be expected to raise up many artificial difficulties. They certainly have had a rich field for those illicit gains which constitute, doubtless, the chief motive of their hitherto successful efforts at mystification.

16. From Mr. Dunsmure's Report, it will be seen that that gentleman estimates the profits of the malgoozars of pergunnah Khymgurh, at Rs. 2,13,000, in a jumma of about 3,37,000 rupees; and for the pergunnah Bura, paying Government only Rs. 1,05,000, a Mocudumee settlement has actually been concluded on behalf of, and for the benefit of the restored malgoozar, with a jumma of Rs. 2,23,000, the Mofussil rental of the rajah of Benares for 1233 having been Rs. 2,38,000. The last-mentioned mehal was, it appears, exempted from the general rule for the extension of leases in the ceded provinces, under the discretion specifically reserved to the Boards and collectors, in Clause 4, Section ii. of Regulation II. 1826. It is consequently now open to settlement.

17. There appear to be many other estates, of which the Government jumma is still more disproportionate to the sums demanded from the cultivators; and though of course the calculations cannot, from their nature, pretend to a minute accuracy, they seem to leave no doubt of the fact, that the district in question presents a very large fund, applicable to the objects of improving the public finances, and ameliorating the condition of the people. Every thing I saw and learnt in passing through the district was calculated to confirm the persuasion, that the profits which accrue to the Government engagers are excessive; and if I should venture to form any judgment on such imperfect grounds, I should be disposed to conclude that the rates of rent levied from the cultivators are not generally burthensome. In some cases possibly it may be necessary to allow certain abatement; for it is the misery of our past management, that in proportion as the wealthy are favoured, the poor are oppressed. But on the whole I consider it certain, that by a settlement made on the principles prescribed in Regulation VII. 1822, we may obtain a very considerable increase of Revenue, and at the same time confer a great blessing on the body of the agricultural community. The leases have generally to run to the expiration of the year 1239, until which time the Government jumma cannot be altered. But no time need be lost in ascertaining and securing the rights of the people; and we may probably find in the resumption of illicit alienations the means of adding, during the progress of the settlement, no inconsiderable sum to the Government rental.

18. The tehsuldars are all spoken of by Mr. Dunsmure in the highest terms; when they are satisfied, therefore, that the Government is serious in desiring to have a detailed settlement effected, we may expect from them good assistance in carrying the measure into effect; and moderation as to the rates of assessment (I mean of course in the demand made, or allowed to be made, from the industrious cultivator) will probably secure for us the co-operation of the people. That gained, our collectors, if really fit for their situations, will become comparatively independent of all excepting mere mechanical aid, which may be easily and cheaply procured. They will then be in truth, and not in name only, the masters of their offices and heads of their districts; the difficulties which now beset them will speedily disappear, and the work of settlement-making will become equally easy of execution, and gratifying in its results. But the power of conversing familiarly with the people, and of reading readily all Persian papers, at least (accounts not presented to the eye can never convey to the mind any clear conception), must be insisted upon; and before attempting to control others, the European officer must himself be thoroughly master of every the minutest detail of the work he requires from them.

19. With proper assistance, the collector might, I should conceive, effect the settlement of the whole district in five or six years, if we may judge of its extent from the recorded rucba.

20. It contains, it will be seen, about 5,000 villages, comprising about 23,00,000 of begahs. To complete the investigation and record of details for this extent of country, in the manner accomplished by Mr. Fane and Mr. Fraser, would require, I imagine, about eighty-four parties, or about seventeen, if we allow five years for the work.

21. The peshkar of the Huzoor tehseel, which includes a collection of nearly 9½ lacs, cannot, I should suppose, have any time for superintending settlement proceedings. It would probably be advantageous to break down that department into several distinct tehseeldaries. The talookas, indeed, of Kyragurb and Bara alone exceed in the number of their villages and amount of revenue most of the tracts that have been placed under separate European officers. To this division of the collectorship, nine out of seventeen parties would properly belong, eight being assessed to the other divisions; of these the tehseeldars could easily, I conceive, superintend the work, if, as I presume, they deserve the character which Mr. Dunsmure gives them. The Handya pergunnah, if not more extensive than is stated, might indeed be settled almost in two years by a single party; and the tehseeldar of that place was one of the few I saw, who, when pressed with particulars, maintained the facility with which he could ascertain all we desire to know, under any responsibility that might be thought proper. The jumma of the pergunnah, amounting to about two rupees per begah on the recorded rucba, while the aggregate of the district yields less than fourteen annas, it is not likely that any large increase is in this case to be looked for; but the adjustment of private rights and the other benefits to the people, which will, it is hoped, result from a revision of the settlement, are not less important objects of the collector's care.

22. If the settlement is to be made in the course of five or six years, the collector must, I apprehend, have the aid of several good assistants or deputies, who, under his general direction, could apply the checks which the proceedings of the native officers will require, and finally complete the necessary local arrangements. Two officers would find ample employment in the Doab and the pergunnahs; and tracts of country to the north and south would seem naturally to require separate superintendence.

23. Considering the importance of the work, both to Government and to the people, I would again venture to submit the expediency of withdrawing from the judicial line some of the most promising of the young men who hold, or are about to obtain, the situation of register, and of appointing them assistant or deputy collectors, with suitable allowances. During the heats and the rains they should reside at the sudder station of the zillah; and even when out in their districts, they should be guided by such instructions, official or unofficial, as they may receive from the collector, in the manner prescribed for the sub-collectors of Bundelcund.

24. After going thoroughly into the detail of a few villages, they will, I venture to affirm, have acquired more real experience than is to be gained by half a century of kutcherry work; and though I of course look immediately to the advantage of the Revenue branch, the Judicial administration will ultimately gain no less importantly. I annex a list, from which it will be easy to make a selection.

25. In conclusion, I would beg permission to suggest, whether it would not be advisable to fix Mr. Dunsmure at Allahabad, where he has now been acting as collector since December 1825; he might remain, with the allowances drawn by him as collector of Bundelcund (Rs. 2,383) as joint collector, even supposing Mr. Fane to return. There would be abundant work for both, so long as the settlement is in progress; and before it is completed, should Mr. Fane continue so long at Allahabad, there will be a thousand opportunities of otherwise providing for Mr. Dunsmure. We should thus derive all the benefit of his experience in the district which he has managed for three years, and get rid of the uncertainty and inconvenience of an acting appointment.

(E.)

LETTER from JOHN DUNSMURE, Esq. Acting Collector at Allahabad, to HOLT MACKENZIE, Esq. Secretary to the Government.

Sir:

16th February 1828.

I HAVE the honour to submit the Statement called for in your Letters of the 26th of November and 3d of January last.

2. You will observe that the outstanding balances in this district for the five past years amount to Rs. 5,409. 12. 10. In the past Fusly year 1234, there was only a small balance of Rs. 462. 12. 15. on Rs. 1,80,750. 12. 10. 1. the assessed jumma; and this would have been realized had it been possible; but it is on account of three estates bordering on the Oude territory, which are under Khaum management, the assets of which I have satisfactorily ascertained are not equal to the Government demand. These estates have lately been measured, and it is my intention to proceed to a resettlement of them at an early period. The expenses of Mofussil establishment vary from Rs. 1. 1. 2. 2. to Rs. 4. 2. 9. 3. per cent. on the jumma of each division. The annual amount chargeable to the malgoozars for Talubana and Shahenggee averages, on the three past years, from 5 as. 2 g. to 13 as. 18 g. 2 c. per cent. on the total amount of collections from each tehsuldaree.

3. There are certain estates in each division, to which I find it absolutely necessary to depute sezawals, for the purpose of securing the public demand; but this measure is not called for from any want of assets; on the contrary, I know, from access to the village accounts, that the assets in several of them bear a twofold proportion to the Government jumma. This proceeding is rendered necessary, from the refractory conduct of the zemindars, and the dissensions which exist amongst them. In the Husoor tehseel department, there are nineteen estates assessed with a jumma of Rs. 1,32,507. 13. 2. 3.; in the Secundra tehseeldaree, ten estates assessed at Rs. 47,195; in the Kurrah division, twenty-five estates assessed at Rs. 49,442; and in Handyah tehseeldaree, nineteen estates assessed assessed at Rs. 29,092. 2. 2; to which, at the commencement of each year, I judge it necessary to depute sezawals, for the purpose of making the collections, without which the Government dues would be exposed to much risk. In these instances, however, if the zemindars give security for the payment of the public demand, the attachment is immediately withdrawn. The expense attendant on the deputation sezawals in no one instance exceeds five per cent. on the jumma of the estate; and I make it a special point of my duty to render the charge on this head as light as possible. On these occasions the sezawals call upon the zemindars to give assignments, jumagogues, as they are termed, on their tenants, and they accordingly make over a list of such ryots whose rents will cover the Government demand; and the latter execute engagements to pay the same to the sezawal instead of to the zemindars. This system is in full accordance with ancient custom, and the zemindars express no unwillingness to enter into these jumagogues.

4. The Government collections from this district are, with one exception, made in nine kists, Koor, Catick, Aughun, Poos, Maug, Phaugun, Cheyt, Bysack, and Jeit. The exception is the pergunnah of Handyah, where the revenue, as under the Newaib Vizier's government, is paid in eight kists of two annas each, ending with Bysack. The kists vary in all pergunnahs, it having been found necessary to adjust them, with advertence to the extent of the Khuruf and Rubbeco lands. The Aughun and Cheit kists are the heaviest, the former being $2\frac{1}{2}$ annas and three annas, and the latter two and three annas; the other kists are, generally speaking, $1\frac{1}{2}$ anna each. The zemindars make their collections from the ryots in eight kists, commencing in Bhandoon; but the first requisition made by them is more in the form of an intimation than a demand. Their regular kists, as entered in the village account, are from Koor to Bysack. The Government demand is nearly, I may say exactly, simultaneous with that of the zemindars from their ryots, commencing from the 15th, or Amouse, as it is designated, of Koor.

5. The alienations and transfers of landed property have not, with the exception of those estates which have come under the cognizance of the Mofussil Special Commission, been very numerous. During the last five years it affords me much gratification to report, that not a single estate, or the portion of any one, has been sold for arrears of revenue; indeed the last estate sold on this account was so far back as the Fusly year 1227; within the same period, two estates and four puttees only, assessed at Rs. 1,137 per annum, have been sold in satisfaction of decrees of court. During the last five years, five estates have been transferred by mortgage, the assessed jumma of which is Rs. 5,028, and $53\frac{1}{2}$ puttees. Five estates, assessed at Rs. 7886. 12. 13. and 70 puttees, have been transferred by private sale; but there is generally in these cases an understanding between the parties, that the purchase is to be relinquished in ten or fifteen years, though this agreement does not appear upon the record. Two estates, assessed at Rs. 4,513, and two puttees, have been transferred by gift; and sixteen estates, assessed at Rs. 14,206. 2. 10. have been transferred under precepts received from the zillah court. The number of estates restored to the former zemindars under decrees passed by the Mofussil Special Commission is ninety-six, assessed with a jumma of Rs. 2,868. 26. 7. 14. The total amount of jumma assessed on the property transferred within the last five years, under the orders of the court and collector, is Rs. 32,770 15. 3. gunds.

6. I further beg to state, that only in two instances during the last five years has it been found necessary to proceed to the distraint and sale of personal property for the realization of the Government Revenue. The number of estates resigned and taken under Khaum management from 1230 to 1233 was four, assessed with a jumma of Rs. 4,345, and of these the resignation of one was recalled from 1234 Fusly. Of the total sum of Rs. 5,409. 12. 10. outstanding in this district on account of balances for the past five years, the sum of Rs. 4,843. 1. is due from the above Khaum estates, which are unquestionably over-assessed, and which sum may therefore be said to be a mere nominal balance, balance, leaving a real balance of Rs. 566. 11. 10. outstanding from 1230 to 1234 Fusly, which I hope to realize ere long. The total expense of Mofussil establishment is Rs. 43,164 per annum, which, with reference to the rent-roll of the district, Rs. 1,80,750. 12. 10. 1. would appear to be about Rs. 2. 4. 18. 1. per cent.

7. I shall now proceed to offer a few remarks on the existing assessment of this district, commencing with the Huzoor tehsul department. The pergunnah of Kyroghur first claims attention from its extent and capabilities. It is divided into six talookas, comprising 811 villages, and pays a revenue to Government of Rs. 3,36,893. 13 as.; with the exception of two estates, the remainder of the pergunnah appertains exclusively to Loll Roodun Pertaub Sing. From papers and accounts which have been given in to me, I have reason to believe that the receipts of the zemindar do not fall short of Rs. 5,50,000. The adjoining pergunnah of Banah, assessed with a jumma of Rs. 1,05,101, has lately been restored to the former zemindar, by name Juggut Raje, who is the sole proprietor under a decree passed by the Mofussil Special Commission. It was sold at the end of 1802, and purchased by the rajah of Benares for Rs. 93,000. The proprietor, Juggut Raje, and his son Chutturput, being both incompetent to manage this fine zemindaree, I solicited and obtained the permission of Government to take charge of the pergunnah in their behalf, and made a settlement of it with the several village mocuddums from the current Fusly year, maintaining, with some exceptions, the leases of the three past years. The amount of the rajah's settlement in 1233 was Rs. 2,38,000; the settlement I have concluded with the village mocuddums amounts to Rs. 2,22,931. I commenced measuring this pergunnah last year; it comprises 296 villages, 46 chucks, and eight muzzahs.

8. In the four other pergunnahs which appertain to the Huzoor tehsul, there are, I think, nineteen estates, paying Rs. 34,799, which may be said to be unequally assessed, though I am not prepared to state that the jumma is oppressive, for I do not think it is so in any one instance. But adverting to the assessments and assets of some other estates in these pergunnahs, the comparative inequality of the jummas is certainly very striking; for instance, in the pergunnah of Arail there is a talooka called Koolmay, assessed at Rs. 35,000, which is known to yield upwards of 60,000. The talooka of Punassa, also assessed at Rs. 25,295, does not yield less than Rs. 55,000. These two large talookahs have just been measured preparatory to a re-settlement, and the village accounts seem fully to establish the above-mentioned facts. Again, in the same pergunnah the jumma of talooka Iradut grunge is Rs. 28,800, supposed assets 64,000; talooka Poorma, which pays Rs. 16,777, is stated to yield 28,000; talooka Lohain, assessed at Rs. 12,831, has assets to the extent of 23,000; and the talooka of Kain, which pays a jumma of Rs. 11,440 is estimated to yield 22,000. These are the most striking instances of inequality in the pergunnah of Arail; but almost all the estates are very lightly assessed. The same may be observed in regard to the three other pergunnahs, Jhoosee, Chail, and Choukundhee.

9. In the Secundra tehsuldaree, there are eighteen estates in pergunnah Secundra, four in Meh, and four in Mirzapore Chouharee, assessed at Rs. 2,193, the jummas of which are high in comparison with the other estates, but generally speaking the assessment is pretty equal. In the Seraom division there are only six estates settled at Rs. 4,113, which may be said to be heavily assessed. But as in the Huzoor tehseel, there are some estates very lightly assessed; for instance, talookas Chupree, jumma 11,995, assets 22,000; Mendara, jumma 15,000, assets 27,000; Abdalpoor, jumma 12,800, assets 25,000; Poorubnara, jumma 10,500, assets 19,000; Serai Bhamp, jumma 12,815, assets 20,000 rupees.

10. The pergunnah of Handyah, which constitutes a separate tehseeldaree, was acquired by treaty from the Newaub vizier in 1224 Fusly, and, so far as I can judge, is equally and moderately assessed. It is a troublesome division, from the turbulent and refractory spirit which characterizes the zemindars, who are chiefly Rajpoots. The realization of the public revenue was tardy, and effected with considerable difficulty two years years ago ; but with the aid of an active, intelligent, and very respectable tehsildar, who is in charge of the pergunnah, I am happy to say that the division is now second to none in the punctuality with which the kists are collected.

11. In the Kurrah division there are twenty-four estates, settled at Rs. 15,299; which appear to me somewhat heavily assessed. Both the pergunnahs of Kurrah and Kerallee have acquired a very considerable increase of cultivation since the last settlement on 1220 Fusly, from large tracts of jungle land having been cleared. The estates generally in these two pergunnahs are inadequately assessed. The pergunnah of Atherban, which constitutes a neabut, and is attached to the Kurrah tehseeldaree, has not the same advantages: the land is of an inferior quality; added to which, a great many estates were sold previous to 1217 Fusly; and though the old zemindars have in many instances been reinstated by the Mofussil Special Commission, yet they are extremely poor, and some time must elapse before we see that improved state of things which characterizes the district at large.

12. I have to apologize for not having submitted this statement earlier, but some delay has taken place in receiving replies to references which I found it necessary to make on certain points.

312 APPENDIX TO REPORT FROM SELECT COMMITTEE.

(F.)

LETTER from JOHN DUNSMURE, Esq. Acting Collector of Allahabad, to HOLT MACKENZIE, Esq. Secretary to Government in the Territorial Department.

SIR :

5th March 1928.

I HAVE the honour to submit the Statement regarding the several Tehseeldars under my authority, agreeably to the form which accompanied your letter of the 4th ultimo.

2. It is to me no small pleasure to be able to record the very favourable opinion which I entertain of these several officers. The peishkar of the Huzoor tehsul, Bhowannee Pershaud, owes his elevation entirely to his merits, and a more zealous, active, and intelligent officer, I have never met with. The very creditable manner in which he manages his extensive and troublesome charge has frequently been brought under the notice of Government, and obtained its approbation. For nothing is this officer more distinguished than the ready and satisfactory way in which he adjusts differences amongst the zemindars; a most essential qualification in a tehseeldar. The next officer to be noticed is Rujub Ally, the tehseeldar of Secundra, Meh and Mirzapoor Chowhary. This individual was formerly nazcer in the collectorship, was afterwards nominated to the Kewaec, and subsequently to the Ghazee-pore tehseeldaree, where I found him when I took charge of this office. This last division, which is in the Futtehpore district, constituted a very easy charge indeed; and as it appeared to me that the services of Rujub Ullee might be beneficially employed in a more troublesome situation, I removed him to his present tehseeldaree, which, from bordering on the Oude territory, and being in some places quite intersected by it, requires an active officer for its superintendence. His predecessor, I discovered, was ignorant of the Persian language, and a most useless officer; like the peishkar of the Huzoor tehseel, he possesses great management with the zemindars, so much so, that in cases of importance, I have deputed him out of his tehseeldaree into another to adjust matters.

3. The tehseeldar of Sohraon and Newaubgunge, Mirza Kullub Hussein Khan, is a most respectable, well-educated, and I am sure I may add, upright officer. He was first appointed naib tehseeldar of pergunnah Keralce, in which situation he gave so much satisfaction, that I was happy in having it in my power to nominate him to a more extensive charge. Though not so experienced as the other tehseeldars, his zeal and activity render him not the less useful, and I feel confident that he will always merit the favourable opinion of those over him. Shah Abdool Bosset, the tehseeldar of Handyah, is descended from a highly respectable and once affluent family, in the town of Sahsaraon, district of Shahabad. He was originally attached to his present tehseeldaree, but subsequently removed to that of Ghazee-pore, and afterwards to the Futtehpore division, which used to be a troublesome one. On the separation of the Futtehpore district from this collectorship, Shah Abdool Bosset resigned his situation. About this time I was compelled to remove the then tehseeldar of pergunnah Handyah, by name Hinya Mull, from his office; this person had formerly been Abkarce darogha in the collectorship; bred up as a mohajun, his ideas embraced no wider scope than figures; added to which, I discovered that he was concerned in a kotee established in the city of Allahabad, which entirely engrossed his attention; as he moreover was not an honest man, I obtained the Board's permission to dismiss him, and to nominate Shah Abdool Bosset to be his successor. The manner in which he had formerly managed this most troublesome division determined me to re-appoint him, and I am happy to say that, by blending conciliation with firmness (a qualification most requisite in this pergunnah), he performs his duties just as I could desire, and his tehseeldaree is second to none for the punctuality with which the collections are made.

4. The tehseeldar of Kurrah, Ally Juma, is an officer of very considerable experience; he was formerly tehseeldar of Hutgaon, in the Futtehpore district; but as this was a very easy charge. I removed him to the Soraon division, which borders on the Oude territory.

He

He is a very active and intelligent officer, and gave me much satisfaction; and more recently, when commissioners were appointed to settle some long pending boundary disputes between the zemindar of this and the Oude territory, Ally Juma rendered himself very useful to the magistrate, who has expressed in very favourable terms the valuable assistance he received from him. The Kurrah tehseeldar becoming vacant, the salary of which is higher than that of Sohraon, I consider it my duty to nominate him to that division. The naib of Keralce, Shark Fuzzul Ally, is an officer who stands very high indeed in my opinion. If he is not very brilliant, he makes up for it by his honesty, a quality which every body of every class accord to him, and I believe most justly so. He was long employed as a sezawal, in the Kerabe pergunnah, and is well acquainted with the people, who will, I believe, find in him a character that is very rarely met with. The peishkar of the adjoining pergunnah of Atherbun is an old servant, and has risen from the ranks; he was formerly peishkar (but with no separate charge as at present) under the tehseeldar of Hutgaon, in the Futtehpoore division. The former peishkar attached to Atherbun not giving me satisfaction, I sent him to Hutgaon to be under the eye of a tehseeldar, and appointed Sheodial Sing to succeed him. With a little looking after, he makes an active officer, of which the pergunnah stands in need, for the zemindars are both poor and troublesome.

I have, &c.

LETTER from JAMES ARMSTRONG, Esq. Collector of Goruckpoor, to HOLT MACRAE, Esq. Secretary to the Government.

SIR :

2d April, 1818.

I HAVE the honour to acknowledge the receipt of your letter, under date the 26th November, requiring a statement for each of the divisions of this district, according to the form annexed thereto ; and in reply, beg to submit herewith the accompanying Statement in English.

2. It may be necessary to state that the amount of the land revenue of the district, as specified in the Towjee, is Rs.37,430. 11. 10. less than that exhibited in seventh column of the statement. The difference arises from the increase in the jumma of the estates settled under Regulation VII. of 1822, together with the additional revenue derivable from the late assessment of resumed and Towfeer lands, which are still pending the sanction of the Board ; without which, neither the increased jumma, nor the estates for the first time assessed, can be placed upon the public rent-roll.

3. In the size of the begah throughout the district, there is the greatest discrepancy, the begah of one pergunnah seldom corresponding with that of the adjoining one ; indeed in the same pergunnah the extent of the begah varies. In the past settlements, this was not taken into consideration by the canoongoes in furnishing dools, who regulated their estimates of the rucba by the puckha begah, without reference to the consuetudinary one of the pergunnah or tuppa ; and for the sake of uniformity, the same rule has been observed in preparing this Statement, which, as to the number of begahs in each pergunnah, is not deserving of much credit.

4. The assessed jumma of the Huzoor tehseel is very inadequate ; an increase of not less than forty or fifty thousand rupees might be added to the yearly demand, by a mere summary revision of the present assessment. I have lately had occasion to procure from the Mofussil officers a statement of the land in cultivation, and the rate of rent in pergunnah Gujpoor, in which the collections are estimated at 80,300 rupees, though only paying a yearly jumma to Government of 27,867. From the circumstance of the pergunnah having been for some years past under the jurisdiction of the Court of Wards, and the information derivable from a partial and unfinished survey of the pergunnah, preparatory to a detailed settlement, which was subsequently abandoned, I am enabled to assure you that the above statement is tolerably correct. From this inadequacy in the yearly jumma, we may fairly presume that many of the other pergunnahs within the division are susceptible of an increase to a less or an equal degree. A tuppah in Bhowapor has also undergone a measurement similar to that above alluded to, and with the same favourable result.

5. The pergunnah of Doorcapor is perhaps more equitably assessed than any other in this division ; but although there may be in it, as well as in many other pergunnahs in the district, some estates which pay an enhanced jumma, in comparison with the general rate of the Government demand throughout the district, there are very few the jumma of which can be considered excessive.

6. Not only the assessed jumma of this division, but every other in the district, with the exception of Amorha and Arungabad Nugger, is both unequally and inadequately appointed, as must be expected under the present assessment, which has remained, with a few exceptions, undisturbed for so long a period, and which was so hastily formed in 1224 Fs. The subsequent adjustment in 1229 Fs. was a mere renewal of the previous engagements. The inequality of the assessment, in one village paying a greater proportion tion of its produce to the ruling power than another, is owing to the greater advancement of one in cultivation since the last general settlement, and the false statement furnished by the native officers, who were themselves extensive landed proprietors, consequently deeply interested in under-rating the produce of all estates held by themselves or numerous connexions. The same causes are also applicable to the inadequacy of the assessment. In a district like this, still daily advancing in cultivation, with a vast proportion of uncultivated land in the majority of its pergunnahs, a settlement which has not been altered for so many years is naturally much below the moderate share of the produce of the land claimed by Government as public revenue.

7. The realization of the entire revenue of this division is not attended with much trouble to the Government officers, or with any general embarrassment or distress to the zemindars, by which I mean, attachment of property, personal imprisonment, &c. are seldom or ever resorted to. Very few landholders in Goruckpore ever think of paying their kists until required by the issue of a dustuk, which from time to time it is necessary to repeat with additional peons; a practice heretofore adopted instead of harsher measures. This is owing to the characteristic unwillingness of the people to voluntary payments, and not from inability; nor is this reluctance confined to this district; it appears to be very general, and to prevail to an equal extent in the provinces enjoying the advantages of a permanent settlement.

8. The assessment of the Amorha division is adequate; little or no increase can be expected in the amount of the jumma, in which there has been very little variation* since the cession. The trifling increase in the jumma of those estates, which have been revised under Regulation VII. of 1822, confirms the opinion of the adequacy of the assessment, which is further supported by its realization being attended with more difficulties than actually encountered in other divisions. They are not, however, of such a nature, or the balance at the close of the year of such a magnitude, as to make me suppose it excessive, or to cause either the alienation of lands, or the attachment of crops. To the injury occasionally caused by the overflowing of the Gogra river is to be ascribed a portion of the balances due from this pergunnah.

9. The next in succession in the statement is Selemppore Mujhowlee, which is very inadequately assessed, considering the known high rate of rent in the pergunnah, and having always been in an advanced state of cultivation. The jumma is not less than thirty thousand rupees deficient of the sum that might be fairly demanded on a re-adjustment of the settlement. It is situated on the borders of the Chupra district. In this and the Sidhooa Jubna division, the people are much better acquainted with our laws and regulations than the inhabitants in any other part of the district.

10. The division of Ruttunpoor Bandee is, of all others, the most inadequately assessed. Judging from the result of my predecessor's detailed revision of the settlement in eight tuppas of pergunnah Bansee, I may safely state, that the assessment of this division might be increased to two lacs of rupees. The former jumma of each tuppa has been more than doubled, after the most ample deductions. The Benaikpoor pergunnah is still very backward in cultivation; but Russoolpoor Ghose is similar to Bansee, with respect to the inadequacy of the yearly jumma. There is still much valuable land to be brought into cultivation before this division can be compared to the one last noticed in agricultural prosperity. The realization of the revenue is not attended with any difficulty, except from the extensive talookdars, who are not in this, or throughout the district district, so punctual in the payments of their instalments as the maliks of one or more villages.

11. The division of Ledhooa Jubna is also susceptible of a considerable increase in the amount of the present assessment. The soil is superior to any in the district, and the rate of rent per begah on a par with that of Selemore Mujhowlee; indeed the small pergunnah of Shajahanpoor is in every respect similar to the last named. The collection of the revenue is attended with no further difficulty than a careful vigilance on the part of the tuhseeldar in issuing dustuks for the kists as they become due.

12. In the Nugger Bustee division, cultivation has increased since the last settlement, consequently capable of a large increase in the amount of the present jumma, without any undue pressure on the agricultural community. The detailed revision of the settlement that took place in one of the tuppas of pergunnah Bustee, immediately after the promulgation of Regulation VII. of 1822, exhibits an increase on the demand not very much inferior to that of the Banske pergunnah.

13. Arungabad Nuggur joins Amorha, and is in every respect similar. These appear the only two extensive pergunnahs; certainly the only two divisions that can be considered as adequately assessed in the entire district, and the only two pergunnahs tolerably well advanced in cultivation at the time of the cession, or of which the resources seem to have been known to the former government.

14. The realization of the revenue of the district is not attended with much trouble to the revenue officers, nor with such embarrassment and distress to the zemindars, so as to cause the alienation of their lands, or compel them to pledge their crops. The great rise in the price of grain that has taken place since the last settlement has so increased the value of landed property as to obviate the necessity of their resorting to such a distressing expediency. The only difficulties are those attending a regular issue of dustuks for each succeeding kist; a single notice of the kind is generally sufficient to procure payment from the small proprietors; but the tolookdars of any considerable number of mouzas generally require the penalty of tulabana to be increased, in proportion to the amount of their respective jumma, by placing additional peons over them, before they make good their instalments. This practice has saved them from the harsher methods authorized by the Regulations, in cases of defalcation. The necessity of the procedure does not argue against the lightness of the assessment; it is solely to be attributed to the habit of procrastination in the liquidation of the public demand, with which every zemindar, however wealthy and prosperous, is more or less beset.

15. In addition to what I have stated of the inadequacy of the present assessment, I must not omit to remark, that every intelligent native unconnected with my office, and many of them extensive landholders, with whom I have conversed upon the subject, invariably acknowledge the extreme lightness of the jumma, and express their wonder that measures are not taken for increasing it by a summary assessment, instead of continuing the present leases until their detailed revisal, being a yearly loss to the Government of from two to three lacs of rupees.

16. This is the opinion of those whose interest it is that no enhancement should take place, and is therefore deserving of some consideration, and at the same time serves to show how little the scope and object of the detailed settlements are understood in the district; it is viewed with the greatest apprehension by all classes, which in a great measure accounts for the circumstance of a zemindar acknowledging that the pergunnah or even district in which his lands are situated is capable of yielding an increased jumma. The fact is, that the settlements having been commenced in the two frontier pergunnahs of the district, and no pains having been taken to explain the nature and purport of the enactment and the wishes of Government, the people are still as much alarmed at the collection of such minute particulars, and as ignorant of the purposes in view, as they were when Regulation VII. of 1822 was first promulgated in the district.

17. From

17. From the annexed* statement of transfers by private purchase and mortgages that have taken place within the last five years, you will perceive that no particular causes can be assigned, being so few and not more than is naturally to be expected to result from mere speculation, and motives only known to the parties themselves.

18. The embarrassments caused by the expense of prosecutions in the civil court, and that attending the decision of boundary disputes by arbitration, which are exceedingly numerous in this district, are evidently influential in the transfers by sale that occasionally take place. There is also a good deal of expense attending the proceedings of the criminal court, owing to the smallness of the villages, and the distance they are situated from the thanas and the sudder station; although these do not, as appears from the number of transfers, cause any great alienation of property: the difficulty at times experienced by some zemindars in making good their kists may be traced to such sources.

19. The Kistbundee is the same throughout the district, there being eight equal kists for Kooar to Bysakh, at the rate of two annas in the rupee.

20. The Bhadie rice harvest, called so from being reaped in the month of Bhadon, immediately precedes the first instalment, and enables the zemindars to liquidate both Kooar and Katick kists. The mash and fine rice, designated agunnee or jurhun, is reaped in Agun, and answerable for the kists of that month, together with Poose, Magh, and Phagoon, aided by the sugar harvest in the latter month. For Chyte and Bysakh, the Rubbee crops are sufficiently early to anticipate the Government demand. If the amount of the early and latter kists were increased, and those in the middle of the year proportionally reduced, the Government demand would be regulated more in conformity with the seasons, at which the produce is disposed of in the market, than is the case at present.

21. With reference to the 2d paragraph of the copy of your letter, addressed to the collector of the central division of Delhi, I have to state for your information, that it is not necessary to depute ameen or suzawuls in this district to assist the sudder malgoorzars in making their collections; and that there is only one village in pergunnah Selem-poor Mujhowlee which has been held Kham on account of deficiency of assets. In 1230 Fs. there were 119 villages under Kham management, from the resignations of zemindars and mustajeers, but only thirteen remain for which engagements have not been taken, and of these three or four are merely nominal.

I have, &c.

LETTER from JAMES ARMSTRONG, Esq. Collector of Goruckpore, to HOLT MACKENZIE, Esq. Secretary to Government.

3d April 1828.

Sir:

IN reply to your letter under date 4th February last, I have the honour to submit herewith the accompanying Statement regarding the tuhsildars under my authority, according to the prescribed form.

2. Mirza Hydur Allee is fully qualified for the efficient and faithful discharge of his responsible duties, by his respectability as an individual, knowledge of the regulations and the policy of the Government, acquired by previous services in the Judicial and Revenue departments. The great extent of his jurisdiction renders a minute acquaintance with the concerns of the agricultural community under him almost impossible; but his general knowledge, and above all, his impartial manner of ascertaining and recording information, gives me every reason for feeling confident that he would be extremely useful in ascertaining the produce of lands, expenses of cultivation, and the assessment which should be levied. Indeed, the result of his inquiries preparatory to the revision of the settlement of two estates, which were undertaken in the cold season by the orders of the Board, is most satisfactory; it was an experiment on a previous inquiry of the same kind, the accuracy of which I had reason to doubt; and although his statement of the ruckba and produce nearly doubled the former one, the correctness of it was such, that the proprietors had not a feasible objection to offer. He gives his opinion of, and states his objection to, any subject I have ever consulted him upon, with less hesitation than the generality of native officers. However unreasonable objections may be, it is a difficult task to remove them to the satisfaction of those with whom they originate; he is an intelligent officer, and capable of fully explaining the reasonableness of the measure which may be proposed.

3. Manick Chund, tuhseeldar of Amorah, has only been very lately appointed, but was selected by me from the qualifications that he evinced during the time he served as surburakar to the Sutassee estate; he was employed as acting tuhseeldar in another division for a short time under my predecessor, who, from being satisfied with his conduct during his temporary employment, intrusted him with the management of the estate in question. It is very extensive, and gave him a good opportunity of acquiring an intimate knowledge of the relative situation of the tenant and his landlord, and a minute acquaintance with the nature of agricultural business as conducted in detail. With this information, and his general character, I have sanguine expectations of his being very useful to the European officer who may be selected to renew the detailed settlement of that pergunnah, which has been interrupted by Mr. Conolly's absence; he appears to me to have the ability and inclination to ascertain the condition and circumstances of the mehals, to which his inquiries may be directed.

4. Mahomed Hussain Khan, tuhseeldar of Selem pore, Mujhowlee, and Cheloopar pergunnahs, has been long employed in this district, and possessed the good opinion of my predecessor, who promoted him to the situation of peshkar, from which he was removed at his own request on account of ill health. He is a very respectable man; and the satisfactory manner in which he conducted an enquiry into, and reported on, some towfeer lands, which had been for many years usurped by neighbouring zemindars, with the connivance of the former tuhseeldar and canoongoes of that division, gives me an opportunity of recording a favourable opinion of his acquirements and qualifications for the discharge of his duties; and that when the settlements of that pergunnah are brought under a detailed revision, I expect he will be very useful in furnishing the required information as to the produce, expenses of cultivation, and the assessment which should be levied.

5. Merza Kullub Hussein Khan was formerly surburakar to the Sutassee estate, and appointed to his present situation by my predecessor, who entertained a high opinion of his his merits, as would appear from his nomination causing some inconvenience to the gentleman then in charge of the estate above alluded to. He is punctual in the realization of the revenue; but I am unable to state how far he is qualified for the discharge of the important duties essential to the settlement of estates, under the provisions and in the spirit of Regulation VII. of 1822, for since his appointment, the settlements have been discontinued in pergunnah Bansee. However, as Mr. Carter was employed in that pergunnah, it is but fair to presume that he is sufficiently acquainted with the concerns of the agricultural community to be able to furnish useful information, and to remove in some degree the dislike the people entertain against the settlements in question.

6. Dost Mahomud has been employed for sixteen years in this district; he is certainly well acquainted with agricultural affairs, as he is himself a landed proprietor in this district, though not to any extent within his own jurisdiction; his collections are regular enough, and from his experience must be qualified to afford useful information on the points to which your inquiries are directed in the letter under acknowledgment. It would, however, be necessary to ascertain that he had no interest in the lands, of which he might be required to furnish particulars relative to their produce, and the expenses attending their cultivation.

7. Byjoonath Sing has also been long employed in this district; and such was the opinion Mr. Carter had of his qualifications for conducting the requisite inquiries into the resources of the lands, expenses of cultivation, and the relative rights of the owners and the cultivators, that he selected him for the Bansee division when first engaged in the settlement of that pergunnah. He continued to be satisfied with the selection he made until the year previous to his departure for Europe, when he removed him to the Bustee division, recording his dissatisfaction and the disappointment of the high hopes he entertained of him, without assigning any reason. He is certainly a very intelligent officer, and has been of great use in the settlements, though his conduct might not have been altogether free from the reproach of having evinced an itching palm, for how few are free from that besetting sin; still I am inclined to think, that too much credit was given to the information which gave rise to the above-named gentleman's suspicion; and since he did not inquire into its authenticity, the tihseeldar is entitled to the benefit of his previously acquired character. I am more willing to accede to this, on account of the endeavour that was made to prejudice me against him on my arrival here, and which, together with the proceedings relative to his removal from Bansee, had, at the time, the effect of inducing me to withhold his recommendation for the usual reward at the close of the year.

8. Of Gobind Narain, I am unable to state any thing relative to his ability to discharge the duties specified in your letter; he has not been engaged in ascertaining and recording information of that nature with a view to a detailed settlement, nor have I had any personal communication with him, so as to enable me to judge of his knowledge of revenue and agricultural matters, or whether he was likely to discover just objections to what might be proposed by myself or removed by explanation, such as might be unreasonably entertained by the people. He is attentive to the realization of the revenue, and the instructions issued for his guidance.

9. In conclusion, I beg to remark, that however well qualified tihseeldars may be, either from a natural intelligence or long experience for the discharge of those duties which form the subject of your letter, their inquiries are abstracted by the attention to their other important duties, and with many, that love of ease which urges them to trust to their moonshereers, and place too much reliance on the information derived from them and the canoongoes, renders their statements of the produce, and the expenses attending the cultivation, open to objection; indeed, little or no reliance can be placed on the information, without it is acquired under a full conviction that the whole of it will be speedily and vigilantly revised by their official superior on the spot.

No. 9.—MEMORANDUM by Mr. HOLT MACKENZIE.

As explanatory of some particulars relative to public sales, which can scarcely be understood without a minute reference to the circumstances of individual cases, I beg leave to submit the annexed extract from a note on the subject, which I began to write long ago, but which I have never been able to complete to my satisfaction. The more indeed I have thought on the subject, the more difficult does it appear to reconcile what has been done to any principle; and the stronger becomes the persuasion, that though the knot may with facility be cut, and the just rights of all classes provided for, it cannot be disentangled through any process, which shall be grounded on the denial of the ignorance of those by whom and by whose orders the injustice was committed.

All the law of the case is summed up in the printed Resolution of 1820; but though the writer of the Resolution in question, I must confess that all that is therein stated fails to meet the real circumstances. The facts detailed in regard to the settlement and sale of the village to which I have referred, will very nearly apply to a multitude of villages originally held by corporations of zemindars, which have been cruelly alienated in other districts; and it is a striking fact, that just as we descend from the more remote of the conquered provinces towards the ceded districts nearest the Presidency, the more extensively do we find the institutions of the people to have been invaded, and rights violated by the process in question, until in Bundlecund, Allahabad, and Goruckpore, we are met by the full flow of that tide of fraud and folly, which has been (imperfectly) detailed in the preamble of Regulation I. of 1821.

EXTRACT.

“ Government may naturally be desirous of passing an early decision on the subject of estates, which have been sold in liquidation or on pretence of arrears of revenue, because the adjustment of the claims which will arise, when the villages affected by such sales come to be settled under Regulation VII. of 1822, must depend mainly on the views that may be entertained in regard to their legal and equitable operation. And there is one decision, which, if I could feel assured of the accuracy of the information I possess, and of the soundness of the conclusion to which my judgment leads me, I should be disposed instantly to recommend, as required equally by the obligations of truth and justice, and which would summarily break through the difficulties that beset us.

“ It appears to me, that as the executive officers who suggested, the Boards who approved, and the Government which sanctioned the measure, were alike ignorant of the thing they proposed to dispose of, and of the rights and feelings (not less sacred than rights) which were affected by their determination, the plain and honest course is to confess this ignorance (culpable as we must acknowledge it to be), and at once to pronounce invalid all the sales in question, and to nullify all their consequences: due compensation being of course allowed to those who may suffer by the Resolution. Much less ingenuity than Government has it in its power to command from many of its Revenue officers will suffice to construct a plausible argument in justification of what has happened, and to give an appearance of consistency to the rules which have been passed, and to the acts which have been done in the enforcement of them; but we shall not, I humbly submit, thus meet the claims of justice; we shall not thus speak the dictates of truth; the most ignorant will not thus be deceived: the most submissive will not be satisfied. The wrongs that have been done are not to be disguised from the people by any trick of special pleading. Their reverence for Government must be destroyed by the use of any artifice. It cannot be raised by any claim to an exemption from error. It will, on the other hand, be upheld by the candid avowal and prompt redress of injuries.

“ I cannot, however, hope that the Government will on my suggestion adopt so broad and important a determination. I can scarcely expect that the proposition will be received with much favour in any other quarter. And if it be resolved to act on any less comprehensive hensive principle, we must, I submit, be prepared to take each district, perhaps the several divisions of each district, into separate consideration; for each will present some variety, either in the character of the original engagement under which the error accrued, or in the circumstances of the sale.

" I propose consequently now to commence with the district of Meerut, and to offer the details only of a single village, of which the settlement under Regulation VII. of 1822 enables me to give the history with a near approach at least to accuracy. The orders which his Lordship in Council may pass on the case will doubtless have an extended application.

" The papers of which I now enclose copies will show in a general manner the number and circumstances of the estates which have been sold in that district. However extensively the people have suffered from other causes, it has been subjected less, I believe, than almost any other to the scourge of public sale, and redress could therefore be given for the injuries resulting from that cause on the principle I have indicated above, at a comparative trifling charge upon the public purse, if indeed Government can ever stop to weigh the expense of doing justice. The case I have to detail, selected without any reference to the peculiar features, might alone be held to establish the fact that we have been governing in the dark, because all, from Government downwards, have been acting in the neglect of those details, without which there can be no real knowledge of a country, and in ignorance of which it must be a mere cast of the die whether the order of the magistrate be on the side of justice or oppression.

" In 1211, the settlement of Salanee, pergunnah Chaprowlee, was made with three persons, Jath zemindars, called Chinat, Luda Sookh, and Bukhta, at a jumma of Rs. 3,713, including Nankar and Inam. In 1212 the jumma was raised to Rs. 3,723,* and a person of the name of Ratna was joined in the engagement. Up to that time the collections of the place belonged to Dehlee, and it is said that the parties to the engagement were chosen in consideration of their fitness. For the three years following, the lease (theeka) of the villages was given to five persons,† including three of the former engagers, with an assessment including Inam-i-Mocuddumee, rising from Rs. 2,855‡ to 3,256.§ It is stated not to have been then customary to write any regular record of the proceeding held at the settlement of estates, and it does not consequently appear on what grounds the parties in question were admitted to engage.

" The instrument executed by them for the triennial settlement (called Durkuss theeka||) simply contains an engagement to pay the assessed jumma, without any specification of the character of the engagers. But the Inam being called Inam-i-Mocuddumee, it may be presumed that they then appeared in their proper character of mocuddums or representatives of the village community, as they would have continued to have done, had the village been managed on the Dehlee system. Unfortunately, however, our printed rules made no sufficiently distinct provision for such a scheme of management, and the engagers being zemindars, were recorded as such without any explanation of the nature and extent of their zemindaree interest.

|| The phrase, which is used in all the engagements, purports no more than a contract for a fixed sum, without reference to the character of the contractor.

"In 1216, when the next triennial settlement was made, it appeared that one of the parties to the former settlement (Silka) had fled across the Jumna on account of pecuniary embarrassment; and in his place Bukhta, called a subordinate parcener (shureek shikume), was admitted with the four remaining engagers. The assessment was then fixed, exclusive of the Mocuddumee Inam, and varied from Rs. 3,001 to 3,100."

The instrument, with exception to the exclusion of the above-mentioned item, was in the same terms as the preceding one. The roobakaree of settlement purports, that the five persons above mentioned had attended; that the preceding settlement-book was examined; that in it the names of Chinat, Lada Sook, Rutnah, Silka, and Mokum were recorded as zemindars: that the circumstance of Silka's flight was stated; that the four other engagers acknowledged Bukhta as a parcener, and requested that he might be joined with them; that no other claimants to the zemindaree having appeared, it was to be inferred that the five were the zemindars of the village, and that they were admitted to engage as such. At the next quartennial settlement, the same assessment was continued with the same parties, excepting that Chinat having been dismissed, his son Ramdial was admitted in his place.

The roobakaree, recovered on this occasion, shows, like the former, that nobody was thought of but the sudder malgoozers; and that the settlement accounts were taken as conclusive proof of zemindaree right, in so far at least as concerned the Revenue officers.

In 1221, a balance of Rs. 542 accrued, and on the report of the tuhseeldar (Abdoosobhan Khan) stating, that it could not be realized without a sale of the estate, Mr. Colin Shakespear recommended, and the Board authorized it to be disposed of by public auction. It was accordingly sold on the 2d November 1814 for Rs. 425, one moiety (ten biswas) being bought by Hossin Allee Khan, and the other half by Bence Ram Bugal; and the names of these two persons were recorded as zemindars in the room of those above mentioned.

In 1222, while still a year remained of the settlement, an abatement of Rs. 400 was granted, and the settlement for the five ensuing years was concluded at a jumma of 1223.	1224.	1225.	1226.		1227.

2,700.	2,716.	2,720.	2,730.	and	2,750.

In 1227, Hosen Allee sold for 180 rupees three biswas and fifteen biswansees, of his ten biswa share to Bence Ram, who was recorded as proprietor of $\frac{1}{2}$ and $\frac{1}{4}$ parts of the estate, and who came under engagements for the whole village, partly as zemindars and partly as farmers, for the years 1228 to 1232, subject to an assessment rising in the last year to 2,800.

In 1230, Hosen Allee sold his remaining share (bs. 6. 5.) to five persons, named Hurkoo, Bustee, Chatua, Suntook, Hinta, and Buhai, who were accordingly recorded as proprietors of that portion of the village.

The inquiries now held on the spot show that the last-mentioned persons were part of the original Jath proprietors of the village; that the portion purchased by them, constituting the inheritance of two of several families, among which the village had in old times been divided, is shared by twenty eight others of the same caste and tribe, to whom or to whose ancestors it had belonged previously to the sale;* and that twenty-eight persons would, but for the sale, have enjoyed a similar property, in the large portion which stands in the name of the bugal, but are now treated by that person as mere hereditary cultivators, though, being a non-resident, he makes his collections through their head men, five in number. It is further stated that Hossen Allee was brother-in-law to the tulsildar, who proposed the sale, and that the sale was effected by his intrigues.

Although Mr. Glyn was of opinion that the sale should be set aside, and the ousted zemindars restored, in consideration of the smallness of the balance contrasted with the

* We have thus the inheritance of fifty-six families sold for less than 500 rupees.

the value of the estate, and of the connexion between the tiheldar and one of the purchasers, he did not consider himself at liberty to question the right of the bugal, with whom accordingly he has proposed to make a settlement as proprietor for the 13 biswas 15 biswansees portion which stands recorded as his property; the old proprietor of this division he considered to have (a hereditary, I conclude, though not transferable) title of occupancy during good behaviour, subject however to the demand of a moiety of the produce for lands cultivated with grain, and to a money rent for the rest of their fields at the following rates :

Sugar-cane	Rs. 8	6	0
Cotton	4	4	7½
Muma and Churee	1	15	10
Carrots, &c.	2	4	0

For the remainder of the villages he took engagements from five persons as lumberdars or managers, being the leading men of the five divisions into which that branch of the community had been divided.

To these lumberdars he proposes to grant an allowance of 20 per cent. on the Government jumma, payable by them, with a further abatement of five per cent. in the rental of the lands they cultivate, which last advantage is extended to all their parceners.

The bugal, for his part of the village, is recognized as being entitled to the whole of both allowances, and the cultivators seem to be likewise made responsible for village expenses.

These arrangements strike me as being open to several objections, and I suspect the jumma assessed (Rs. 4,053), though assented to by the bugal and the malgoozars, is too high; but these are separate questions. The immediate point to be determined is whether the sale shall be set aside, and how; or maintained, and with what effect.

I have already shown that the settlement proceedings were founded on an entire mistake, which the slightest inquiry (if it had been the interest of the native officers to suggest inquiry) would have discovered. The report of the tehsildar regarding the balance, and the order passed by the collector on the subject, are instructive: the former states merely, that the five zemindars had failed to pay, though urged by him to do so, and that they were utterly insolvent; the latter, without a single question, and apparently without a moment's hesitation, orders the village to be included in a sale statement, to be forwarded to the Board. The sale was originally fixed for the 26th October, but was postponed to the 2d November, on account of the collector's want of leisure; and as it seems to have taken place without any fresh notice, it might perhaps on this ground be held to be invalid by the Adawlut. The umul dustuck granted to the purchasers, and addressed to the mocuddums, cultivators, and ryots of the village, is less specific than the corresponding documents prepared by the more expert mootsuddies of the Lower Provinces would appear to be. It states generally, that the zemindaree of the village had been sold for an arrear due by the five zemindars above mentioned; that their names had consequently been struck out of the Government records, and those of the purchasers inserted;* and that the latter were consequently to be considered as full zemindars, and as such to receive the malgoozaree. The plea subsequently urged by the purchasers, that the estate had been over-assessed, and that the defaulters as well as themselves had suffered losses, is confirmed by the canoongo of the pergunnah, and seems to have been readily admitted by Mr. Shakespear; but no thought is given to the imputation of cruel injustice which such an admission casts upon the previous sale. And the repeated roobokurees of settlement all speak the same utter neglect of the numerous individuals whose interests were compromised.

Mr.

* Zemindasan, Moostugul.

Mr. Glyn's inquiries do not show, certainly, how the revenue was collected, previously to the sale, nor whether the arrear was in part due from the zemindars generally, or from the Government engagers only. It is to be inferred, however, that antecedently to the sale, the public demand and village expenses were distributed among the cultivators, in proportion to the land held by them; and it is probable, that there was a general failure to make good the amount demandable on that principle; at this time of day it would, I fear, be vain to attempt to ascertain the fact. We should probably succeed only in calling into existence a vast mass of falsehood and forgery, and that in exact proportion to the confidence with which the executive officer might assure us he had obtained real accounts;* I cannot therefore recommend any inquiry into the point. I shall proceed on the assumption least favourable to the village community, observing only, that as no means were taken to ascertain the fact at the time when it could have been ascertained, they are entitled to the benefit of an opposite conclusion.

I am sorry to say I can find nothing in the papers to support Mr. Glyn's general statement, that "the intending purchasers have invariably been given to understand that nothing more than the exclusive right of the defaulting proprietor was to be knocked down;" on the contrary, it seems to be assumed throughout that the entire zemindary of the village was to be conveyed to the purchaser; and this doctrine I believe to have universally guided the decisions of all officers, Judicial and Revenue, until called in question by Government at (unfortunately) a late period, and it appears to have been submitted to by the people. I also regret to observe, that the facts of the individual case appear to contradict the statement, that purchasers have exercised only the privileges which were exercised by the former malgozars; for in this case we find the bugal collecting the full assessment of 50 per cent. on the gross produce, without reference to the limitation of the Government demand, which would have restricted the collections of the former malgozars. It would apparently have been nearer the truth, if it had been stated that the purchase was understood by the people to convey a right to the farm of the revenue of the whole village, provided the purchaser could satisfy the collector; and that to the farmer belonged exclusively all the profit arising out of the difference between the specific sum which he contracted to pay to Government, and the rent or revenue which Government was entitled to demand on the crops of each year. In the individual case, this would amount to a right of enjoying all that might remain of rent, after satisfying the Government assessment; because it is, I apprehend, certain that the demand of half the grain produce would leave no surplus profit to the cultivator, and such a demand, though probably not enforced, would appear to be justified by the local usage touching engagements, as well as by the provisions of the Maslim Code. To recognize it in the purchaser would, therefore, be virtually to destroy the property of the village zemindars. Yet I see no principle on which, if the sale be at all maintained, any thing short of it can be recognized. To fix rates favourable to the cultivators, excepting under a compromise with the purchaser, would be to violate his property not less than to compel him to relinquish his purchase; and on the whole, I see no way of getting out of our difficulties, than by admitting that a gross act of injustice has been done, which must be remedied; and by setting aside the sale, as the only means of providing an effectual remedy, granting suitable compensation, if any shall be thought due to the purchaser, and restoring the village corporation to the rights and institutions which we have so blindly invaded, and which the most arbitrary of our predecessors would probably have respected.

Secretary to Government.

* In this case, the putwarry denied having any accounts later than 1228; those produced for later years are rejected by Mr. Glyn as fabrications. Even as such, they are rather curious, as exhibiting the profits of the engager Benu Ram Bugal, under the head of Sewace, the yearly average being Rs. 174, while the village expenses pocketed by the moududums are stated at Rs. 347.

LETTER from R. C. GLYNN, Esq. Collector of Meerut, to HOLT MACKENZIE, Esq.,
Secretary to Government.

Camp, Delhi Territory,
29th December 1827.

Sir :

I HAVE the honour to acknowledge the receipt of your circular letter, dated the 8th instant, and to inform you that no report has hitherto been furnished from this office on the subject of sales made for the recovery of arrears of revenue, in consequence of the requisition contained in the 242d paragraph of the resolution of Government, the 22d December 1820 ; but I now beg leave to furnish a Statement of the particulars alluded to therein, viz.

Firstly.—The extent to which sales have been made of the different descriptions of estates (in this district) by public auction.

There are thirty-seven, as detailed in the accompanying account.

Secondly.—The degree in which the purchasers have exercised powers inconsistent with the principles laid down, and how far they have been supported or controlled by the courts of judicature.

The exclusive right only of the defaulting proprietors have been sold, and the purchasers have not exercised powers, whether in the ejecting a Koodkast ryot, or resident and hereditary cultivator ; nor have they demanded from such an under tenant, or from an inferior zemindar or other proprietor, a higher rate of rent than was receivable by the former malgoozar ; and no decisions of the courts of judicature in such cases would appear to be upon record in this office.

Thirdly.—How far, in effecting sales of estates of the different descriptions specified, the acts of the Revenue officers may have been such as to lead the purchasers into the belief that they were entitled to the absolute property of the land composing the Mehal sold, or otherwise to exercise powers inconsistent with the above principles.

When an estate has been exposed to sale, the intending purchasers have invariably been given to understand, that nothing more than the exclusive right of the defaulting proprietor in the property proposed for sale was to be knocked down to the highest bidder in open competition.

Fourthly.—The prices usually paid, or expenses incurred by the auction purchasers of estates, falling within the scope of the above resolutions, and the value of the purchase, supposing the above principles to be maintained.

It has been ascertained that where an estate, depending entirely upon the clouds for irrigation, was purchased for Rs. 300, and the purchaser had subsequently laid out 300 rupees more in sinking two pucca wells, and another 100 rupees in making further local improvements, such as getting up dwellings for new comers, Tugavee advances to the Asamees, &c. &c., the value of the estate has been calculated at 2,000 rupees, while the actual cost to him was no more than 700 rupees.

Fifthly.—How far, on giving effect to those principles, the purchasers would be entitled to compensation.

Where there are large annual profits derived by purchasers of estates at public sales, they will certainly be very unwilling to transfer the property to an original proprietor, let the proposed consideration be ever so high. Moreover, several estates so purchased have passed into the hands of other individuals by private intermediate sales and transfers, three three or four times successively, since the first purchase by public auction, from various circumstances, i. e. for instance, the refractory spirit of the original maliks being a continual annoyance to the purchasers, or from the assessment not being adequate to the capabilities of the soil, or solely with the view of obtaining an advantageous sale, thereby enhancing the value of the property to such a degree, that many of the original proprietors are not the personal means of satisfying. If, however, an allowance of simple interest at twelve per cent. per annum, foregoing of course all profits which the parties in possession may have derived during occupancy, was made upon the capital from the date of purchase to the period of relinquishment of the property to the original zemindars, it would not be a matter of difficulty for them to liquidate the same. But this is only one side of the question; several of the purchasers, being the inveterate enemies of the original zemindar, could not be brought to accede to any terms, however advantageous to themselves.

Sixthly.—On what terms they would be willing to resign their purchases, and how far the original zemindars, in or out of possession, would be able and willing to make good the amount, or how a compromise could otherwise be most expediently adjusted.

Of their own free-will and accord they will never be willing to resign their purchases, on the plea of deriving large profits, and the increased and increasing value of the estates, to satisfy which would be far beyond the reach of the original zemindars, most of whom are willing, and can only refund the purchase-money.

I recommend a regulation authorizing the restoration of hereditary lands sold by public auction for arrears of revenue to original proprietors, on their paying auction purchase-money, with interest at the rate of twelve per cent. per annum.

I have, &c.
